

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. ### WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Moved, "That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, in addition to the Duties of Income Tax granted by "The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1884," there shall be charged, collected, and paid for the year which commenced on the sixth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-four, in respect of all Property, Profits, and Gains mentioned or described as chargeable in the Act of the sixteenth and seventeenth years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter thirty-four, the following Duties of Income Tax (that is to say) :

For every Twenty Shillings of the annual value or amount of Property, Profits, and Gains chargeable under Schedules (A), (C), (D), or (E) of the said Act, the Duty of One Penny;

And for every Twenty Shillings of the annual value of the occupation of Lands, Tenements, Hereditaments, and Heritages chargeable under Schedule (B) of the said Act, the Duty of One Halfpenny;

Provided always, That, with the view of securing the additional Duties and affording the proper rights of deduction in respect thereof in the case of Dividends, Interest, or other annual sums due or payable half-yearly or quarterly in the course of the said year, where one of the half-yearly payments or two of the quarterly payments shall have been made, the other half-yearly payment or quarterly payments shall be charged with the additional Duty of Two Pence for every Twenty Shillings of the amount thereof; and where three of the quarterly payments shall have been made, the other quarterly payment shall be charged with the additional Duty of Four Pence for every Twenty Shillings of the amount thereof.

Provided also, That the charge under this Resolution shall be deemed to be satisfied by an addition of one-fifth of the amount of the Duties assessed under "The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1884," to such amount, and payment of such addition therewith,"—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer) .. .. 1855

After long debate, Question put, and agreed to.

ROLL OF THE LORDS SPIRITUAL AND TEMPORAL

IN THE SIXTH SESSION OF THE TWENTY-SECOND PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

48<sup>o</sup> VICTORIÆ 1884.

MEM.—According to the Usage of Parliament, when the House appoints a Select Committee, the Lords appointed to serve upon it are named in the Order of their Rank, beginning with the Highest; and so, when the House sends a Committee to a Conference with the Commons, the Lord highest in Rank is called first, and the rest go forth in like Order: But when the Whole House is called over for any Purpose within the House, or for the Purpose of proceeding forth to Westminster Hall, or upon any public Solemnity, the Call begins invariably with the Junior Baron.

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

SIXTH SESSION OF THE TWENTY-SECOND PARLIAMENT OF THE
APPOINTED TO MEET 29 APRIL, 1880, IN THE FORTY-THIRD YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, 23rd October, 1884.

THE PARLIAMENT, which had been Prorogued successively from the 14th August, 1884, to the 15th September; thence to the 23rd October, met this day for the despatch of Business.

The Session was opened by Commission.

THE HOUSE being met;

THE LORD CHANCELLOR acquainted the House,

"That it not being convenient for Her Majesty to be personally here present this day, She has been pleased to cause a Commission under the Great Seal to be prepared, in order to the holding of this Parliament."

VOL. CXXIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

Then Five of the LORDS COMMISSIONERS—namely, The LORD HIGH CHANCELLOR; The LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (The Lord Carlingford); The EARL OF KIMBERLEY (Secretary of State for India); The LORD CHAMBERLAIN (The Lord Kenmare); and The LORD MONSON (Captain of the Yeomen of the Guard)—being in their Robes, and seated on a Form placed between the Throne and the Woolsack, commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to let the COMMONS know "The Lords Commissioners desire their immediate Attendance in this House to hear the Commission read."

Who being at the Bar, with their Speaker:—The Commission was read by the Clerk:—Then

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"I HAVE brought you together after a recess unusually short, in order that you may be enabled at once to give your further consideration to the great subject of the representation of the people in Parliament.

"I continue to maintain relations of amity with all foreign Powers.

"The information received from the Soudan includes painful uncertainties; but the energy, courage, and resource, conspicuously displayed by General Gordon in the successful defence of Khartoum, deserve my warm recognition.

"The advance of my troops to Dongola has for its object the rescue and security of that gallant officer, and of those who have so faithfully co-operated with him.

"In Egypt itself I am using my best endeavours to promote further improvement; and I have given my support to the Egyptian Government in the difficult financial position in which it has been left through the failure of the recent Conference.

"I have to regret that circumstances have occurred on the south-western frontier of the Transvaal which demand my vigilant attention. In conjunction with the Government of the Cape Colony I am engaged in considering the means which may be required to secure the faithful observance of the Convention of the present year.

"Papers on this subject will be presented to you at an early date.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"The operations in the Soudan will render it necessary to ask from you a further pecuniary provision.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"The Bill for the extension of the Parliamentary Franchise will at once be introduced.

"In conclusion, I humbly and most anxiously trust that the blessing of Almighty God may attend upon your labours."

Then the Commons withdrew.

House adjourned during pleasure.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—OBSERVATIONS.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I may take this opportunity of acquainting your Lordships as to what the Government think will be the most convenient course to adopt with regard to the meeting of the House after the Address has been agreed to this evening, which I trust will be the case. Her Majesty's Government have no Business to bring before your Lordships; but Notice of a Question has been given by a noble and gallant Lord to-day, which he does not mean to put until the First Lord of the Admiralty returns to this country. Therefore, if it is convenient to your Lordships, I shall this evening move the adjournment of the House to Monday week, the 3rd of November.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I have no objection whatever to the proposal of the noble Earl. I understand there is likely to be some Business of interest on Monday week; but that before that time there will not be any.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.
ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

LORD CHANCELLOR.

LORD BELPER (who wore the uniform of the South Notts Yeomanry), in rising to move an Address in reply to Her Majesty's Gracious Speech from the Throne, said: My Lords, in rising to address myself to the Motion which has been placed in my hands, I feel how much I stand in need of the kind indulgence and generous support of this House. Not only because I know how important is the occasion on which we are met together this evening, and how grave are the issues which depend on the decision which you will give on the measure brought before you, but because I am deeply conscious that I cannot call to my aid that eloquence or those powers of expression which have so often distinguished those who have performed this duty on previous occasions. My Lords, I am aware that there is a wide diversity of opinion on the principal measure for the consideration of which the Session is held, and I will endeavour to the utmost of my power to avoid saying anything to intensify any feeling that already exists. I am deeply sensible of the responsibility which devolves upon me; and I can assure you it will be my earnest endeavour not to use any expression which can tend, in the remotest way, to interfere with the calm and deliberate judgment of the House, or to adopt a tone calculated to impede, even for the shortest time, what I hope will be a speedy and a satisfactory settlement of the question. If I have any claim to stand in the position I do, I can only find it in the fact that, believing, as I do, that there is a strong, earnest, and spontaneous feeling in the country in favour of this measure, I have given my cordial support to Her Majesty's Government in the course they have pursued. May I add that I believe I am one of the oldest supporters of the principle of the measure in your Lordships' House, because I had the opportunity of supporting its principle on the first occasion when it was introduced by Mr. Trevelyan in a Resolution in the other House of Parliament in favour of household suffrage; and I naturally, therefore, take a very warm interest in its prospects. Your Lordships cannot be surprised that the Government have summoned Parliament at this unusual period, when you consider not only the nature of the measure which will be brought before you, but how fully and amply it has been discussed in the country, and that the other House has already passed it by a large and even an overwhelming majority. Although the course adopted in summoning Parliament now is unusual, it is not without precedent or a parallel, for I may remind your Lordships that, at the period of the first Reform Bill, Parliament was called together in December, 1831, under almost identical circumstances. I do not know whether there are any of your Lordships who can recall the circumstances of that Bill; but I believe I am correct in stating that it had been rejected by your Lordships' House, and Parliament was called together, after a Recess of two months' duration, under circumstances very similar to the present. If the precedent is important, it is because there are points of difference between the two occasions which it is requisite to consider. In the two months' preceding the Session of 1831 there was great excitement in the country, which had culminated in disorder that had resulted in the destruction of property, and even in the loss of life; and in the Speech from the Throne it was, unfortunately, necessary to call attention to those disorders, and to ask Parliament to take measures to put a stop to them. During the last two months there has certainly been excitement and interest, if this can be judged from the number of meetings which have been held and the large number of people attending those meetings. But, until 10 days ago, there was not a single case of disorder or riot; and I am sure it will be a matter of profound regret to your Lordships, and especially to those on the Ministerial side of the House, that there should have been any occasion on which a meeting legally assembled should have been disturbed by riot or disorder. Undoubtedly, the meetings have been of great importance on one side and on the other; but, putting aside those where large audiences were attracted by distinguished orators, it will be found that there has been a demonstration of earnest feeling, especially on the part of the unenfranchised classes, who have assembled in large masses to ask your Lordships to pass the second reading of the Bill. These demonstrations have been made, with one or two exceptions, with moderation, and without disorder; and, I trust that that consideration will do something to assist your Lordships in coming to a calm and deliberate decision. There is another difference between 1831 and the present time. In 1831 the measure was conscientiously opposed by many who believed that it was too strong and sweeping a measure, and that its consequences would be disastrous to the country, and, perhaps, the Constitution as well; but, with respect to the present measure, it can truly be said that if it has not met with much approval from those who oppose it, its principle, at least, has received a general assent. Even by those who have thought it their duty to oppose it, the acknowledgment has been made that, sooner or later, the principle of household suffrage in counties will have to be conceded. If that is so, if both sides are so far agreed upon the principle of the measure, surely there ought to be no obstacle to the settlement of the question, which may not be surmounted by judgment and prudence. I am quite aware that a clear and distinct issue has been taken by noble Lords opposite, and by the Opposition in the other House of Parliament; they have said that it is an incomplete measure, and that they do not wish to give the Government the power which would be given to them if the Franchise Bill were passed without redistribution, or without any security that the redistribution scheme will be a fair and just measure. Parliament having been called together now to give "further consideration to the great subject of the representation of the people in Parliament," it is impossible to ignore the issue which has been raised by noble Lords opposite—which has been discussed at every public meeting from one end of England to the other; but if I do allude to it, it is because, in the calmer atmosphere which should prevail in this House, we can take our stand on a somewhat higher ground than is possible to those who have been addressing crowded meetings of enthusiastic supporters from Party platforms. In this spirit I will ask whether there is a single Member of your Lordships' House who sincerely and conscientiously believes that, if this Bill were read a second time in this House, Her Majesty's Government would make use of the power given to them by their majority in the other House to force an unfair measure of redistribution through Parliament? I do not believe that any of your Lordships can think so. For myself, it is needless to say that, standing in the position which I occupy, I have full confidence in the intentions of Her Majesty's Government. I will go further, and will venture to say that there is no statesman, whether he represents the Party on that side of the House or on this, who, having given deliberate pledges to the country, with a knowledge of the grave responsibility resting upon him, in a crisis like the present, would deliberately make use of his majority for passing through either House a Bill which does not fairly represent the interests of the country, or which will give one section of the community a larger power of voting than they are entitled to; and that he would do that, on the chance of getting a temporary Party advantage, with the certainty of alienating from himself a large section of moderate and fair-minded men. If a majority of this House can trust the fair intentions of the Government, surely the solution of this question should be neither distant nor difficult. If we are agreed on the principle of the Bill, if we are agreed that a moderate and a fair measure of redistribution must be passed; if the majority of this House, or a considerable section of this House, are satisfied that the Government will attempt to deal fairly with redistribution, or if it should be possible to give such security to those who are not satisfied as to enable them to accept the measure which is now introduced, I do venture to express a confident hope that your Lordships will accede to what I believe is a very strong and a growing feeling in the country—that the Bill should pass into law without any further delay.

Lord Belper

I have dwelt at some length on the question, because it is one of the most important matters which has been brought under your Lordships' attention on the present occasion; but, if public interest has been somewhat engrossed by this question at home, certainly affairs abroad require your Lordships' attention. At the present moment, an Expedition, almost of a novel kind, has been despatched to the interior of Africa. I believe that in the General who has been chosen to command that Expedition—Lord Wolseley—your Lordships have a guarantee and a security that every precaution will be taken to insure for that Expedition a satisfactory result. I think I need hardly recall your Lordships' minds to the circumstances under which General Gordon was sent out. He went out from this country, at almost a moment's notice, to rescue the garrisons of the Soudan, which were cut off from all help from outside. He went there with Colonel Stewart, with a simple and unquestioning devotion to the call of duty, knowing only how great were the dangers and difficulties before him. Since he arrived in Khartoum, we have had very little information to enable us to say exactly what has taken place there. But I think we may certainly gather this from the telegrams which have been received, and from the information which has reached us in other ways—that soon after General Gordon reached Khartoum he found it was impossible, with the resources at his disposal, to rescue those whom he was sent out to save; and, knowing that, he determined that he would not desert them. He took measures to fortify Khartoum, and we know how successfully he carried them out. He not only repulsed the attacks of the Mahdi's forces, but he was even able to carry the war into the enemy's country, and to bombard, if not to recapture, Berber. I need not dwell on the character and the career of General Gordon; but I do not believe there ever was an enterprise which depended more for its success on the personal qualities of one man. The success which General Gordon has attained is owing, not only to his knowledge of the character of the Natives, but also to his own great personal influence and courage. I am sure your Lordships all hope that the Expedition which has now started to relieve him will meet with complete success. But, as the Speech from the Throne says, there are, unfortunately, painful uncertainties in regard to the information which has been received from the Soudan. Foremost among them is the report which has reached us of the murder of Colonel Stewart. I feel that all the Members of your Lordships' House will join in a fervent hope that that report may not be confirmed; that Colonel Stewart's life has been spared; and that he may return with General Gordon to receive the well-deserved thanks of his country.

The Speech from the Throne goes on to refer to the internal affairs of Egypt; and I am sure that your Lordships will cordially agree with Her Majesty's Government in the announcement that Her Majesty has given her support to the Government of Egypt in the difficult financial position of that country. Your Lordships naturally know that Lord Northbrook has been sent out to inquire into the financial affairs of Egypt, and that he has not yet returned; and your Lordships will await with anxiety the measures which may be proposed on his return; but I will venture to say that this country, having undertaken a grave responsibility in Egypt, and having made great sacrifices since the first occupation, will support Her Majesty's Government in any measure they may consider necessary to improve the government of that country.

There is one other subject which I should not like to pass over without comment. The last paragraph in the Speech from the Throne states that Her Majesty regrets the circumstances which have occurred on the South-Western Frontier of the Transvaal. Some months ago a final Convention was made with the Boers of the Transvaal, and it was our hope that we should not so soon have heard of new difficulties in that country. I venture to think, in treating with the Transvaal, Her Majesty's Government made every concession which was possible under the circumstances. They allowed the boundaries to be enlarged, and also showed that they were willing to meet any difficulty which might arise in a just and liberal spirit. It must, therefore, be with deep regret that your Lordships will have heard of the circumstances which have now occurred in the neighbouring country. It appears that a band of freebooters has invaded the territory of a friendly Chief, who is under our protection, have killed his people, have plundered him, and have also murdered the English Resident. Moreover, Montsioa has been forced into a Treaty, which places him entirely at the mercy of the Transvaal Government. It is satisfactory to know, however, that the Transvaal Government have now withdrawn the Proclamation with regard to the annexation of the country of Montsioa, that Mr. Joubert has resigned, and that he has made a strong protest against the illegal action of the Transvaal Government. More than that, it appears that the feeling in the Cape Colony, not only amongst the English, but amongst the Dutch, supports our view; and, therefore, it is satisfactory to know that the authorities of the Colony have agreed with Her Majesty's Government to take steps which will put an end to these illegal proceedings. Your Lordships will not wish to show any feeling of revenge for what has occurred; but the country, I think, will demand that the Convention which was made with the Boers a few months ago shall be absolutely and entirely respected and maintained.

In conclusion, I have only to thank your Lordships for the kind indulgence which you have extended to me, and, before I sit down, to express a hope that although the Session may be a short one, it may not be a barren one, and that the result of our deliberations will tend to promote the happiness and prosperity of the people, and to maintain the dignity and authority of both Houses of Parliament. I beg to move the following humble Address to Her Majesty:—

MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN,

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that Your Majesty continues to maintain relations of amity with all foreign Powers.

"We learn with satisfaction that although the information received from the Soudan includes painful uncertainties, yet the energy, courage, and resource conspicuously displayed by General Gordon in the successful defence of Khartoum deserve Your Majesty's warm recognition.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that the advance of Your Majesty's troops to Dongola has for its object the rescue and security of that gallant officer, and of those who have so faithfully co-operated with him.

"We thank Your Majesty for informing us that in Egypt itself Your Majesty is using Your best endeavours to promote further improvement, and that Your Majesty has given Your support to the Egyptian Government in the difficult financial position in which it has been left through the failure of the recent Conference.

"We learn with regret that circumstances have occurred on the south-western frontier of the Transvaal which demand Your Majesty's vigilant attention; and we humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that, in conjunction with the Government of the Cape Colony, Your Majesty is engaged in considering the means which may be required to secure the faithful observance of the Convention of the present year.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that the Bill for the extension of the Parliamentary Franchise will at once be introduced.

"We humbly assure Your Majesty that our careful consideration shall be given to any measure which may be submitted to us; and we earnestly trust that the blessing of Almighty God may attend upon our labours."

LORD LAWRENCE (who wore a Court dress), in rising to second the Motion, said: My Lords, the arguments with regard to the franchise are so well understood by those of you who have read and listened to the speeches of able men of both sides and both Parties that we must come to the conclusion that little can be said one way or the other that has not already been said. I think, however, it is rather a mistake that the question should have so absorbed the mind of the country, and that other matters of great and critical importance should have been overlooked. Attention has recently been directed to such questions as the state of the Navy, our harbour defences, and our coaling stations; and it really seems to me as if it is almost necessary that public opinion should force large expenditure on the Government. This ought to strengthen the hands of the Executive, for even the strongest Government is unable to do this unless supported by that force of public opinion. At the same time, I believe that the country has every confidence in the Government. I shall abstain from calling attention to the issues now before Parliament and the country. We are thoroughly aware of the strain between the two Houses, and, in my own humble opinion, that strain can only be relaxed by mutual concessions from both sides. We are accustomed to hear about reforms of your Lordships' House; but, I will ask, are no reforms necessary in "another place?" We have it on the authority of the Prime Minister himself, for he has said that the most important question, after the subject of the franchise has been disposed of, is the reform of the internal administration of the House of Commons itself. He stated that, whatever Government came into power, that would be one of the most important considerations which could be brought before it.

The Speech from the Throne comments upon the condition of Egypt, and, with respect to that subject, the country is looking anxiously to the progress of the Expedition to relieve General Gordon; and I hope that, as a result of that Expedition, some permanent Government will be established at Khartoum. The conduct of General Gordon, and his able lieutenant, Colonel Stewart, with regard to whose fate we are now in a state of uncertainty, deserves the high terms in which my noble Friend (Lord Belper) has spoken of it.

Your Lordships will be rejoiced to hear that Her Majesty's Government have resolved upon taking strong measures with regard to the Transvaal; that they are about to protest against the breach of the Convention so very lately concluded with that country; and that they will insist on the Boers carrying out their Treaty engagements, and keeping open the trade routes into the interior. There is a report that Colonel Sir Charles Warren, who has the highest experience with regard to matters at the Cape, has received instructions to proceed there. The only requisite for the success of his mission is that he should be strongly supported; and, since he has the confidence of the Government, no doubt he will be so supported, and, if necessary, force will be employed.

I further think your Lordships ought to congratulate the Government on the admirable appointment they have recently made of a Member of this House to the Viceroyalty of India. His career as a statesman and administrator is of world-wide repute, and all Parties are agreed on the judiciousness of the selection. The noble Earl (the Earl of Dufferin) will leave this country with the hearty good wishes of your Lordships' House and of the country. I will, in connection with the noble Earl, quote a sentence in a recent speech of the Earl of Dufferin, which is to this effect—

"That he wished for no higher encomium or recognition than that his administration had been uneventful, and that he had kept the Empire intrusted to his guardianship tranquil and secure"— words that will alone stamp him as one who has the confidence of his country, and fit also for the highest position under his Sovereign. I will also say one word on the noble Marquess who is on the point of relinquishing that Viceroyalty (the Marquess of Ripon). It can truly be said of him that he has kept India tranquil and secure, prosperous and happy. It is entirely owing to his policy that we have a friendly Ruler on our North-West Frontier; and I maintain that the Liberal policy in Afghanistan has absolutely succeeded. Whatever criticisms we may pass upon his administration, we must recognize the enormous difficulties which a Ruler of more than 250,000,000 had to contend with. The Office of Viceroy is no sinecure, and we are all too ready to criticize his administration of affairs. It should, therefore, always be borne in mind that our Governors General invariably did their duty to the best of their ability. In conclusion, I beg to second the Motion of my noble Friend. [See p. 11.]

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, it is usual, or, at all events, very common, in following the Mover and Seconder of the Address, to compliment them on the speeches they have made. In this instance, in addition to the ordinary reasons which can justly be given for such a course, I have other grounds on which I can express my admiration with real sincerity. I heartily admire the fertility of resource and the breadth of treatment which enabled the noble Lord who moved the Address to elaborate a speech of three-quarters of an hour out of so short and insignificant a text.

EARL GRANVILLE: Half-an-hour.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Half-an-hour, then. But this does not detract from the credit due to the noble Lord. It was a very interesting speech. I do not think the topics could have been treated in a more interesting manner, nor could much more have been made from a Queen's Speech which is remarkable principally for its omissions. It is very creditable to the noble Lord.

As to the noble Lord the Seconder, the quality of his speech which I should most like to compliment was its candour. As I listened to him I rather felt some doubt whether he had been subjected to that educational process usual on such occasions under my noble Friend at the Table (Lord Cork), and whether he had not fallen accidentally into the hands of my noble Friend not now in the House (Lord Lathom). He noticed, I thought, with great justice that the Speech did not contain many things which the public would like to hear of; that it was a great mistake to suppose that the franchise was the all-engrossing subject which the Government seemed to believe it; that there were other objects which required to be reformed besides that House of Lords for which Mr. Chamberlain reserves his projects of reform; that the Government might have told us something of that question which deeply occupies the minds of all political thinkers at the present moment—namely, the state of our defensive Services, and the remedies for their defects which the Government propose. He told us—and I was very glad to hear it—contrary to the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, that he thought it necessary that Khartoum should be retained; and he went on to point out that India also had not received that notice in the Speech put forward by Her Majesty's Government which its importance and the special relations in which we stand to it naturally deserve. But of all these sentiments, which, as I say, rather puzzled me as to the origin of his speech, the one with which I sympathized most was the one in which, after announcing to us that a distinguished servant of the Crown was about to proceed to South Africa, in order to remedy the disorders that have arisen there, he expressed, in meaning language, the hope that he would not be left to do it alone, and that he would be supported in his arduous task by something else besides words. I think the noble Lord expressed himself with as much candour as could be expected. Of course, what he meant was that he hoped his fate would not be that of General Gordon. My Lords, as I have said, the Speech of Her Majesty is remarkable chiefly for its omissions. With the exception of the single matter of the franchise, there is no allusion whatever to domestic legislation. The requirement of domestic legislation is not entirely absent, and I believe that there is no precedent for entering upon important domestic legislation without, in the Speech from the Throne, giving the Houses of Parliament some indication of the course which the Government intend to take. An explanation of this omission might be made by the suggestion that the Government are initiating a Session which they intend shall last only four weeks, and which they are certainly determined shall close its course of life at the expiration of that time. But it is not possible to accept that explanation. In the first place, this is not a Session that has to deal merely with the franchise. It is a Session which must have taken place if the Franchise Question had never arisen. It is a Session which has been rendered absolutely necessary by the expenditure which Her Majesty's Government have incurred with regard to their military proceedings in Egypt; and, therefore, it is utterly without precedent that, summoning Parliament for that purpose, they should treat the Session as one of only a month or five weeks, and should put two Appropriation Bills into a single year, which has never been done before, or, on the other hand, that they should withhold all knowledge of their intentions with regard to domestic legislation. And I am the less able to assume that it is because they intend to cut the Session short, because the noble Lord, in that clear exordium with which he commenced his remarks, told us that he understood the opening words of the Speech to pledge the Government to introduce the subject of redistribution, and they must be extremely sanguine if they think that that can be done in five weeks. It is possible that the Government have reflected in their minds that there are certain grave questions of legislation with regard to Ireland, which, in due time, must be faced, but with regard to which it is much more convenient at this period of the Session to refrain from saying whether they intend to act, or not to act; and to that reticence may possibly be ascribed the curious character of the Queen's Speech. Then we come to foreign affairs. The language of the Speech has that notorious felicity of grammar which seems always to attach to inspired productions of the Royal pen. I say inspired, and I lay stress upon it, because I do not know why it is that a Government consisting of an unusual number of eloquent and highly literary men should have such a singular faculty for producing unliterary Speeches. The Speech says—"The information received from the Soudan includes painful uncertainties." That seems to me to be very much like the observation of the Irish gentleman, who said that his available assets included a great number of debts. But it proceeds—

"The energy, courage, and resource, conspicuously displayed by General Gordon in the successful defence of Khartoum, deserve my warm recognition."

How does the Government know what General Gordon has been doing? We have no intelligence. It is not even known whether he has confined himself to the defence of Khartoum, and, if he has done so, whether he has been successful. On the contrary, gloomy rumours have come across to the bazaars, which we all hope are untrue; and it is a very strange statement for the Government to make that they warmly recognize the energy, courage, and resource which are said to have been conspicuous in General Gordon, but which have been hidden by a thick veil of ignorance from the knowledge of all the world. I should like to know in what particular position the Mission of General Gordon stands? There is a good deal of variation of language in the tone in which the Government speak of that Mission. At the beginning of this year the Government, in a Speech from the Throne, explained to us what that Mission was, and they did so in these terms—

"I have also despatched Major General Gordon"— not to defend, but—

"to report on the best means of giving effect to the resolution of the Khedive to withdraw from the interior of the Soudan, and have permitted him to act in the execution of that measure."

Now, the only Report which General Gordon has sent home is that the policy of the Government has covered it with indelible disgrace, and having sent that he has discharged his duty, as far as reporting is concerned. Now, he is permitted to act in the execution of the measure of withdrawal—which seems the last thing that General Gordon appears to be inclined to do. He has not withdrawn. On the contrary, he has gone into the Soudan. He has placed himself in its foremost and most important fortified place, and, according to the account of the Government, he has defended that post with great zeal and courage; but, in doing so, he has absolutely cut from beneath them the ground of the policy which he was originally sent to carry out. Everything he has done has been in distinct contravention of the policy which he was sent to carry out. We admire immensely the manner in which he has done it, and we have very little doubt that his policy is much better than that of the Government; but his policy is not that of the Government, and, therefore, I read, with some surprise, this warm eulogium of his conduct, unaccompanied by any indication that his attitude has entirely changed, and that he has, apparently, forced the Government to entirely change their policy at the same time. I hope that upon this point the noble Earl opposite will imitate the candour of the noble Lord who seconded the Address, and will tell us what the policy of Her Majesty's Government is, and whether he will recognize the necessity of keeping Khartoum, and whether, when it has been either successfully defended by General Gordon, or has been relieved, the Government will retain it as a portion of the Egyptian Empire. At all events, if he does not do so, it seems to me that he must revise another part of the policy of Her Majesty's Government. I cannot understand how the proposal to cut off all that is south of Wady Halfa from the territory of Egypt is compatible with the resolution to abandon Egypt to its fate. In the opinion of those who are best qualified to judge of the strategic necessities of those countries—certainly in the opinion of the foremost statesmen and soldiers in Egypt—this territory south of Wady Halfa is of vital importance to the defence of Egypt. If you are going to stay in Egypt to support the Khedive, and to make yourselves permanently responsible for the safety of the country, I do not say that to force her to give up the portion of the Soudan south of Wady Halfa is a wise policy, but at all events it is an intelligible policy; but if you are going first, by exercising an unexampled pressure, to force the Khedive to abandon that which Egyptian statesmen and soldiers believe to be of vital importance to the safety of the country, and then, having cut off that means of defence, to leave Egypt to shift for herself, all I can say is, that the adoption of such a course would exceed in baseness anything that is recorded of a protecting Power. I trust, however, that the noble Earl opposite will be able to tell us that Khar-toum is not to be parted with, or, at least, that Egypt is not to be abandoned to its fate. Then there is another statement with respect to Egypt that has still more of the character of obscurity which attaches generally to Queen's Speeches. It is this—

"In Egypt itself I am using my best endeavours to promote further improvement."

That seems to imply that some improvement has already taken place; but from all accounts received it would appear that not only has no improvement taken place in the affairs of the country, but the retrogression has been steady and conspicuous. The tax-paying powers of the people are lowered, the authority of the Khedive is weakened, and the name of England stands lower in Egypt than ever it did before. Not only has her power diminished, but even the veracity of her statesmen is impugned; and how is it possible, starting from this point, to say—"I am using my best endeavours to promote further improvement?" And then the Speech goes on to say—

"And I have given my support to the Egyptian Government in the difficult financial position in which it has been left through the failure of the recent Conference."

Well, I earnestly hope that if ever Her Majesty's Government has occasion to give me its support in case I am involved in financial difficulties it will be by some more effective means than that which they have given to the Government of Egypt. The only support they have given them is the advice not to pay their debts. That is the beginning and the end of it. That, of course, is very comforting to the creditors; but whether it can be described as supporting a man in pecuniary or financial embarrassments I very much doubt. The Egyptian Government may fairly say—"Call you this backing? A plague on such backing, say I." But, perhaps, we have not heard the whole policy of the Government, and the noble Earl may be able to announce that a large financial subsidy is to be part of the financial means of support which they intend to offer to the Egyptian Government. The concluding statement of this attenuated Speech is in these terms—

I cannot join in that sentiment at all. That the vigilant attention of Her Majesty's Government should have been drawn to anything at all appears to me to be a matter for congratulation. If they had said, "the matter demands my strong intervention," I could have understood it; but this expression of regret because their vigilant attention has been excited gives one an ill opinion of the ordinary mental attitude prevalent in the Government Departments. The ordinary attitude of the Colonial Office is a nirvana, a kind of absorption in itself, a contemplation of its own perfections, a sleep from which it is only aroused by circumstances of an extraordinary character, and from which it emerges with great reluctance and regret. I should hope that, following the noble Lord who seconded the Address in this as in other matters, the noble Earl will say that something more than a vigilant attention will be given to the affairs of the Cape—something of a more solid character. The noble Lord who moved this Address went considerably into the question of the franchise dispute. I hope I may be permitted to say that I am too weary of that question to follow him into the argument. It has not been his pleasure or his pain to discuss that subject as often as I have done; and I hope I may be permitted to refrain from following him until a more legitimate opportunity arises. But, in the course of these voluminous discussions, two things have been said to which I think it desirable to call your Lordships' attention. One of these concerns the mode in which a Minister of the Crown assists in keeping the Queen's peace, which is the first part of his duty; and the other concerns the mode and action of your Lordships' House. I know there is a certain inconvenience here in calling attention to what is said by Mr.

Chamberlain. No doubt, that will also be done "elsewhere;" but his utterances are so exceptional, and so absolutely unprecedented in official history, that I do not think it would be fitting that we should meet here on the first night of the Session to carry our Address to the foot of the Throne without some notice being taken of language which has already, I fear, produced evil results, and may produce still worse results. I know that Her Majesty's Government have a strange theory as to conjoint official responsibility. Their view is that Members of the Government may say and do very much as they like, and that if only they can be brought with difficulty to agree on the precise points at issue before Parliament at the time it is as much harmony as can be expected from them. Even for them, with this lax view of official duty, I am surprised that no remonstrance against the conduct of their Colleague has been heard. At Hanley, on the 7th of October, Mr. Chamberlain said—

"I think that those gentlemen"—

referring to your Lordships—

"presume on your love of order and hatred of violence. These are, no doubt, characteristics of the English people; but unless this generation has lost other qualities, which have made the name of Englishmen respected and honoured throughout the world, they will show courage and resolution."

That is, they presume on your love of order and hatred of violence; but these characteristics are, unless Englishmen have lost their character, to be set aside by a display of "courage and resolution." Is it possible more clearly to indicate that the love of order and hatred of violence are to be abandoned? I trust we shall have some disclaimer from the noble Earl of language which is not only dangerous and injurious to the public peace, but is as discreditable to the Minister who uttered it as to the Ministers who remain his Colleagues. I will now call attention to a less serious matter, and here the observations are not of a dangerous kind. But they say that the highest happiness is to see ourselves as others see us. Well, it must be next door to that happiness to see ourselves as some portions of ourselves see us; and it is interesting to see in what light the proceedings of this House are viewed by some Members of it. A noble Lord opposite (Lord Durham), speaking at Chester-le-Street on the 4th of October, addressing his audience, proceeded to give a fancy sketch of the Conservative Peers. The noble Lord said it was 50 or 60 Peers who formed the majority on the Franchise Bill—

"He wished his audience could have seen some of them. There were old men in skull caps—the lame, the deaf, and the blind. Heaven knew where some of them came from, and he did not know where they would go to. Possibly they might be sent to the British Museum. These devoted gentlemen were the subservient tools and voiceless followers of Lord Salisbury."

Now, this remarkable utterance is, perhaps, more worthy of attention than it otherwise would be, because this noble Lord, I believe, is the only Peer that Mr. Chamberlain has ever eulogized; at all events, he is the Peer that Mr. Chamberlain has held up as a model, and, considering the influence Mr. Chamberlain has on the destinies of the country, we do not know what may happen. Your Lordships have, no doubt, all been delighted by the caricature, showing what this House would be like if it consisted of a multiplication of Home Secretaries; but this extract is interesting as showing what the character of our debates would be, and what the species of language would be that would be employed if, instead of Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Chamberlain had the filling of this House. There would be no skull caps upon the skulls; but what there would be inside the skulls it is too painful to speculate. However, I do not admit that skull caps are peculiar to the Conservative Party. I do not see any. My impression is that a skull cap is peculiar to a noble Lord (Lord Houghton), whom I might at one time have described as the "only poet" in the House. I am not aware that that disgraceful appanage has been seen on any other head. As to the lame, the deaf, and the blind, as far as the Conservative Party is concerned, I deny that there are any lame, deaf, or blind, and I ask the assistance of the noble Lord in pointing them out, if there are any to be found. But my impression is that we can show as good members, ears, and eyes, as the other side. This, however, is merely an exaggerated specimen of the kind of argument rather common on the other side, which I regret. It is an argument of which the purport is that the majority in this House is formed by men of whom a very large proportion are not in ordinary attendance on the debates in this House. I believe that absentee doctrine is wholly unsupported by statistics. I believe, if you allow for the fact that a certain number of Members of this House must be absent through age, you will find the attendance is, on the average, as good as in the House of Commons. But the point on which I wish to remark is that it is not always the critics who are the most virtuous in the matters which they censure. There are some people who, like the sign-post, point to the way they do not themselves go. I asked a friend to examine from the records how often in the year 1883 the Earl of Durham had attended our deliberations, and I find that he did not attend more than five times. That is not a matter of much importance; but I suspect it will be found that if there are such absentees they are equally divided on both sides of the House, and that the Members of this House make as good attendances as Members of the House of Commons. My Lords, the Speech introduces the question of the franchise in the following words:—

"You may be enabled at once to give your further consideration to the great subject of the representation of the people."

Last Session the Franchise Bill was introduced simply as "an enlargement of the Occupation Franchise." I hope there is meaning and significance in the difference of these two expressions. I am not going to express my opinion upon the dispute which prevails. My opinion will be found expressed very accurately in the Resolution adopted by your Lordships in July last. I have nothing to alter in the opinion there expressed. But this statement in the Speech from the Throne leads me to the belief that we have made converts; that Her Majesty's Government, seeing that the representation of the people is really a great subject, that it cannot be dealt with in any imperfect and half-hearted or mutilated fashion, do understand the importance of introducing both a Franchise Bill and a Redistribution Bill, and that they intend to press them forward without any artificial obstacles or interruptions—with all the rapidity that may be—and doing all that in them lies to place them both at the same time on the Statute Book of the Realm. I am quite sure that in any fair and honest efforts made by them they will have the earnest and hearty co-operation of Members of this House.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, notwithstanding the warning of the noble Marquess, I shall endeavour to follow the example of Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech, and be brief in the observations which I have to make. I have listened with considerable amusement to one of the most lively and facetious speeches I have heard for a long time in this House. We have heard of a statesman of a great country talking of the light heart with which he was about to enter into war which proved disastrous to his own country. Abait omen! I must say that the occasion of the meeting of Parliament at this time is not to be met by the Leader of the Conservative Party in that tone of levity which marked his words from the beginning to the end of his speech. My Lords, it has been my happy fate of late years—and I think I can assert that I never paid a compliment that was not sincere—to have been able to compliment the Mover and Seconder of the Address. I entirely join in the remark which the noble Marquess made with respect to the speech which the Mover of the Address gave us. I think it was a remarkable speech. The circumstances of our meeting are remarkable, and the Mover has risen to the importance of the occasion. I listened with great attention and interest to the speech of the noble Lord behind me (Lord Lawrence)—I believe it was his maiden speech—and I must say there was singular grace—and he spoke with a certain authority—when he alluded to the high character of Lord Dufferin and Lord Ripon, considering the honoured name which he bears. But I think it is a pity that the noble Marquess mixed up with the compliments to the Mover and Seconder some misrepresentation of what they said. The noble Marquess said that the Mover had announced the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Redistribution Bill as well as a Franchise Bill. My noble Friend informs me he did not say that it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to do so. But I am not at all sure that he would not have been perfectly justified in saying that. It is only to repeat what we have been saying from the beginning—that we want to deal with the whole question, and in the manner in which we think it is most likely to be carried to a successful end, and that both the Franchise Bill and the Redistribution Bill shall have our most vigilant and urgent attention, and, I would add, mixing it up with the vitality of our existence as a Government in the hope of arriving at a satisfactory result. In answer to the noble Seconder of the Address, the noble Marquess chose as his text that which the noble Seconder did not say at all. He said that my noble Friend insisted that it was our duty to retain Khartoum. My noble Friend said nothing of the kind. What he did say was that he hoped the result of this Expedition would be to leave a strong Government at Khartoum. That promises one thing, and the other another. The things are entirely different, and the noble Marquess did not act fairly to my noble Friend in transposing the observation made by him. The noble Marquess then took upon himself to assert that the Queen's Speech at the beginning of the Session, in only alluding to one measure, and not to others, was entirely without precedent. I think if the noble Marquess looks back he will find that exactly the same thing happened under a Conservative Government, no measure being mentioned except the business they had in hand. The noble Marquess then went on to speak of General Gordon. I do not think it is quite fair to argue with the noble Marquess, because the noble Marquess has not seen all General Gordon's telegrams. It will be the duty of Her Majesty's Government to present them to Parliament, and then your Lordships will find in these telegrams that General Gordon agrees with the policy of Her Majesty's Government. And I must say I was never more disappointed in my life than when the noble Marquess asked how on earth we knew what General Gordon had done? It is exactly in the same deprecating tone that the noble Marquess adopted about General Gordon as soon as he was appointed and was sent out. I maintain that what General Gordon has done is known to England and to Europe, and has excited the most enthusiastic admiration of that genius—which General Gordon is—and yet the noble Marquess says that he does not know anything that General Gordon has done. We have been told day by day that the General was starved; that we were neglecting him; and that he was in the greatest personal danger; but as soon as we get information we find that he is not in personal danger, and that he is victorious instead of being defeated, and that there is every reason why we should expect that the Expedition that has been sent out should be perfectly successful in its object. I must say that the noble Marquess is inconsistent to an extraordinary degree. He bases on our conduct with regard to General Gordon the assumption that we are not going to do anything in order to maintain the Convention agreed to with the Boers the other day, and this after we have actually sent an Expedition to the relief of General Gordon. I decline to argue that matter with the noble Marquess. I think the noble Marquess has got into a careless habit from addressing, during the autumn, enthusiastic audiences who cheered whatever he said. [Opposition cheers.] I can understand that cheer. No doubt, they would cheer whatever he said—whether it was correct or incorrect they were equally delighted and enthusiastic. The next question is with regard to the Transvaal. Among all the facetiae of the noble Marquess, on what appears to me a most solemn occasion, he told us a story about an Irishman who included in his assets his debts. But I have heard of another Irish gentleman who, when he paid his debt to Nature, left to his sorrowing friends the melancholy duty of discharging his other obligations. I think this sentiment somewhat applies to the criticism of the noble Marquess with regard to South Africa. Did the late Government, or not, when they paid their debt to Nature, leave to their Successors the duty of discharging various liabilities of the severest character in South Africa? Then, what was the remainder of his speech? It was the continuation of that long autumnal duel which the noble Marquess carried on with Mr. Chamberlain during the Recess. It is not for me to defend Mr. Chamberlain, who is well able to do that for himself. It is not likely that I should share in his appreciation of the House of Lords, though I am bound to say, when the noble Marquess refers personally to me to know whether there are blind and lame and deaf to be found among your Lordships, I have to make the melancholy confession that I am somewhat deaf, and that I am sometimes lame; but I hope to keep my eyes a little longer. The noble Marquess insisted on our responsibility for everything that Mr. Chamberlain may have said. I remember that Lord Beaconsfield disclaimed any responsibility for what any Member of his Government might say on such occasions; and yet the noble Marquess demands that we should be responsible for every word a Member of the Government may say in any part of the country. May I ask, is the noble Marquess ready to endorse every epithet and every expression used by the Leaders of the Conservative Party?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I am only responsible for myself.

EARL GRANVILLE: Well, then, I ask the noble Marquess whether, after cool reflection, he would take upon himself the responsibility of the many offensive epithets he has applied to Her Majesty's Government during the autumn? When you complain of violent language on the part of others, you must consider whether you have yourself contributed to that violence and strength of language, and whether you are not the person who gave powder and shot for those discharges which have been made. The noble Marquess has said hardly anything about the Franchise Bill—the object of this Session. The absence of all remark in his speech is so striking, that I think I had better not make some remarks, which otherwise, I believe, would not be without justification with regard to this great subject. If the noble Marquess prefers adjourning all discussion on the question until the Franchise Bill comes before the House I will submit to his decision. I think, when that Bill does come before the House, your Lordships will be prepared to discuss it in that spirit and manner which were so eloquently described by the noble Lord who moved the Address.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, before the discussion on Her Majesty's Speech closes, I should like to say two or three words upon that short paragraph which refers to South Africa. My noble Friend the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury)

commented not unfairly upon the grammatical structure of the sentences in question. I wish rather to call the attention of the noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies (the Earl of Derby) somewhat to the substance of the case. My noble Friend will remember—and I should wish the House to remember as far as possible—that, in this question of South Africa, there are no less than three distinct subjects involved—there is the case of the Bechuanas, the case of the Zulus, and also the case of the Transvaal; and I will take the liberty of commenting very briefly indeed upon these three subjects. I wish I could say that there was anything of a redeeming character about any one of them; but everything respecting them appears at this moment to be as dark as can be; and I am at a loss to understand where it will all lead to. I think it will require all the dexterity of my noble Friend, and every effort he can put forward, to extricate us from our present dangerous and difficult position. It has been said that my noble Friend succeeded to an inheritance of difficulty. But I am bound to say that, during the last year, the difficulties have in no respect diminished. It is impossible to conceive a more unsatisfactory condition than that which exists in South Africa at this moment. The power of England, which, only a few years ago, was unquestioned and unquestionable, has been shaken, if not materially lessened. There is antagonism to us on the part of the Natives; so far as the English population is concerned there is the deepest indignation and a tendency to alienation from this country; and with regard to the Dutch I wish to point out, what is known to all familiar with the case, that the movement in favour of Dutch nationality, so to say, has acquired a growth and an influence which are wholly novel. During the last few years, the Dutch language has become the official language of the Colony. I again repeat, as it is a matter of the greatest importance to this country, that the Dutch influence, nationality, and power have increased to a degree that may well complicate matters. I do not wish to enter into any subjects of debate at this moment; but I cannot avoid saying that all those difficulties which we witness now, and those with which we are threatened hereafter, are clearly traceable and owing to that unfortunate transaction at Majuba Hill, and to the Convention which followed and was founded upon it. There is no man who looks back upon past circumstances who does not feel that from that moment the whole of our difficulties, both with regard to the Dutch and with regard to the Transvaal, began. There is one other point of a difficult nature. The condition of the Natives seems to me to be as deplorable as anything possibly could be, and that lamentable condition has gradually increased during the past few months, both as regards the Zulus and the Bechuanas. As regards the Bechuanas, a few years ago you had a civilized, a contented, a Christian, and an improving population; and I can safely say that during the time I had the honour of holding the Seals of the Colonial Office there were no accounts which we received from any part of the world which were more full of satisfaction and of promise than those from the Bechuana territory. I constantly felt and said that, whatever might be the work which England was doing in other parts of the world, there, at least, was satisfactory progress and fair promise for the future. But these unfortunate people have been handed over to the Boers, and the contentment and prosperity which existed have been utterly blown to the winds. I may go further, and take the case of the Zulus. In former years the wise and benevolent efforts of Sir Theophilus Shepstone produced a great improvement in the Zulu country, and a state of content and prosperity, leading the Natives on step by step to a higher condition, and preparing them for something better, which, even under Cetewayo, was not removed. But during the past 12 months all that has been changed. Freebooters have gone into their territory, and those unfortunate people, whom we disarmed, whose power we overthrew, and for whom we were in honour pledged, have been handed over to the tender mercies of the Boers, without the slightest satisfactory promise for their security. With regard to the Transvaal itself, we have had, during the past few weeks, a pretty good illustration of the feeling which exists in the Transvaal towards this country. It is a feeling of absolute contempt for England. They have departed from, if not from every one, at least the last two or three Conventions into which they entered, and the violation of their engagements has been followed by violent and brutal outrages upon those tribes and Chiefs to whom, as I conceive, our honour is pledged, and upon those British officers who have been brought into more or less official relations with them. There is the brutal murder of Mr. Bethell. I do not know whether the Colonial Office has full details of that murder; but I hope that, when the Papers which are promised appear, such details as the Government may possess will be fully and frankly given in them. I have heard stories so bad, so varied, and outrageous, that I hesitate to give credence to them. If they are true, it should be made known; and if not, it is equally fair to the Transvaal authorities that that fact should be stated. I hope all the Papers promised to us will contain full details, because I fail, at present, to understand how the case stands. A little time ago, it was announced, apparently on authority, that the Cape Government were acting with us in this matter; but since then we have been told that Sir Charles Warren has received orders to proceed to South Africa. But against that statement we are again told, in the language of the Speech from the Throne, that the Government is acting in conjunction with the Cape Government in this matter. Now, what I wish to know is, what the Cape Government has undertaken to do, and what we have undertaken to do; how far the Cape Government have undertaken to support us by forcible means, if necessary; and how far they are merely carrying on the position of negotiators at this moment? I also wish to understand, and I hope the Papers will show it, what Sir Hercules Robinson has said, done, and advised on this subject. It is notorious that he has laid the greatest stress upon the organization of a police force on the borders. In his opinion, the one essential condition of the success of the last Convention with the Transvaal rested upon this—that there should be an adequate police force on the borders. I do not believe that that police force has ever come into existence; but, if it has, it has in such small numbers as to be of no use whatever, being utterly inadequate for the duties it has to perform. I hope my noble Friend will tell us what has been the cause and reason of the delay in this matter. I rejoiced, with a great many persons in England, when I heard that Mr. Mackenzie was appointed Commissioner upon this frontier. I knew his past character, his clearness of mind, his perfect familiarity with the whole subject, and his disinterested devotion to the Native Races among whom he has worked so long; and I feel that his appointment was a strong earnest of, and security for, the carrying out of that policy for which we have had so many assurances. Well, Mr. Mackenzie proceeded to his station. He discharged his duties for a while; but before long he met with remonstrances and opposition, and, at last, such active antagonism on the part of the Boers, that he was compelled to retire. I hope it will be made perfectly clear what are the circumstances under which he retired. I notice, in a speech delivered by the Prime Minister of the Cape, that the blame for his retirement was thrown on the Government. I hope the noble Earl will be able to contradict that statement. Then there is another point upon which I will say one word. It is not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, though it is connected with South Africa. My noble Friend behind me (Viscount Sidmouth) last Session repeatedly called the attention of your Lordships to the case of Angra Pequena, and I supported him, urging repeatedly upon Her Majesty's Government the extreme importance of acting speedily and without delay, and warned them that, if delay did occur, very unsatisfactory conclusions would result. My prophecy has come true; and, while the Foreign Office was negotiating, it appears that Germany stepped in and occupied the ground which was the matter of dispute. I am not here to make any charge against the German Government. We have no Papers as yet before us on the subject; and I may go further, and say the more I know of German colonization, I am not at all jealous of it, but am rather favourable to it. But what I do complain of is, that this matter should have been allowed to drag on in such a way that this issue should be forced upon us, and that, without our knowledge or power of protest, we should have been forced into a seeming collision with the German Government, and that, as we know, a Conference should have been invited to assemble at Berlin to discuss South African affairs. I hope it will be made perfectly clear to us on what terms we are going to enter that Conference, and how far English interests may be prejudiced in the transaction. There is one other question which, I think, might have found a place in the Speech from the Throne. Her Majesty's Government began their career with every protest against the annexation of territory; but I think that during the four or five years that they have been in Office they have annexed more territory than any two other Governments which have preceded them. My noble Friend, to whom I know annexations of territory are peculiarly distasteful, has now taken a step in this direction, and within the past few weeks has announced, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, the annexation of the whole of the Southern Coast of New Guinea. I am not prepared to say that that is in any degree a faulty decision on the part of the Government; on the contrary, I should be much disposed to approve of it, and I have recommended it on former occasions; but I do hope that we shall have some Papers laid on the Table with regard to this matter, which, to my mind, is of sufficient importance to have deserved mention in the Speech from the Throne, both as regards the amount of territory added to the British Empire, and the important Australian interests which are involved. As far as my memory serves me, the original desire of our annexation or Protectorate of New Guinea arose out of the position of the Natives requiring protection, not on the Southern Coast of New Guinea, but on the North-Eastern Coast. Now, it does seem rather strange that when you are annexing a large territory, that you should annex that which was never asked for, and omit altogether that which was the origin of the question of annexation. I do not desire to go into any further questions, as, no doubt, during the Session, other opportunities of discussing them will occur; but I desire to ask my noble Friend for some explanations on the points I have raised, and I hope that Papers will be produced without delay dealing as fully as possible with the points to which I have called attention.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: Before the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby)

risers to reply, I wish to put a question to him. As I understand the last despatch which has been written by the noble Earl with reference to Zululand, the steps to be taken for the defence of the Reserve are not to extend to measures outside the Reserve. I observe that the noble Earl takes no notice of the fact mentioned by Sir Henry Bulwer, that the Reserve Territory had been three or four times invaded by Zulus, who were supported by Boers in possession of the adjacent territory. I want to know whether the noble Earl is going to produce Papers telling us the present position of the Boers in Zululand, and what action is to be taken to prevent any such inroads upon the Reserve? I wish to ask whether the noble Earl takes upon himself to instruct officers in charge of the Reserve that, when they are attacked, they are not to be allowed to follow those who attack them into adjoining territory? It seems to me to be a most extraordinary position that we should allow our territory to be invaded three or four times, and that we should not take any steps to prevent these inroads by going outside them, when that would be the most likely course to put an end to them. Surely, it is most inexcusable that our officers should be told that they are not to go beyond the boundaries of the Reserve. There is, at all events, a doubt about it; and if the noble Earl gives permission to the strategical authorities to take steps to prevent these invasions, I have nothing more to say.

THE EARL OF DERBY: One complaint which has been made in the course of this debate is as to the number of omissions from the Queen's Speech. I think my noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon), in the questions he has put, has contrived very ingeniously to supply those omissions. He has travelled over a wide range of topics, and if I were to attempt to follow into the wide range of subjects he has invited me to discuss, I should have to address your Lordships at greater length than would be desirable or convenient at present. I do not think anyone can complain of my noble Friend for thinking that the question of South Africa is one which should be brought before the House without delay, although it is not so exciting a topic as some of those with which we shall have to deal. It is not one that has been much dealt with by speakers in the Recess. Still, it is one of great importance, and I am not going to make the pretence of believing that the state of things in that part of the world is satisfactory. It has not been satisfactory at any time I can remember since I have entered upon public life; but I do not admit the soundness of the view taken by the noble Earl when he represents it as growing worse instead of better. He quite correctly divides the question into three different heads—our relations with the Transvaal, our relations to Zululand, and our relations with the Bechuanas; but he did not mention what a year ago might have been counted as a fourth—namely, our relations with Basutoland; and as in that part of the country the state of things was one of great danger, and it is now one of peace and tranquillity, I can quite understand that it would not suit the noble Earl to bring it forward. He asks where we are drifting to; he thinks our difficulties have not diminished, but increased; that the power of England in South Africa is diminishing; and that the antagonism between the Dutch and the English is greater than it has ever been before. That is a general assertion which it is very difficult either to prove or to disprove. He has given his view, and I will give mine. In answer to his first question, where are we drifting to, I say nowhere; we know perfectly well where we are going. With regard to his second question, the difficulties have not increased, but diminished. I do not know what he means by saying that the power of England is destroyed or broken.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I did not say that. I said it was lessened or weakened.

THE EARL OF DERBY: Well, that is a matter of opinion; and I will point out that whereas, some years ago, the Colonists in Natal were in constant fear of what might happen to them in the way of attack or incursion from the Zulus on their frontier, their apprehensions on that score have ceased. There is now no part of Natal or Cape Colony which is disaffected to the Imperial Government, or in danger of any attack. The noble Earl speaks of the antagonism of the Dutch and English races. Well, that is an old story. No one knows better than he does that there has been a certain amount of antagonism probably ever since the English occupied any part of the Continent; but I do not think there is any reason to suppose that it has been increased or embittered by recent events. It is quite true that at the Cape there is what is called a Dutch Party, and that it is now in power; but it has gained its power in a Constitutional way at the elections; it is using that power, as far as I can see, in a fair and moderate manner, and there can be no interference on our part, unless we are to say that the Cape Colony is not to be free to govern itself in a Parliamentary manner. With regard to our relations with the Zulus, I do not think my noble Friend has fairly represented the state of affairs in the country, when he speaks as if the present Government are responsible for what has happened. No doubt, there was a time when the Zulu nation, under Cetewayo, was more prosperous and powerful than at present; but who was responsible for putting an end to that state of things? Not the present Government, nor anyone on this side of the House. It was done in 1879; but I am bound to say I do not think it was the work of the Colonial Office, then administered by Sir Michael Hicks-Beach. Sir Bartle Frere took a very decided view of the dangers which were supposed to arise from the power of Cetewayo, and he undertook to break it. A war ensued; the Zulu Kingdom was broken up; and it has never been placed, nor could it be placed, on the same footing again. What followed, not by way of permanent settlement, but rather as a temporary and provisional arrangement, was the division of the country among 13 Chiefs. At the time, that arrangement was probably as good as could be made; but after a time it became clear it would not last; the Chiefs would have been fighting one another; it was broken up, and its breaking up was followed by the restoration of Cetewayo. I have heard that restoration criticized in various ways. It has been described as a sentimental concession to the wishes of some parties in this country. It was nothing of the kind. In a position of great difficulty, it was resorted to in the hope that peace and order might be restored to Zululand by placing over the country the one man who was supposed to have most authority there. I am not at all clear it would have failed if Cetewayo had not been got at and surrounded by certain persons, who put into his head absurd and exaggerated ideas about his grievances and his rights, so that almost from the first moment of his restoration he began to seek extension of territory, and the effect was that the arrangement under which he was restored never had a fair chance. Had it not been for that, he might, at least, have gained something of his former position. When he died, there appeared to be only two practical alternatives—either to take upon ourselves a Protectorate amounting to virtual annexation, or to leave the Zulus to settle their own affairs. We did the last, not thinking it desirable, except under the pressure of absolute necessity, to extend the range of our power. Annexation, no doubt, would have been the more popular course at Natal and the Cape; but it would have involved the provision of a large force sufficient to protect Natal from the danger of invasion. Unfortunately, it is true, as the noble Earl has said, that these savage tribes were divided among themselves; they began to fight, and that happened which has happened before in many parts of the world, the party that got the worst of it sought allies; they called in the Boers, who accepted the invitation, and occupied the territory, not as invaders, but as allies. I do not know that they are any worse neighbours than the Zulus would have had otherwise, or than they were to one another. There was, as I have said, no choice between the two alternatives—either of taking the country under our control, the responsibility of which would have been enormous, while the territory would have been useless to us for the purposes of trade or immigration or any other object, or of leaving it; and the Government have done the latter. With regard to the Transvaal, I will not go beyond the point of time at which I am responsible for the condition of affairs. We have so often discussed the question of its retrocession and our defeat at Majuba Hill that I do not think there is much use in going over it again. There may be differences of opinion as to whether the retrocession was satisfactory or not; but after the experience of late years, knowing what we now know of Boer feeling, you cannot indulge the idea that the Transvaal could have been kept as a part of the British Empire except by a constant display of force. The question, I remember, was asked two years ago, and it never has been answered. What is the advantage of creating for yourselves another Ireland in South Africa? There would have been constant rebellions, which could only have been kept down by military force, and difficulties would have been created for us, and a display of force required, just at the moment we required our resources in some other part of the world. The noble Earl has spoken of the Natives generally, and more especially in the Transvaal, and of their present condition as regards ill-usage, and I am not at all prepared to assert that it is all that we could wish it to be. At the same time, that ill-usage does not arise from anything we have said or done. My noble Friend made a speech upon the same subject some 18 months ago. It has been alleged that there has been ill-usage and oppression on the part of the Boers. It is, of course, utterly impossible to say that in a country as large as France, where there is only a small and scattered White population, there may not have been cases of ill-usage by the Whites. But the fact remains, and there is no doubt about it, that the Black population of the Transvaal is constantly on the increase, and that there is a continual Native immigration going on into that country, which does not look as if the condition of the people were one of suffering and oppression. My noble Friend referred to Bechuanaland. Now, I am not going to deny that the state of things which has arisen there is one of a very unsatisfactory character. I think that the reference to this subject in the Speech from the Throne shows that the Government are not guilty of neglect or indifference with respect to this question; and when they say the circumstances of the country require their attention, it is scarcely fair to assume that they mean to look on and do nothing. Attention in such a case can only mean attention with a view to action. My noble Friend has asked for an explanation as to what has passed in regard to Bechuanaland between ourselves and the Government of the Cape, and he has referred to statements in the newspapers to the effect that Her Majesty's Government were making military preparations. All I need say now is that Her Majesty's Government are fully determined to carry out the terms of the Convention—they must be enforced, and the steps which have been taken will show that Her Majesty's Government are proceeding upon that footing; but, no doubt, my noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) will wish—as we do—that the matter should be settled in a peaceful manner; and, as the Cape Government have expressed their wish to negotiate, Her Majesty's Government have telegraphed out that they are content that they should do so, and that the Cape Government are to carry on their negotiations; but, in so saying, Her Majesty's Government are not parting with their control over the ultimate result, and will remain the judges, in the last resort, of what should be done. My noble Friend asks whether the Government of the Cape will supply a military force? I do not think they will supply either men or money. I think they will be content to put that on our shoulders, leaving us to our own resources; but, undoubtedly, they will give us a moral support, which means a great deal in a case of this kind. I do not think that is an unnatural view for them to take, as they would say it is as much our matter as theirs. There is no doubt in my mind that they are anxious to put an end to this unpleasant complication. Then my noble Friend asks what is the object we look to—what is to be the ultimate result of these proceedings? I am quite ready to tell my noble Friend and your Lordships what I consider is the result likely to be obtained with regard to Bechuanaland, and which I do not think could have been obtained 18 months ago—namely, that the Cape Government will be induced to make that country a part of the Cape Colony. This course would save us from further expense and responsibility, and put these unfortunate people under a civilized Government. With regard to Mr. Mackenzie's appointment and subsequent resignation, I will refer my noble Friend to the papers which will be presented. I will only say now that I do not attach blame to Mr. Mackenzie in any part of these transactions. He was appointed on the strong recommendation of Sir Hercules Robinson; but after some observation of the working of Mr. Mackenzie's arrangements Sir Hercules Robinson, without casting any blame upon Mr. Mackenzie, thought it unlikely that his system would lead to a satisfactory settlement; and as the Cape Government looked upon his appointment with considerable jealousy, and as the co-operation of the Cape authorities was indispensable, Sir Hercules Robinson thought that Mr. Mackenzie's resignation was desirable, and Mr. Mackenzie, showing a creditable public spirit, at once acquiesced. When the details are seen in the Papers to be presented, your Lordships will see that no blame is attached to any party concerned. The noble Viscount (Viscount Cranbrook) has asked a question in reference to the Reserve Territory, and whether Her Majesty's Government will protect it; and the answer is that they will do so, and will regard any attack upon it as an attack against Natal itself; but as to following over the frontier those who attack it, I have not laid down any general rule upon the subject, and I do not think it necessary to do so. My noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) has also asked a question in reference to Angra Pequena. That is a large question, and cannot be discussed in an off-hand manner; and, notwithstanding the high authority of some noble Lords, who attach great value to it as a possession, I believe that it is one of the most barren spots on the face of the earth, and though for 50 or 60 years English settlers have had free access to it, there has been no attempt to make any settlement upon it. I do not know that the Germans have taken steps to colonize it; and, certainly, it is not a very promising field for that purpose.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK, interposing, inquired whether any more Papers would be presented?

THE EARL OF DERBY: Papers relating to Zululand and Bechuanaland will be laid upon the Table. My noble Friend made reference, in a general way, to the subject of annexation. Well, it is quite true that some annexations have been forced upon us. There seems to be a scramble going on among European Governments for Colonies in different parts of the world, and Her Majesty's Government were bound to make our position secure in those localities in which this country is interested. If Her Maesty's Government had not acquiesced in the demand on the part of the Australians for a Protectorate over the Southern Coast of New Guinea, our refusal would have been deeply resented by all the Australian Colonies; and, on the whole, we thought it better to run the risk of some jealousy on the part of Foreign Powers, than to quarrel with our Colonists in a matter in which they are so deeply interested, and on which they feel so strongly. We have, accordingly, secured that part of the Coast from which alone they would have reason to apprehend danger, if it were in the hands of a Foreign Power.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY said, that he desired to ask whether it was true, as stated in the newspapers, that General Scratchley had been appointed High Commissioner to New Guinea?

THE EARL OF DERBY: Yes.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY said, he wished to know whether he had been appointed High Commissioner simply with reference to New Guinea; and, if so, whether there was any High Commissioner of the Pacific?

THE EARL OF DERBY: As a matter of fact, the papers have been a little premature, for the appointment has not yet been actually made; but I have no hesitation in saying that Major General Scratchley is selected for the post. As to the precise functions he will have to perform, I cannot undertake to define them accurately off-hand and in a few words; but the noble Earl will find them described in the Papers, when they are laid upon the Table of the House.

LORD BRABOURNE said, he felt bound to express the satisfaction which he experienced at the declaration of the Government of their intention to stand by the latest arrangement made with reference to the Transvaal. If they had evinced a similar firmness three years ago, and had maintained it in deeds as well as words, much of the subsequent disaster, bloodshed, and misery would have been avoided. If the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) supposed that the name and reputation of England had not been lowered by the policy which had been followed by Her Majesty's Government, he was the only man in the Kingdom with any knowledge of South Africa who entertained that opinion; for, of late years, the influence of Great Britain in South Africa had greatly diminished. He was frequently receiving letters from South Africa concerning the state of affairs there, and it appeared that the name of Great Britain was mentioned with expressions of contempt, and that Englishmen were no longer, as formerly, considered as the superior race. The noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) had spoken of the freedom of Natal from her old dread of the Zulus; but he would do well to bear in mind that Natal had been threatened with absorption from the Boers, who considered that they had conquered Englishmen and could do as they liked for the future. They had rebelled against Great Britain as soon as she had overcome their enemies, Sikukuni and the Zulus, and it was from them that trouble was still to be apprehended. He rejoiced, however, to find that the Cape Government, which now was mainly composed of the Dutch element, were giving Her Majesty's Government a hearty support in the course they were taking in maintaining the Convention and protecting the Reserve. It was perhaps, moreover, a good thing that the Dutch element should now preponderate in the Cape Government, or that those who had for years past only held the balance between two contending British Parties should now themselves experience some of the responsibilities of government. The prosperity of the Cape Colony depended upon a good feeling being maintained between the Dutch and English elements of the population, and that good feeling would not be increased, but retarded, by any want of firmness on the part of Her Majesty's Government in relation to the latest Convention with the Boers, and by any failure to show beyond all doubt that we were not going to be bullied and shouldered out of South Africa.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, I rise simply for the purpose of occupying the attention of the House for a moment with reference to a document, which, at first sight, may seem to be, but which I do not think is, irrelevant to any subject before us. Like many other Members of this House, I have come up from a great distance, involving two days' travelling, and I have not had an opportunity of reading a very interesting letter until this evening. But I may observe that our marvellous and almost supernatural Prime Minister, if I may say so, has taken the time and trouble to address a letter to a Bishop, at a Diocesan Conference of the Church of England, on the subject of the Disestablishment of the Church of England. It was not until to-night, when I went into your Lordships' Library, that I had an opportunity of reading that remarkable address. I read it with immense delight. It pointed out that there was in the Church of England a great variety of opinion which might develop into serious and dangerous disagreements. It pointed out the absolute duty of all Parties in the Church to look upon each other with charity, and it especially pointed out the duty of endeavouring to measure the difference of opinion which really existed among themselves. Admirable advice! I read it with infinite pleasure. I could not help asking myself—"Has it no application to other subjects?" I confess that it appears to me that the State of England is in a more serious dilemma than the Church of England at the present moment; and I could not help thinking that if the Heads of the rival Parties would look at the differences which separated them, on the great question on which we are mainly met, in the spirit of that advice of the Prime Minister, in which the Church of England was told of its absolute duty to look at their internal differences, the deadlock into which we have been driven would not last a week. My Lords, let me simply ask the House to remember this—Both Parties profess, and I believe with truth, to admit the absolute necessity, if not the justice, of extending the household franchise to the county voters. That is one great truth or principle on which we are all agreed. The other principle also in which we profess to believe, and I hope with equal truth, is that the question of redistribution should also be dealt with in this present Parliament, and in the constituencies with their present voters, and distributed in their present form. I sit down by saying this—that if any being from another planet, or even from a distant country of the world, from Europe or Asia, were brought to this country and were told that the two Houses of Parliament were coming to a deadlock, and that the fundamental principles of our historic Constitution were called in question, because the only difference was one of procedure, he would be amazed, and he would say that the Leaders of the two Parties were demented. I say that the entire difference between the two Parties being one of procedure only, there ought to be no difficulty whatever in arriving at a satisfactory solution of the problem before us.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN said, that he rose for the purpose of asking Her Majesty's Government what was the specific object of the Expedition which had been sent out, nominally for the purpose of relieving General Gordon? It had been asserted, on the one hand, that it was to stop when it reached Dongola; and, on the other, that it was to go to Khartoum; and he would like to know whether the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Wolseley) had instructions not to go beyond Dongola, even though it might be considered necessary? As it was, they were completely in the dark as to the object of the Expedition. All they knew was that the Mission of General Gordon was to arrange for the evacuation of the Soudan, and to bring away the garrisons, and to provide for the safety of the Europeans and the Egyptians who were in that part of the Khedive's Dominions. Was the Expedition now in progress sent to enable General Gordon to carry out those objects, or solely to relieve General Gordon himself? He must also complain of the omission from the Queen's Speech of all reference to the unsatisfactory state of our Navy, with regard to which public anxiety had been greatly excited, as well as of all reference to the depression of trade and commerce. He begged to give Notice that on an early day he should call attention to the subject of the depression of trade and commerce, and should move that an inquiry be instituted into the causes and extent of that depression.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that one of the questions asked by the noble Earl (the Earl of Dunraven), that which related to the object of the Egyptian Expedition, was completely answered in the Queen's Speech, in the following words:—

"The advance of my troops to Dongola has for its object the rescue and security of that gallant officer, and of those who have so faithfully co-operated with him."

That meant that the object of the Expedition was not merely to rescue General Gordon, but to do what was the original purpose of his Mission—namely, to rescue the garrisons. In carrying out his Mission, General Gordon had been, on the whole, successful; but not to the extent of being able to bring away the garrisons from the Soudan by his own exertions merely. In reply to the noble Earl's question, whether the Expedition would advance beyond Dongola, everyone would be rejoiced if the object of the Expedition were accomplished without its going beyond that place; but, if it were not accomplished, it might have to proceed further. It was not to be supposed that a man of Lord Wolseley's eminence would be sent out without power to take all the measures he might find necessary for the attainment of the objects of the Expedition. With regard to the Notice which the noble Earl had given in reference to trade and commerce, he was not going to enter into a discussion of the question on that occasion. He believed his noble Friend entertained strong Protectionist ideas.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: No; I do not.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Well, his noble Friend called it Reciprocity, which was only Protection under another name. The Government were fully aware that for some considerable time the trade and commerce, and also the agriculture of this country, had been by no means in the state of prosperity of former times; but, on the other hand, to say that there was an extraordinary and special depression peculiar to this country would be an entire mistake. Whatever the causes, it was a singular fact that this depression existed, not only in this country, but all over the world. In France agricultural depression existed equally as in this country. At that moment the French Government were under great pressure from the peasant proprietors on account of the extreme depression; even in the United States the agriculturists were by no means in a state of exaltation at the prevailing prices. The same might be said of the sugar trade, and of almost every other trade abroad. It was also said that the tea trade had never been in such a bad state as it was at present. Without attempting to discuss abstract principles of political economy, he might suggest that one explanation of the cause of this general depression of trade and commerce was to be found in the fact that production had overrun consumption, because, owing to railways and telegraphs, there was an immense increase of power in bringing commodities to market. He did not think it was necessary for the Government to call special attention to the state of trade and commerce; and, as to agriculture, he was not aware that there was such an extraordinary depression as to require any reference in the Speech from the Throne.

Address agreed to, nomine dissentiens, and ordered to be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

AUSTRALIA—CONFEDERATION OF THE COLONIES.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON asked, If Her Majesty's Government intended to introduce a Bill, in accordance with the decision of the Australian Colonies as to Confederation, in the present Session?

THE EARL OF DERBY, in reply, said, he was glad this subject had been mentioned. It was, no doubt, one of extreme interest to the Australian Colonies. He was, however, unable, at the present moment, to answer the Question of the noble Earl, because they had not yet received the reply of the Government of New South Wales; but they had reason to believe that they would receive it in about a week or 10 days. If the answer was a favourable one, he should have no objection to introduce a Bill in that House, and, no doubt, there would be time to discuss it; but whether it would be possible to discuss it in "another place" he could not undertake to say.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES.

The Earl of REDESDALE appointed, nomine dissentiens, to take the Chair in all Committees of this House for this Session.

SUB-COMMITTEE FOR THE JOURNALS—Appointed.

MOTION.

RESOLUTION.

MR. SPEAKER read the following Sessional Order:—

"That the Commissioners of the Police of the Metropolis do take care that, during the Session of Parliament, the passages through the streets leading to this House be kept free and open, and that no obstruction be permitted to hinder the passage of Members to and from this House, and that no disorder be allowed in Westminster Hall, or in the passages leading to this House, during the sitting of Parliament, and that there be no annoyance therein or thereabouts; and that the Serjeant at Arms attending this House do communicate this Order to the Commissioners aforesaid."

Question proposed, "That this House doth agree to the said Sessional Order."

MR. CHAPLIN: If any apology were needed on my part for intruding between the House and the adoption of this Order, which you, Sir, have just put from the Chair, I think I should be able to find it in certain circumstances which occurred during last Session, and which probably many hon. Gentlemen will remember. It will be in the recollection of the House that grave complaints were made one day last Session by certain hon. Members of the obstruction which they had encountered, on the day of the Radical Demonstration in support of the Franchise Bill, in endeavouring to take their places in this House. I myself, on that occasion, ventured to put a Question to the Secretary of State for the Home Department on the subject; and I asked him whether it was with the sanction of the Government, directly or indirectly, that this Sessional Order of the House of Commons had been violated, as it undoubtedly had been violated, on that occasion. Well, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman, in his most jocose manner, replied that it was certainly not with the sanction of the Government, and that, as far as he was aware, the Order had not been violated at all. I may mention that I had previously informed the right hon. Gentleman, in the few observations I made on that occasion, that I myself had encountered such obstruction in my endeavour to pass through Parliament Street to the House of Commons, that I was absolutely defeated in the endeavour, and that unless I had been a Member of St. Stephen's Club, from which establishment there happens to be a subterraneous passage, I should have been unable on that afternoon to take my seat in the House of Commons at all. I thought that the reply of the right hon. Gentleman was so unsatisfactory, that it threw such discredit on my statement, and was so exceedingly wanting in the courtesy I had expected from the right hon. Gentleman, that I gave Notice that I would take the earliest opportunity of calling attention to this question; and it appears to me that the Motion now made from the Chair is a proper and fitting opportunity for me to take that course. The Secretary of State for the Home Department, in the statement he made, explained, in some detail, the precautions he had taken. In order to make my case good, I will ask the kind attention of the House for a few minutes, and I hope I may not detain hon. Members longer. In the first place, I ask the kind attention and consideration of the House to the terms of the Sessional Order, and, secondly, to what actually occurred. The House has heard put from the Chair the Order passed last year, and which it is asked to pass again to-night; and perhaps I may be allowed to point out that these words occur—

"It is ordered that the Commissioners of the Police of the Metropolis do take care that, during the Session of Parliament, the passages through the streets leading to this House be kept free and open, and that no obstruction be permitted to hinder the passage of Members to and from this House."

The Order put from the Chair does not say that "little," but that "no" obstruction shall be permitted to hinder the passage of Members to and from this House. Nothing can be more definite or more clear than the instructions contained in that Order. And now let me call attention to what happened in this case. The procession assembled on the Victoria Embankment, and it proceeded from thence along the Embankment, round Bridge Street, down Parliament Street, through Whitehall, and so on to Pall Mall; so that a Member of Parliament who found himself in the particular locality in London between the Victoria Embankment and Parliament Street was absolutely precluded, unless he could force his way through the procession, from taking his seat in the House that afternoon. That was what actually happened to myself. I happened to have business which required me to be between Parliament Street and the Embankment, and when I attempted to cross Parliament Street I found it absolutely impossible. Now, there is no doubt whatever as to the route taken by the procession on that occasion, and no doubt whatever as to its effect upon Members who found themselves in that part of London; and it is upon those facts that I base my case—first, that the Order was distinctly violated; and, secondly, that it was owing to neglect of duty on the part of the present Secretary of State for the Home Department. I should like to ask him this question. Why was the procession permitted to go by that route at all? The natural and convenient course for the procession was by Northumberland Avenue. And why was it permitted to go half-a-mile or a mile out of its way, in order that it might pass by the House of Commons? The right hon. Gentleman told us he had no right to dictate what course that procession should take. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: Hear hear!] The right hon. Gentleman says "Hear, hear!" and I quite agree with him on that point; but allow me to remind him that he had the right, and that it was his positive duty, to dictate what course the procession should not take, if that course entailed a positive breach of the Sessional Orders of the House of Commons. It is all the more necessary for me to call attention to this subject to-day when we consider some recent proceedings which have occurred in connection with public meetings on the part of some of the supporters of the right hon. Gentleman. I suppose the right hon. Gentleman is as well aware as any Member of the House of the blackguardly proceedings that occurred at Birmingham the other day, which are popularly, and, I believe, truly, supposed to have originated with and been conducted by the "Caucus," with which body a distinguished Member of the present Government, the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain), it is popularly rumoured, is more or less connected. But if he be connected with it or not, he has certainly, in no adequate terms, condemned, if it cannot be truly said that he has attempted to palliate, and be the semi-apologist for, its proceedings. Then, this morning and yesterday we have read of the occurrences at Dumfries the other day. Such is the extreme chivalry of some of the Liberal supporters of the present Government, that a dastardly outrage upon Lord Salisbury was suffered to occur, although he was accompanied at the time by ladies in his carriage. As we are informed, there was neither hesitation nor scruple on the part of members of the Liberal Party in committing a most outrageous assault upon the noble Lord. Then, I say, as it is becoming more and more clear every day that there is an evident intention and determination on the part of some of the members of the Liberal Party to use whatever violence and intimidation they can in connection with this question, it is the more necessary that we should have a clear and distinct understanding in regard to any future processions which may take place in the neighbourhood of the House of Commons. I want to have a distinct and explicit understanding from the Secretary of State for the Home Department as to whether this Sessional Order, which we are asked to place on our Journals, is to be a reality in the future or only a farce? I contend that, owing to his action last Session, it was on that occasion absolutely nothing but a farce, and I want a distinct statement from him that nothing of the kind will be allowed to occur in the future. If we do not get such an assurance, it will become a question whether it is desirable to have any Order of this kind upon the Journals at all. It is quite clear that it is highly objectionable to vest powers in the hands of a Secretary of State for the Home Department, who would not hesitate to enforce them on one occasion and to refrain from doing so on another. And when we consider that there may be demonstrations on both sides—by Conservatives as well as Liberals—[Cries of "Oh!" and laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite seem to be surprised; but it is as well that if these are to be the methods which, on the Liberal side in the country, are to be resorted to in the future, we should know it. If violence and intimidation and gross outrages are to be practised by them, we shall know pretty well how to take care of ourselves. It is perfectly obvious that, in the hands of an unscrupulous Secretary of State—[Cries of "Oh!"]—of course, I do not refer to the right hon. Gentleman—this is a weapon that might be used in the interests of one Party, and to the serious injury and detriment of the other. I need say nothing further upon the matter. I have endeavoured to state as distinctly as possible the grounds on which I have thought it right and necessary to make these observations to the House. I hope my remarks will have the effect of eliciting from the right hon. Gentleman a distinct and explicit statement that this Sessional Order shall not be violated again; but, as far as he is concerned, that it shall be strictly enforced in future.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, it would be entirely inconsistent with the Office I have the honour to hold, even if it were compatible with my sense of what is proper and fitting on such subjects, to deal with a question of this kind in the partizan tone the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Chaplin) has chosen to adopt. What I shall have to say on this subject will be entirely free from any spirit of that kind. The hon. Member has chosen to call an me unscrupulous Home Secretary. [Mr. CHAPLIN: "No!" and cries of "Withdraw!"]

MR. CHAPLIN: I expressly stated that I did not apply that term to the right hon. Gentleman.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am very glad to hear the hon. Gentleman's explanation; but the statement did not reach my ear. Well, then, having the good fortune to be acquitted by the hon. Member of being an unscrupulous Home Secretary, I hope I may make a statement consistent with that admission on his part. I regard it as the very first duty of any man who holds the Office I hold, quite irrespective of Party, to act in regard to public order without favour to one side or the other. I have always endeavoured to do so, and I shall always continue to do so. The hon. Member has called attention to the Sessional Orders of the House. It is to be regretted that the hon. Member did not discuss the particular case to which he refers at the time it occurred, when the circumstances were more fresh in the recollection of the House than they are now. I had, indeed, thought that the common sense of the House had pronounced upon this matter in July or August last. But the hon. Member seems to have been brooding over it during the Recess, and he has thought it necessary to revive the question. Well, I have nothing more to say on the subject than I did on the former occasion. The Sessional Order was certainly present to my mind at the time of this procession, and I gave orders to the police to protect the accesses to this House, and to see that they were kept clear. When great gatherings of people take place in London, upon whatever occasion, they do cause, and must cause, some inconvenience. An hon. Gentleman in a remote part of London, near where the gathering takes place, may, if he wants to come to the House of Commons, be interrupted in so doing. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) says that I ought to have dictated the route of the procession. I stated before, and I state again, that if I had done so—

MR. CHAPLIN: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to explain. That was not what I said. What

I said was that it was not only the right, but the duty of the Secretary of State to dictate the route it should not take, if that route was likely to occasion a breach of the Sessional Order.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Well, Sir, I do not think there is any great difference between dictating the course which the procession ought to take, and dictating the course which it ought not to take. ["Oh, oh!"] At any rate, I apply my observations to the negative as well as to the positive assertion. I say I had no right to dictate the course which the procession should not take. As I understood my duty, and endeavoured to perform it, it was to see that if that procession took place it should cause no inconvenience, or as little inconvenience as possible, to the access of hon. Members to this House. I gave instructions to the police to this effect, and I say that practically those instructions were effectually carried out. As I have said before, it is impossible that, when large gatherings take place, no inconvenience should be caused. But we have had certain gatherings in the neighbourhood of Westminster in the month of November; and I would venture again, in the presence of the Lord Mayor, to allude to a certain gathering which used to take place in the neighbourhood of Westminster on the 9th of November. I do not know whether, since the New Law Courts were removed—for my experience is too recent—whether the Lord Mayor still comes down to Westminster.

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR): No.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: He does not now come to Westminster at all?

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR): No.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Well, that will be a relief in future; but I am pointing out that, in the good old days, there have been gatherings in the Strand and elsewhere which stopped the traffic, and which filled Westminster Hall, and yet nobody complained of them. Certain inconvenience has been occasioned; but people bear the inconvenience, whether it is a Lord Mayor's Show or a procession of any other description. The police, however, always did their best to protect the traffic. If it were true that this procession had deliberately attempted to interfere with the access of Members to this House—

MR. CHAPLIN: It did interfere.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: If it had endeavoured, as the hon. Member says, to interfere with the free access of hon. Members to Parliament, which it did not, then there might be some grounds for his complaint. But when hon. Members recollect the circumstances of the case, and the great number of people gathered together, and remember that although there may have been some slight obstruction, hon. Members were not prevented from getting to the House of Commons, I think this House and people in general will come to the conclusion that, as regards the procession, it was very well conducted, and as regards the police that they did their duty under the Sessional Order to the best of their ability, and did preserve access to the House of Commons. Now, what is the outcome of the remarks of the hon. Member? What are the alternatives he presents? That I should have prohibited the procession altogether. Does the hon. Gentleman propose that?

MR. CHAPLIN: I say that such processions are prohibited by the House of Commons.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The hon. Member proposes that these processions should be prohibited by the House of Commons. Then let him make a Motion to that effect, and we shall see what the opinion of the House of Commons is.

MR. CHAPLIN: The right hon. Gentleman entirely misapprehends what I said. Perhaps it is very convenient for him to do so. What I said, when he asked me what I would have prohibited, was that he should have prohibited the procession passing by the House of Commons, in order to maintain the Sessional Order of the House.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: If the hon. Gentleman desires to have such a special prohibition, let him bring forward a Motion to that effect. Let him define his prohibition, and let us see what it is he is contending for. I maintain, on the other hand, that in the interests of order it is far better not to interfere with these processions, from whichever side they come. The hon. Gentleman says his Party is going to have a procession. I am quite sure that every endeavour will be made to preserve order in his procession, and there will be no distinction made. If I had done in this case what he says I ought to have done, and had said that the procession should not go down certain streets, I think it would have been highly inconvenient, and I should have been undertaking a responsibility in regard to the procession which it was not desirable that the Executive Government should undertake. All that the Secretary of State, in my opinion, can do, or ought to do in such cases, is to employ every effort to preserve order, and to preserve the access to the Houses of Parliament. All I can say is, that that duty I endeavoured, to the best of my ability, to perform; and it is for the House to judge whether that duty was, without inconvenience to any Member in any part of London, substantially performed in regard to the procession to which the hon. Member has referred.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOOTE: Sir, I must confess that I have listened with some disappointment to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department. It does appear to me that my hon. Friend, in calling attention to this matter, deserved a somewhat different answer to that which he has received. I quite believe that the right hon. Gentleman acted, as he thought, for the best; but there are two things which are perfectly clear. One is that the course taken by the procession did interfere, and interfered rather inconveniently, with the access of Members to the House. I will take my own case, and will state what happened to me. I came on that day from some distance out of London, and arrived at Waterloo Station. I took a cab to drive to the House of Commons, and found that I could not cross by Westminster Bridge, but that I had to go all the way round by Lambeth Bridge. I do not make any complaint as to what happened to me; but what happened to me may have happened, in one degree or other, to other hon. Members. I do not put the matter on that ground. What I wish to express my regret at is the tone of the right hon. Gentleman, who seems to think there is no duty on the part of the Secretary of State to take care that the instructions and Orders of this House, in regard to access being left free, should be observed. It is futile to talk of gatherings that may take place from accidental circumstances in different parts of the Metropolis, and still more futile to talk of matters so well understood as the Lord Mayor's procession. I am reminded that these Lord Mayor's processions take place in the morning, and at a time when the House is not usually sitting, so that they could not in any way interfere with the access of Members to this House. But it must be remembered that if political processions, organized specially for political objects, and in reference to the action of Parliament—if political processions are to be organized in reference to action still going on in Parliament—there is something more than a mere physical obstruction to Members passing along. You have to consider other possibilities. In the present instance we have nothing to complain of in regard to the conduct of the processionists; but it easily might have been otherwise; and I think it is the clear duty of a Minister who is responsible in such matters to see that proper arrangements are made—at all events, that improper arrangements are not made—which might have the effect of disturbing the easy and proper access of Members to this House. I own that I am disappointed at the language of the right hon. Gentleman; and I hope it may not be taken as an indication of the action which, on other occasions, he may be disposed to take.

Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the Commissioners of the Police of the Metropolis do take care that, during the Session of Parliament, the passages through the streets leading to this House be kept free and open, and that no obstruction be permitted to hinder the passage of Members to and from this House, and that no disorder be allowed in Westminster Hall or in the passages leading to this House during the sitting of Parliament; and that there be no annoyance therein or thereabouts; and that the Serjeant at Arms attending this House do communicate this Order to the Commissioners aforesaid.

PRIVILEGES.

OUTLAWRIES BILL.

Bill "for the more effectual preventing Clandestine Outlawries," read the first time; to be read a second time.

NOTICES.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I beg to give Notice that I will, to-morrow, move for Leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to the Representation of the People of the United Kingdom; and that I will, on Monday, move that the several stages of any Bill relating to the Representation of the People have precedence of all Orders of the Day, and Notices of Motion, on every day for which they may be set down by the Government.

Mr. TOMLINSON gave Notice that, to-morrow, he would ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he was correctly reported to have said in a speech at Preston Railway Station, on the 26th September—

"That the Franchise Bill was a very simple measure, but everything was done by the Tories to make it complicated. With that object they tried to bring in the woman's franchise;"

whether he referred to the Amendment on the Franchise Bill of last Session proposed by the hon. Member for Stoke, and seconded by the hon. Member for Manchester, or what Amendment he referred to; whether he intended to refer to those two hon. Members as having a desire to overweight the Franchise Bill; and, whether he was aware that several Leaders of the Conservative Party had for several years been in favour of the female suffrage?

Mr. GLADSTONE: I will answer the Question now. I think that the report, as far as I have heard it read, is perfectly correct. I did not refer to the proceeding of my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke, who evinced the sincerity of his conduct on that occasion by doing what he was perfectly entitled to do, and what was very inconvenient to the Government and to his Party. I do not think any further answer is necessary.

Mr. TOMLINSON: I beg to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that he has not answered the last paragraph. [Cries of "Order!"] I will put the Question down on the Paper.

Sir JOHN LUBBOCK: On Tuesday, the 4th of November, to move that no Redistribution Bill will be satisfactory which does not recognize the principle of proportional representation.

MR. LABOUCHERE: To ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will consent to the appointment of a Select Committee, with power to summon and examine witnesses, to inquire into the mode in which one of the schemes of Redistribution, which were printed for the private consideration of certain Members of Her Majesty's Government, was obtained and published in The Standard?

SIR JOHN HAY: To-morrow, to ask leave to bring in a Bill for the redistribution of seats.

MR. MAC IVER: I beg to give Notice that I shall move an Amendment to the Address in the following terms:—To add the words—

“But we humbly direct Her Majesty's attention to the depressed condition of commerce and agriculture, and regret that Her Majesty's gracious Speech contains no reference to a subject of such paramount importance.”

QUESTIONS.

THE MINISTRY—THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Prime Minister, Whether any successor had been appointed to Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, for whose courtesy he was very grateful? The right hon. Gentleman must be aware that at present the Admiralty was represented in neither House of Parliament; and he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), therefore, wished to know to what Minister inquiries respecting that Department were to be addressed?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; I have no statement to make on that subject, except that the hon. Member has, I think, inadvertently fallen into an error. There is one of the Lords of the Admiralty sitting in this House, and any Questions touching affairs relating to that Department can be addressed to him with perfect convenience.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman what Privy Councillors there are at present responsible for the affairs of the Admiralty in the House?

MR. GLADSTONE: I may observe that there has not been for some time a Privy Councillor directly responsible for the affairs of the Admiralty in this House—my hon. Friend the late Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Campbell-

NAVY—STATE OF THE NAVY.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I wish to ask the Prime Minister a Question of which I have given him private Notice—namely, Whether the Government contemplate taking any measures to relieve the anxiety which prevails in the public mind as to the state of the Navy, and particularly as to its sufficiency for the protection of the trade and commerce of the country in the event of war?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I will take the liberty of answering the Question in the general terms in which the right hon. Gentleman has put it, which do not precisely correspond with the Notice that he was kind enough to give me; but I will not refer to that. For some considerable time the Admiralty have had the subject of the Naval Establishments of the country under their consideration in a somewhat larger way than most, of course, always be the case with reference to the annual Estimates for each year. The Papers relating to the coaling stations have been recently circulated, and are now in the hands of hon. Members; and the Department will be prepared, in the course of next month, to bring before the House, in whatever form may appear to be most convenient, a statement of their views and intentions generally on that subject.

AFRICA (SOUTH)—BECHUANALAND.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I wish to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies a Question of which I have given him private Notice—namely, Whether the statement which appears in the newspapers this morning is correct, to the effect that Sir Charles Warren is to be sent out to the Cape in connection with the present position of affairs in Bechuanaland; and also whether he can inform the House what will be the powers with which Sir Charles Warren will be sent out, and what is the nature of his instructions?

MR. GORST asked when the Papers on that subject would be laid on the Table?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY, in reply, said, that all he was able to say at present was, that the Colonial Office was now in communication with Sir Charles Warren on the question whether he should go out or not; and he was not able for a few hours to give the right hon. Gentleman a more detailed answer. As to the Question about those Papers, he (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) wished to express his deep regret to the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland) that the promise he had made to him at the end of last Session that the Papers would be distributed had not been carried out. The reason for that was the Papers were of a highly confidential character, and the Government thought it so important that they should be given to the House to enable it to understand the matter thoroughly, that the Papers were sent off to the Cape to be submitted to Sir Hercules Robinson and Mr. Mackenzie, that they might go over them and correct them for publication—[Laughter, and ironical cheers—] and the Government only received them back lately. [Renewed laughter.] Well, the hon. Members who laughed and cheered had evidently not had much official experience. They should know that private letters were frequently written by public men referring to other public men in language which, as a matter of fact, they would not like to be published. Those letters referred to personal matters—matters personal to Mr. Mackenzie, and the Colonial Office did not think it right, without Mr. Mackenzie's consent, that they should be published. There was no mystery about the Papers; and, as a matter of fact, they had been laid on the Table. He had been in communication with the Printing Department; and he hoped, by a great effort, to get some copies of them ready by Saturday. The cause of the delay was the necessity of sending them to the Cape.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

MR. SPEAKER reported Her Majesty's Speech, made by Her Chancellor, and read it to the House.

[FIRST NIGHT.]

MR. E. STAFFORD HOWARD (who wore the dress of a Deputy Lieutenant) said: Mr. Speaker—Sir, I do not suppose that it has often happened that Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech from the Throne at the commencement of a Session has been so limited in extent, and at the same time has dealt with such important and great questions, as is the case on the present occasion. There may be, however, some hon. Members who are disposed to doubt the necessity for so early an assembling of Parliament as set out in Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech; but I do not think they will regret the opportunity which is now offered them of discussing the condition of affairs in Egypt and in South Africa, and the policy of Her Majesty's Government in relation to them.

I think it will be observed with satisfaction that Her Majesty is able to state that her relations with all Foreign Powers continue to be amicable; because, not so very long ago, a portion of the foreign Press attempted to show that those relations were likely to be disturbed in consequence of what had occurred in relation to the failure of the Conference upon Egyptian affairs. I think we ought not to attach too much importance to such statements as these; but, at all events, the country will welcome the assurance contained in Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech.

Sir, the question of Egypt is one which has occupied a great deal of time and attention in this House, and the Mission of General Gordon has excited the sympathy and interest of everyone in this country; I think, however, that by the debates which took place in this House last Session it was made abundantly clear that there were many persons who were more than uneasy at the delay on the part of Her Majesty's Government in sending relief to that gallant officer. The necessity seemed beyond doubt, and, therefore, I believe that everyone will approve the steps which Her Majesty's Government have taken, whilst the progress of the Expedition is being watched with the intense interest which the circumstances naturally excite. I think, Sir, also, that the terms in Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech which refer to the services rendered by General Gordon in his perilous Expedition are such as will command the assent of all. The exceptional difficulty and danger of the task he was called upon to perform, the remarkable character of the man himself, the wonderful energy displayed by him in maintaining in safety himself and everyone with him in their isolated situation at Khartoum, cut off from all communication with his friends, surrounded by treacherous enemies—all these circumstances combine to make him and his companions the central figures in the thoughts of all who take an interest in what is occurring abroad, and a pride in the gallant deeds of their countrymen. I wish it were in my power to say anything to the House as to the painful uncertainty which surrounds the position of the gallant Colonel Stewart. So far as can be found out, all the fresh information that has been received does not go far to encourage our hopes; but the fact that Lord Wolseley has been sent out to command the Expedition, and that Her Majesty's Government have to ask for additional supplies, show that they mean to spare no effort which may be necessary to open up the route to Khartoum, and to enable General Gordon and those whom he has been helping to defend themselves to return in safety. Whatever may be the opinion of hon. Members as to the policy adopted by Her Majesty's Government in relation to the Soudan, I think everyone must agree that, so far as this Expedition is concerned, they are only fulfilling a duty to General Gordon, whose perilous position has been due to no fanciful policy of his own, but to the necessities of the problem which he was sent out to solve. It will be found, I feel confident, that when he is able to make those communications which before long we hope he will be able to make, although his action on some occasions may have caused us surprise, and caused the Government surprise, it will be found that during the whole time he has been loyally endeavouring to carry out the instructions given to him in circumstances of unexampled difficulty.

Sir, I think, with regard to Egypt Proper, the difficulties of the position in which we are placed are, undoubtedly, numerous; but I believe, also, it will be found that, so far as the reforms which we have been attempting to inaugurate are concerned, a steady progress has been made. As to the present position of the finances of Egypt, Her Majesty's Government have naturally supported the Government of the Khedive in taking the steps which were forced upon him, owing to the failure of the Conference upon Egyptian affairs, to solve the difficulty; but I think we may expect that the Government of the Khedive will be able shortly to resume its proper financial position, and that the House and the country will endorse the policy of Her Majesty's Government. The task which has fallen to us in Egypt is not one that is likely to be accomplished in a moment; but I think if we can succeed in time in establishing order and good government in that country, and if in so doing we can establish among the people feelings of respect for us and a recognition of our good-will towards them—I think, if we can do this, there will be some compensation for all the money we have spent and all the infinite trouble we have been exposed to in our endeavour to accomplish that task.

Now, Sir, it is necessary for me to say a few words on the subject of South Africa. The situation of affairs there is, I regret to say, far from satisfactory; but, at the same time, we must admit that this is a description which I am afraid cannot be said to be an unusual one. I shall not attempt now to enter into the details of what has taken place there, or to fix the responsibility for them upon any particular policy past or present, because I have no doubt that the subject will be fully discussed in this House by those who are much more able than I am to do so, and because to speak of a question of this kind in the spirit of any Party can lead to no good. But I think I may say truly that however easy it is to be wise after events, and to say "You should have done this," or "You ought to have done that," there is no part of the globe in which the British Government have to act where the conditions that have to be dealt with are so complicated, so shifting, and so contradictory as they seem to be in South Africa. The late Government made a very vigorous attempt to unite the conflicting elements in South Africa; the premature attempt at Confederation, however, failed, and I think I may say that the last state of affairs there has been worse than the first. The present Government, on acceding to Office, found themselves involved in difficulties with the Transvaal Government, and those difficulties have continued ever since. Twice have Her Majesty's Government attempted to establish a modus vivendi with the Boer Government and people, and twice have the Boers broken the Convention made with them, before, so to speak, the ink was dry; and so people are beginning to ask themselves, not unnaturally, what is the use of making agreements with a Government which seems either unwilling or unable to carry them out when made? Would it not be much better for us to make up our minds as to what we ought to insist upon, and then insist upon its being done? One of the great difficulties which has beset every Government in South Africa has been the undoubted fact that the majority of the Boer population in the Cape Colony has sympathized with their fellow-countrymen in the Transvaal; but there was, I believe, a hope entertained a short time ago that public opinion in the Cape Colony was ready vigorously to support the re-assertion of the Convention which has been broken, and I believe, Sir, that the inhabitants of the Colony are now ready to re-assert that Convention. I hope they will be successful, and that, having done so without the shedding of blood, we shall be able to congratulate ourselves that the question has been settled without another South African War; if not, I do not see that there is any alternative to the pushing forward of those preparations which Her Majesty's Government are already making, which will insure the faithful performance of the Convention, and the security of the Natives to whom we have pledged our word. Sir, I think the lesson which this country ought to learn from these events is that if peace is ever to reign in South Africa, if respect for the British name is to continue there, and if South Africa is to remain an integral portion of Her Majesty's Dominions, we shall have to deal with the matters arising there with a firm and steady hand. There is no more precious trust committed to the care of the Government of this country by the people from whom they derive their power than the national reputation for good faith—there is nothing which they should more vigilantly guard; and while the people of this country are anxious that the Government should avoid all engagements, the difficulties in the execution of which might involve us in embarrassment and complication, they will always be found willing to support them in rigidly fulfilling those to which they have pledged their word.

[First Night.]

Now, Sir, turning from these important topics, I come to that great question which is the cause of our meeting here to-day. I do not think it is necessary for me to further refer to the circumstances which have called us together; but I may take this opportunity of expressing my most earnest hope that, having been summoned to discuss this question in Parliament, we shall address ourselves to the task of overcoming—not of aggravating—the difficulties of the position. I believe sincerely that it would be both a discredit to the good sense and reputation of the people, and a misfortune to the country at large, if this question be not settled without further agitation. Those who have watched the proceedings at the many meetings held throughout the country will have seen that there has been a tendency on the part of the speakers to deliver their addresses with increased warmth of expression, and on the part of the audiences an inclination to do something more than listen. So that, if there were no other reason for the assembling of Parliament, I think there are many who will agree with me that it is high time to change the scene of the controversy from the platforms of the country to the floor of this House, where, Sir, under your strict supervision, we may hope that our discussions will be conducted with somewhat less excitement, and with a greater desire to arrive at a settlement of this question, than the stimulating atmosphere of public meetings seems generally to promote. Now, in speaking on this question, I wish, as far as possible, to do so without Party feeling, and to approach it with the honest desire of seeing a measure pass which, I believe, will be for the benefit of the people; and I think I am only stating a fact when I say that every Member on this side of the House, except the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen), came here pledged to support this measure, the natural, unavoidable, and desirable complement to the Act of 1867. From that pledge, Sir, we cannot and will not recede, and we shall fail in our duty to those who returned us to this House if we deliberately adopt any course that would place the fate of that measure in the hands of those who are not responsible for it. In every other respect I believe we are most anxious to meet the views of our opponents, and as, with, I believe, the exception of the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther), we are all agreed upon the principle of the measure, there seems to be no reason why, if good sense is to prevail, we should not arrive at a settlement of this question. But, Sir, there is one thing which I admit must be first got out of the way, for it has tended greatly to aggravate the agitation which has taken place throughout the country. It will have been observed that in this agitation there are two sections, which seem to be each actuated by an ulterior motive, and not only that, but in whose minds that ulterior motive is the paramount idea—the one section desires to destroy, the other section desires to re-assert, to revivify, if I may say so, the powers of the Upper House of Parliament. Now, I ask this question—Are these ulterior motives to prevent the passing of this great measure for the better representation of the people, on the passing of which all reasonable men have set their minds? Surely both the sections to whom I have referred have reason to be satisfied with the advance that has been made. Those on the other side of the House would do well to be satisfied, I think, with the thousands who have flocked to their standard for one reason or another, and rest for a time with the comfortable assurance to be drawn from that fact before they put the question to any ruder test; while hon. Members on this side must surely be satisfied with the fact that they have brought this great question within the region of practical politics. If they will but remain quiet, and allow their opponents to cherish a little more the delusion under which they labour, it will not be long before they receive a challenge on the longed-for issue. Let each of these sections, then, give thanks for what it has received, and let us proceed to a practical consideration of the work which is immediately before us; and I repeat that it is my conviction that if these ulterior motives can be got rid of there is no reason why we should not come to a settlement. The only condition which Her Majesty's Government lay down is that the Representation of the People Bill and the Redistribution of Seats Bill shall not be made dependent the one upon the other; and I say, without fear, that if Her Majesty's Government were to consent to such a condition they would have betrayed the confidence reposed in them, and would be inviting Parliament to a deliberate waste of time; because it must be patent to everyone who has observed the difficulty of passing any Bill through Parliament that were the Franchise Bill made dependent on the Redistribution Bill the interest in the details of the latter would become so enormous, and the temptation to criticize at length and move Amendments to them, always great, would be so increased, that the discussions would become almost interminable, with the result that there would not be the slightest chance of either of the Bills for the representation of the people passing into law during the present Parliament. If the Government consented to such a course they would be deliberately sacrificing the Bill to which they are pledged, and inviting Parliament to waste its time. Everyone must admit that such would be the case. ["No, no!"] That is our view, although hon. Members opposite do not look upon it in the same light; and therefore we consider that Her Majesty's Government cannot be too strict with regard to the terms laid down. But, on the other hand, it seems to me that hon. Members opposite are possessed with a great suspicion that Her Majesty's Government have two Redistribution Bills in their minds, and that the character of the Bill which they will eventually introduce depends entirely upon whether the Franchise Bill is made dependent on the Redistribution Bill or not. If the Government can pass the Franchise Bill apart from redistribution, they appear to think that so great will be the power they will obtain and the leverage they will get, and so unscrupulous the use they will make of them, that they will produce a Bill which will annihilate the Conservative Party. If, on the other hand, the passing of one Bill is made dependent on the other, they seem to suppose that the Government will be obliged to produce a Bill which will save the Conservative Party from the extinction which they fear. Now, Sir, I want to show how unreasonable these suspicions are. In the first place, the Franchise Bill, if taken as evidence of the frame of mind of the Government, goes to show that there is no desire to be unfair to the Conservative Party. What temptation is there for us to pass an unfair Bill? I say, Sir, that the temptation lies entirely in the opposite direction. We have the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) that it is impossible to produce any scheme of redistribution not obviously unfair, which will not be Liberal in its operation. ["No, no!"] Well, Sir, that is our opinion, and, that being so, I repeat that, so far from there being any temptation on our part to do that which is unjust, so strong is our position that the temptation lies all in the other direction. For the sake of getting the Bill, we can afford not only to be just, but generous. I am sure the Government have every disposition to meet the views of their opponents, whether it be in securing that the agricultural interest shall not be swamped by the urban, or by giving any other reasonable pledge that may be asked for. But it is said that the Government have no intention of carrying out its pledges. Well, Sir, I reply that that is an unworthy suspicion. I believe that there are enough honest men in this House to see that the Government does fulfil its pledges, and the fact that there are 180 Members of this House who have pledged themselves to the principle of proportional representation is a strong guarantee that nothing unfair will be done in any Redistribution Bill that passes this House. Whether any practical scheme can be formed which will give effect to their views and be acceptable to the country is a matter of doubt; but there is one thing which is not a matter of doubt, and it is that in subscribing to that principle each and all of those 180 Members are bound to oppose any proposition which is designedly calculated to give an unfair advantage or preponderance to any Party or interest. Those hon. Members make a formidable Party, and to my mind constitute a very powerful guarantee that any unfairness in a Bill of this kind will be corrected, and that any attempt to alter what is fair will be successfully resisted. Then, again, there are on this side of the House a large number of Liberal county Members whose natural tendency will be to assert the claims of the country to as full a representation as the towns, and to prevent the swamping of agricultural interests by a great infusion of purely urban population. As to the independence of these hon. Members, the Government has, on more than one occasion I believe, discovered that they were not always on their side. Taking all these things together, I feel most strongly that there are, in the present state of this controversy, elements of agreement which ought to prevail. The Government, I am sure, short of yielding the vital point for which they are contending, will go far in the direction of conciliation, and I need hardly add my conviction that they ought to be met in the same spirit; we ought to desire to see the settlement of this question for its own sake, apart from the consideration of the consequences that will result, if it be not settled, grave as they are. Public opinion witnesses to the fact that there are hundreds and thousands of our fellow-countrymen—men and women—who, in spite of our boasted prosperity, civilization, humanity, and religion, are living in a state of degradation and wretchedness, which we know we ought to be ashamed of, and which is not only a disgrace, but a source of danger to the country. And, Sir, while I do not, for a moment, wish to exaggerate the powers of legislation as being greater than those of religion, or of moral or social reform, yet it is through Parliament that the wants of the people find a voice, and through Parliament that their grievances are discussed, and the proper remedies, be they social or be they legislative, are brought before the attention of the public. The disgrace of our great towns is the miserable accommodation for the poor—the hovels in which thousands of our fellow-countrymen are living. The curse of the country is the degradation and wretchedness caused by drink, aggravated, in a great degree, by the system of licensing. None but those who have taken an active interest in matters of this kind know what the feelings of the people with regard to them are. Give these people votes, and we shall find that these questions, and many others like them, will no longer be neglected or tinkered at by a half-attentive Parliament. Whatever can be done by legislation to promote a better state of things will be done, and whatever cannot be done by legislation will be pressed on and stimulated by a widened and strengthened public opinion, and so the position of the country will be strengthened, as nothing else will strengthen it, by the greater happiness, welfare, and contentment of the people.

Sir, I must conclude the observations I have had the honour to make on this occasion by asking pardon of the House for having trespassed on its time, and by thanking hon. Members for the kind attention with which those observations have been received. If I have deviated at all from the general lines of usage on these occasions, I must plead, as my excuse, the strong interest which I take in the great measure to be brought before us, and my anxious desire that it will be passed into law during the present Session. Sir, I beg to move—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to convey the thanks of this House for the Most Gracious Speech delivered by Her Command to both Houses of Parliament :

“Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that Her Majesty continues to maintain relations of amity with all Foreign Powers :

“To assure Her Majesty that we learn with satisfaction that, although the information received from the Soudan includes painful uncertainties, yet the energy, courage, and resource conspicuously displayed by General Gordon in the successful defence of Khartoum deserve Her Majesty's warm recognition :

“Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that the advance of Her Majesty's Troops to Dongola has for its object the rescue and security of that gallant officer, and of those who have so faithfully co-operated with him :

“To thank Her Majesty for informing us that in Egypt itself Her Majesty is using Her best endeavours to promote further improvement ; and that Her Majesty has given Her support to the Egyptian Government in the difficult financial position in which it has been left through the failure of the recent Conference :

“Humbly to assure Her Majesty that we learn with regret that circumstances have occurred on the South-western frontier of the Transvaal which demand Her Majesty's vigilant attention ; and humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that, in conjunction with the Government of the Cape Colony, Her Majesty is engaged in considering the means which may be required to secure the faithful observance of the Convention of the present year :

“To thank Her Majesty for informing us that the operations in the Soudan will render it necessary to ask from us a further pecuniary provision :

“Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that the Bill for the extension of the Parliamentary Franchise will at once be introduced :

“Humbly to assure Her Majesty that our most careful consideration shall be given to any measure which may be submitted to us, and that we earnestly trust that the blessing of Almighty God may attend upon our labours.”

Mr. SUMMERS (who wore a Court dress) said : Sir, in rising to second the Address in answer to Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech, it will hardly be necessary for me to bespeak the kind consideration and indulgence of the House. That consideration and that indulgence have always been extended to an hon. Member placed in the trying position in which I now find myself ; and they will not, I am sure, be withheld from one who, though he may have no other claim upon the attention of hon. Members, has this, at least, to urge in his own behalf—that during the four and a-half years that he has enjoyed the honour of a seat in this Assembly, he has not unduly obtruded himself upon the notice of the House, or wasted any considerable portion of its precious and invaluable time.

Mr. Speaker, the House will doubtless have learned, with feelings of pleasure and satisfaction, from one of the opening sentences of Her Majesty's Gracious Speech, that her relations with all Foreign Powers are of a friendly and harmonious description. By a statement of this character, it is not, I imagine, intended to convey the impression that, since Parliament rose in August last, there has not been so much as a ripple upon the smooth surface of European politics. In dealing with a difficult and complicated question like that of Egypt, and a question, be it remembered, in respect of which each of the Great Powers of Europe has a recognized status and locus standi—it is impossible at all times, and under all circumstances, to avoid the occurrence and recurrence of a certain amount of friction, and, it may be, even of conflict. What we have to congratulate ourselves upon is that, up to the present time, at all events, that friction and conflict have been kept within reasonable limits, and have not assumed any serious or alarming proportions. The various Powers of Europe, and more especially the neighbouring Government of France, though they may have differed from us at particular junctures, on particular points of policy, have felt bound to admit the disinterestedness of the aims, and the purity of the motives, by which Her Majesty's Ministers have been actuated. Nor is it, Sir, in any way surprising that differences of opinion should have existed amongst the European Powers. It would, indeed, be the merest affectation to deny that serious differences of opinion exist even within the walls of this House; and there are probably few men of candid and impartial mind amongst us who, looking back upon the connection of this country with Egyptian affairs for the last six or eight years, would not be prepared to make the admission that grave errors of judgment and of policy have been committed by one or other, or possibly by both, of the great Parties in the State. To hon. Gentlemen who may be disposed to condemn without mercy the action of the present Advisers of the Crown with respect to Egypt, I will simply say that it will not be possible for us to pass a final judgment upon their proceedings until we know the end as well as the beginning of their policy. Three years ago I remember to have heard the Prime Minister, when addressing the working men of Leeds, tell them that in all that he and his Colleagues would do in Egypt, they would proceed not for dynastic purposes, not for selfish views, not by any endeavour to make the interests of the English people paramount in the Government of Egypt as compared with the interests of the Egyptian people, but that their great aim and object would be to secure those ends which were for the benefit of Egypt herself. I make bold, Sir, to express my firm conviction that it is precisely in proportion as Her Majesty's Ministers rise "to the height of this great argument," or fall short of it, that they will be applauded or condemned by posterity. Shall I be regarded as a man of too sanguine and confiding a temperament if I venture, at the same time, to see in the reforms that have been already accomplished, and in the Mission of Lord Northbrook, with all that that Mission of necessity involves, sufficient and conclusive evidence that

Her Majesty's Ministers are redeeming the solemn pledges under which they lie, and are furnishing the world with proof which cannot be shaken that they have really and sincerely at heart the interests and the welfare of the Egyptian people?

My hon. Friend the Mover of the Address (Mr. Stafford Howard) has dealt so fully and exhaustively with matters relating to the Soudan and South Africa, that it will not be necessary for me to trouble the House with any further observations upon foreign affairs. Indeed, Her Majesty's Gracious Speech, on the present occasion, may be said to reflect very faithfully the mind and feeling of the country, in that it gives especial prominence to one particular topic, and that a question of domestic concern. In my humble judgment, Mr. Speaker, it is matter rather for rejoicing than regret that the great question of Reform, for the moment, at all events, has, like Aaron's rod, swallowed up all other political questions whatsoever. Hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, no less than hon. Gentlemen opposite, are doubtless filled with the swellings of a just and lawful pride when they reflect upon the wonderful achievements of the men of our race who have gone forth from our shores to plant the British language, British liberties, and British laws in the uttermost parts of the earth. We, on this side of the House, no less than hon. Gentlemen on that, regard the government of the teeming millions of our vast Indian Dependency as, perhaps, the greatest trust ever imposed by Providence upon a powerful and high-spirited people. We likewise recognize, to the fullest possible extent, that Great Britain has duties to discharge, and interests to protect, in almost every quarter of the globe. But whilst we entertain these views, we are, at the same time, most firmly convinced that those are not amongst the least wise of our statesmen and public men who have not scrupled to express the opinion that, after all, it is here in England that the real strength and power and greatness of the Empire lie. How, then, could our Parliaments, how could our statesmen be more wisely or more profitably employed than by seeking to extend the limits of human freedom on English, on Scottish, and on Irish soil? Mr. Speaker, it will not, I am sure, be necessary for me, at this time of day, to argue out the Franchise Question upon its merits. By almost universal confession and acknowledgment, the Franchise Bill, which was introduced by Her Majesty's Ministers, and carried through this House by enormous majorities in the last Session of Parliament, was a just, a moderate, and a reasonable measure. It might even be described, without the smallest exaggeration, as an essentially Conservative measure. It left the free-men undisturbed in the counties. It introduced no new principle into the Constitution. It simply sought to extend to householders in the counties those political rights and privileges which, by the Act of 1867, had been conferred upon householders in the boroughs. The remarkable thing, Mr. Speaker, is in reality this—that in the last quarter of the 19th century we should be still discussing the question whether one-half of the nation is any longer to remain in a condition of political dependence and political servitude. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan), whom we are all delighted to find filling, at last, his proper place in a Liberal Cabinet, told us, long ago, if the English agricultural labourer had been born a negro in the United States of America, he would have acquired the suffrage as soon as he had attained his majority; if he had been a peasant of Switzerland, or of France, he would have been in the possession of the franchise for a generation; and if, instead of being an Old England, he had been a New England, he and his forefathers before him would have enjoyed all the rights and privileges of citizenship for a couple of centuries. The Bill introduced by the Government being then as just, as moderate, and as reasonable as I have described, I proceed to ask the question, What was the reception it met with at the hands of the two great branches of the Legislature? As all the world knows, it met with great and growing favour in this House. If it had simply depended upon the action of the Representative Chamber, the Franchise Bill would, at this moment, have been an Act. Upon the second reading—when we affirm the principle of a measure—it was carried by a majority of 180; and when we went into Committee the majority for the Government assumed still more formidable proportions. The just, wise, and statesmanlike proposal of the Government that Ireland should be included within the scope of the measure was carried, not merely by a majority of 180, but by a majority of 195. And when, Sir, we came to the third reading of the Bill, the opposition entirely collapsed, so that it stands recorded on the Journals of this House that the third reading of the Representation of the People Bill was carried nemine contradicente. It is no exaggeration, therefore, but the plain and simple truth, to say that the Franchise Bill went from this House to "another place" with the practically unanimous assent of the Representatives of the people. What happened when it reached that "other place?" I am well aware, Mr. Speaker, that I must be careful in the language that I use. I observe that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) has his eye upon me, and I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that I have not the faintest desire in the world to excite his indignation, or to disturb the serenity and equanimity of his temper. I shall not, therefore, say that noble Lords in "another place" rejected the Franchise Bill. I shall not even avail myself of the homely vernacular of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther), and say that they "chucked it out." I shall content myself with the assertion to which no exception can, I trust, be taken, and shall say that their Lordships simply refused to allow the Bill to pass. That is the reason, Sir, and that is the only reason, so far as I am able to discover, why Her Majesty, acting on the advice of her Ministers, has summoned us together, after a Recess unusually short, for this extraordinary Session of Parliament. What is to be the issue of our labours? The Franchise Bill, we may reasonably anticipate, will once more be carried by large majorities in the Representative Chamber, and will once more be presented for consideration to their Lordships' House. What is to be its fate? That is the question of all-absorbing interest to us at the present time. We are sometimes told by men of high character and position in the country that it is altogether inconceivable that their Lordships should

beso wanting in respect and consistency as to allow a measure to pass in November to which they refused their assent in July. I trust, Sir, that such a consummation it is not so inconceivable as some would have us believe. Since July last, many things have happened that might well furnish to the most careless and casual observers ample material for reflection. The ancient right of public meeting has been largely availed of throughout the length and breadth of the land. We have had from week to week, and from day to day, meetings of every conceivable kind and description, ranging from the magnificent demonstrations in the streets of London and of Glasgow to that now historic gathering in the back parlour of a Welsh public-house, which was so select that we are told it consisted only of a chairman, a paid secretary, and a very little boy, but was, at the same time, so influential that we have likewise been told, on no mean authority, that it spoke the voice of Wales. Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege, during the Parliamentary Recess, to attend many large and important gatherings of my fellow-countrymen in various parts of Great Britain; and if the House will bear with me for a few moments longer, I should like to state very briefly, but, at the same time, with perfect frankness, what has been the impression produced upon my mind by what I have actually seen. Of the last and, in some respects, the most marvellous of the celebrated Mid Lothian campaigns, of which I was an interested spectator, I would simply say that, apart altogether from the particular opinions expressed by the Prime Minister at Edinburgh and elsewhere, it must have been matter for general congratulation to find that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government was in full possession of all his old vigour, and of all those powers of stirring and matchless eloquence with which he has so often charmed the minds and captivated the affections of the British people. And not, Mr. Speaker, of the British people alone, for that gifted and high-souled Irish patriot, who has recently passed away from amongst us, would have been the first to admit that the right hon. Gentleman has succeeded, in a way in which no British Minister ever did before him, in winning for himself a place in the hearts of the Irish people also. But, Mr. Speaker, it is not of the Mid Lothian campaign that it is my main intention to speak; I wish, in a few brief sentences, to state to the House what I believe to be the prevailing opinion and sentiment of the vast majority of the electors and non-electors of the United Kingdom on the topics which have so largely engrossed their attention of late. In the first place, then, I believe the people of this country are really in earnest in their desire for the passage of the Franchise Bill with the utmost possible despatch. After the agitation which we have witnessed during the last few months, no hon. Gentleman or noble Lord who has the smallest regard for his own reputation will have the hardihood to get up in his place and tell us that the British people are supine or indifferent on the subject of the extension of household suffrage to the counties. It is true that hitherto they have, speaking broadly and generally, been extremely moderate and good-humoured in their conduct of the agitation in which they have taken part in such vast numbers and with so much public spirit. Nor is the reason far to seek. They believed that there was in power a Government that was fighting their battle for them; and they were so confident of the justice of their cause, that they knew there could be but one issue to the conflict. They believed, I say, in the sincerity and earnestness of Her Majesty's Ministers on the subject of Reform; but it was not, I regret to say, by any means so easy to persuade them that the new-born zeal of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite for the extension of the suffrage was above suspicion. I shall be told that many of them are poor, misguided Radicals, who could not be expected to take an impartial view of the actions of right hon. Gentleman opposite. Possibly that may be so. Right hon. Gentlemen, however, have it in their power to undeceive these misguided men by making their actions correspond with their words. Let them vote for the second reading of the Franchise Bill, the principle of which they profess to approve, and they will not only thereby earn for themselves the gratitude of the 2,000,000 of men who must shortly be enfranchised, but they will, at the same time, show themselves to be, in reality as well as in name, the protectors and guardians of the Constitution.

Mr. Sumners

I know not, Mr. Speaker, what may be the effect of my appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite. It may be that it will fall upon deafened ears; but this I do know—that I can appeal with confidence to hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House to strengthen the hands of Her Majesty's Ministers, and thereby enable them to raise this Parliament to an elevation to which it has not yet attained, and to make it memorable in the annals of our history as the Parliament which did a tardy act of justice by granting to 2,000,000 of our fellow-countrymen, householders inhabiting the counties, those elementary rights and privileges of citizenship of which they had been too long deprived. I thank the House for the kindness and patience with which they have listened to my remarks, and I beg to second the Motion of my hon. Friend.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That, &c."—[See page 69.]

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Mr. Speaker—Sir, it is usual for anyone who addresses the House after the Mover and Seconder of the Address to express on the part of the House a sense of the skill and ability with which those Gentlemen usually discharge their duties; and I am sure I may say with regard to both the hon. Gentlemen who have spoken to-day that we feel and recognize and congratulate them upon their great eloquence and great power of speaking. The hon. Member the Mover has, I think, gone far beyond that, and merits our acknowledgment of the great dignity and good taste with which he has spoken on several very important subjects. I am afraid I cannot altogether speak of the Seconder in the same tone that I should of the Mover, for I think there have been some parts in the latter portion of his address which do not seem to me to be extremely well calculated to promote that which the hon. Mover has so well expressed when he spoke of his desire to overcome, and not to aggravate, the difficulties of the situation in which he said we are placed. It seems to me there were many parts of the speech of the hon. Member for Stalybridge (Mr. Summers) which are not calculated to assist the discussion of the Franchise Bill when it may come before us; but I would ask the permission of the House to abstain as far as possible from now entering into the discussion of that question, as it is a matter which must be brought before us very shortly, and is a matter which ought to be very carefully and very candidly considered. I own I was disposed to derive from the language of the Gracious Speech which Her Majesty the Queen has addressed to us some consolation, and to think that it showed an inclination on the part of Her Majesty's Government to take a broader view of the question of the representation of the people than was taken in the Speech from the Throne of last Session. I was pleased to observe that the Speech on the part of Her Majesty began by saying that she had brought us together

"In order that we may be enabled at once to give further consideration to the great subject of the representation of the people in Parliament."

Now, I could not but contrast that with the language used by Her Majesty last February, when, at the commencement of last Session, she spoke of the measure which was to be presented to us as one

"Which will have for its principal object the enlargement of the Occupation Franchise in Parliamentary Elections."

That was the minor portion only of the whole subject of Parliamentary Reform, and it was because the Government proposed to deal only with a portion of that great subject that so much difficulty arose. I saw with pleasure that Her Majesty had been advised on this occasion to take a wider and broader view, and to speak of the whole of the great subject of the representation of the people in Parliament; and I feel well assured that if Her Majesty's Ministers are prepared to make proposals to us which are adequately represented by that language, such proposals will receive candid consideration on the part of all hon. Members of the House alike. But it must not be understood that we can in any way depart from the view we have taken in this House and out of the House, that it is essential that this great question should be considered as a whole. I believe that there is a very large and general feeling throughout the country of a desire, as has been said by the Mover and Seconder of the Address, that the franchise should be extended. There is no question of that, and that accounts for the very many and very large attendances that have taken place at meetings held during the Recess on the subject. But that is not the point at issue. It is a question of how we are to bring about that extension of the franchise in a manner consistent with the maintenance of a proper system of Parliamentary representation. We maintain that this is so large and important — so vitally important—a question that the two parts must not be separated in our minds, but must be considered together, and that we must act with reference to the whole subject, and not merely only to a part of it. Therefore, the meetings in the country that have been referred to have been extremely significant, on the side of those whom we have had the honour of meeting, because those have been meetings of persons who were perfectly ready and anxious for the extension of the franchise, and yet who were ready to listen to the arguments and consider the grounds and reasons by which we showed that the two parts of the question ought not to be dissevered. I said I would not attempt at this time to go fully into this matter. I am anxious to hear from the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister and from the Government what are the proposals with which they now meet Parliament, and what course they propose to take. I can only say, on my own part, and on the part of those who sit on this side of the House, that I earnestly trust that the Government will take such a course as will enable us, consistently with the views we have not harshly but deliberately formed, to co-operate with them in this great measure. Now, Sir, we have been called together for the purpose of dealing with this question; but there are portions of the Queen's Speech which seem to show that even if there had not existed that reason for calling us together, still Parliament would probably have been asked to meet. There is no doubt that very great importance attaches to the other subjects which are brought forward in the Speech, such as to make us rejoice that we have the opportunity of meeting the Government and obtaining authentic information as to these matters. I am glad to believe that we shall receive full information with regard to those subjects; but I do not observe that anything is said as to the presentation of Papers relating to the Egyptian Question. It may be a mere accidental slip; but I understand that Papers are to be presented to us in regard to the Transvaal, and nothing is said as to Papers with reference to Egypt. I think that is a very extraordinary omission, for Egypt is a question which is assuming, year by year and month by month, more and more important proportions, and is developing greater difficulties. The Speech informs us that the information received from the Soudan includes "painful uncertainties." The phrase, I am bound to say, I think is original. I do not think that I have ever seen it in any Speech from the Throne before, and I do not exactly know what is its precise meaning. But, undoubtedly, there are most "painful uncertainties," and there have been for some time; and it is with a feeling of serious and deep disappointment that we come together and find that all that Her Majesty's Government is able to tell us is that there are "painful uncertainties" connected with the position of affairs in the Soudan. I was deeply grieved to hear—for I suppose the hon. Member spoke with some official information—the Mover of the Address say that the intelligence with regard to Colonel Stewart is not such as to lead us to form any very hopeful opinions as to his safety. I had hoped that we might find that the Government had some reassuring information, for this is a subject upon which the heart of England is deeply touched. We are anxious indeed to know what is the fate of that gallant man, and whether everything has been done that could have been done to avert the danger. We cannot help feeling that his position, like that of General Gordon, is one that not only calls for our admiration and for recognition on the part of Her Majesty and the Government, but it also requires that we should be assured that everything has been done that could have been done to secure the safety of those distinguished and gallant men. And I am bound to say that, as at present advised, it does not appear to me that the course taken by the Government has been such as to provide for that necessity. I cannot help remarking the way in which the statements in regard to General Gordon and his Mission have gradually developed themselves in the communications that have been made to us. I would ask the attention of the House for one moment to these extracts from the official communications made to us. In the Queen's Speech of the 5th of February we were told that Her Majesty had offered the Egyptian Government such counsels as were required by a prudent regard to the amount of its financial resources, and to the social condition of the country—

"I have also despatched Major-General Gordon to report on the best means of giving effect to the resolution of the Khedive to withdraw from the Interior of the Soudan."

Have we ever received any Report that answers to this description? I doubt very much indeed whether the Report he did give at all answers to that description. At all events, General Gordon went to the Soudan, as he afterwards tells us, with the full expectation that he was to be supported by the Government. He went out to a position of very great peril and very great responsibility; and from the communications with which we have been favoured by him up to the time when communications were practically broken off, it appears that he had found, by degrees and step by step, that he was not to receive that support upon which he had calculated, and upon which he had founded his hopes and his plans for conducting the operations that he undertook. However, time went on, and late in last Session, on the 5th of August, Her Majesty's Government came down to the House and proposed a Supplementary Vote, not exceeding £300,000, to enable Her Majesty to undertake operations for the relief of General Gordon, and to make certain preparations in respect thereof if they should become necessary. We are not told what has occurred since, but are now informed that the energy, courage, and resource conspicuously displayed by General Gordon in the successful defence of Khartoum deserve Her Majesty's warm recognition. We had heard nothing of the successful defence of Khartoum up to this point, and it occurs to me to ask what is the intention of the Government with regard to Khartoum. What is it that General Gordon is doing there which deserves Her Majesty's recognition, and yet which is consistent with the communications which were made before he went out, when it was understood that Khartoum was to be abandoned? We want to know what is the real state of the case; and I presume, at all events, that when application is made to us for money we shall obtain full information on the subject. But I think it would be desirable if earlier than that we could receive from the Government some intelligible statement of what the exact position of General Gordon and of our forces respectively are in Egypt. What is the plan that they have in view, and what is the intention with which that plan is framed? Then with regard to another matter connected with Egypt. I find that on the 14th of August, at the close of the Session, Her Majesty made reference to the failure of the Conference upon the finances of Egypt, and proceeded to say—

"I shall continue to fulfil with fidelity the duties which grow out of the presence of my troops in the valley of the Nile; and I trust that the special mission, which I have determined upon sending to that country, may materially aid me in considering what counsels to tender to the Egyptian Government, and what steps to adopt in connection with that country."

Are we to receive any communication as to what the effect of this special Mission has been? Are we to be told what Lord Northbrook advised? Are we to have Papers laid before us? We know that in the course of last Session a Conference was summoned, and that Her Majesty's Government was represented at that Conference, and we know that that Conference failed in its result. We know also that there were in connection with that Conference very important proposals made and very important communications between Her Majesty's Government and that of France. But we do not know what has happened since—we do not know at all in what position matters stand. We were told that they were urgent then, and they cannot be less urgent now, unless something has happened of which we have no idea, and it is very important that we should be told at the very earliest moment what is the position of the Government in regard to Egyptian affairs, and when information is to be given to us on the subject. I have no doubt the Government will give an early day for bringing this matter before us in a Constitutional and proper manner when they ask for the Vote in Supply. But we must not be content with merely having a discussion upon the Vote in Supply for the military operations. We ought to have an opportunity of considering the information which no doubt will be presented to us in regard to the Egyptian policy generally, and the policy which cannot be discussed upon a mere question of Supply. I hope, therefore, that the Government will find time to enable the House to discuss that policy fairly and fully. There is another matter mentioned in Her Majesty's Speech, and upon which there is very great and very natural anxiety—I mean the condition of affairs in South Africa. The hon. Member for East Cumberland (Mr. S. Howard), in his speech, gave us some information—I do not know whether it is to be regarded as official—that preparations are already being made for military operations in the Transvaal. I think we ought to be told whether that is so, and we ought to have full information on that subject. But I observe it is stated in Her Majesty's Speech that Papers are to be presented on that subject; and therefore I do not think it necessary for me now to go further into the question, or to refer to it more, than to make a note of it as one which it will be our duty to further consider on another occasion. One other point there is which I must notice, because it is not included in the Speech. I think that if the information that we have received in the public journals is correct, it is a matter of great interest, on which we naturally expect some information. We are informed that the Government have agreed to join, with the other Powers, a Conference on the subject of the Congo and of West Africa. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] I see the right hon. Gentleman appears to dissent from that. I can only say that the statement is made and published; and if not true, it is well that attention should be called to the subject, because the matter is one of considerable importance, and of great interest to the commercial community of this country, and in regard to the civilization of Western Africa, as well as, indeed, of very great interest generally to all those who are anxious for the promotion and extension of civilization generally; and I hope the right hon. Gentleman may be in a position to give the House some information as to the position of affairs in that part of the world.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, there has been a perfect calmness of tone pervading the speech of the right hon.

Sir Stafford Northcote

Gentleman, which I shall endeavour to imitate. It appears to me that it is wise that we should keep as nearly as we can to the ancient custom of Parliament in regard to discussions on the Address. Polemical discussion cannot possibly lead on this occasion to any result; and the premature entrance into it has no other effect, I think, than that of rendering it more difficult to deal with the practical issues when the proper time for them arrives. I therefore thank the right hon. Gentleman, and I will endeavour to follow the good example he has set. The right hon. Gentleman began his speech with a just and grateful compliment to my hon. Friends the Mover and the Seconder of the Address for the ability with which they discharged their difficult task. In that compliment I entirely concur; and the only difference from the right hon. Gentleman that I should make is this—that he thought it necessary to draw a distinction between the Mover and the Seconder, which distinction I am not disposed to draw at all. I perfectly admit that the right hon. Gentleman has the entire right to express his own opinion upon matters that were said by either of those Gentlemen; but he will agree with me that, on the occasion of moving and seconding the Address, there is invariably allowed to the two Gentlemen who perform that Office, by the kindness and the indulgence of the House, a certain degree of licence, a certain degree of latitude—I will not say licence—and the sentiments they utter are by no means to be taken as adopted by the House simply because the House concurs in the Motion which they make. With that observation I think the House will not be of opinion that that liberty was exceeded on the present occasion; and, as the right hon. Gentleman said, both my hon. Friends showed themselves to be possessed of a power of speech well entitling them, when they think fit, to take part in the debates and discussions of the House. In referring to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman I will notice first, because I can very briefly dispose of it, the reference to the subject of the Congo—a Conference which goes beyond the subject of the Congo—and I rather think the expression, though I am not quite sure, is that the subject of it embraces Western Africa in general. I am not quite sure of the phrase; but in substance I believe I am correct. It was impossible for us to advise any reference to that subject in the Speech of Her Majesty, because it had not reached such a stage of ripeness as would have enabled us to make a positive communication to the House. It was felt by Her Majesty's Government to be necessary to obtain certain preliminary information, and that preliminary information was only obtained in such time as to enable the acceptance of the proposal for a Conference to go from this country so lately as yesterday, from which the right hon. Gentleman will perceive that we were not in a position to make a communication to the House through the medium of the Speech. I believe we shall be able to lay information on the subject before the House very shortly, and I think the House will find that the subject opens hopeful and not unpleasant prospects to the country, so far as we are able to estimate what may probably be the attitude of the Powers on this subject. The right hon. Gentleman has referred with a just reserve to the subject of South Africa. My hon. Friend the Mover of the Address aimed, I think, at depicting what he deemed to be a just position on this subject—namely, that we ought to make up our own minds as to that which we deem to be necessary, either for the honour or for the just interests of the country; and, having made up our minds, to adhere firmly to the intention so formed. That is, I believe, a perfectly accurate description of the present position. In framing the Convention of 1884, we certainly endeavoured to proceed on the lines of moderation; but that was with the view that, having proceeded on those lines, the stipulations contained in that Convention must be respected, and it would be our duty both ourselves to adhere to them, and likewise to expect, and if necessary require, that they should be adhered to by others. That is the direction in which it will be our duty to move. We shall move in that direction, and I think, as far as we are able to judge, in entire concurrence and harmony with the Government of Cape Colony; and I must say, although recent events have been in certain respects painful, yet I will not assume that they have yet received their final colour, even as far as the Transvaal is concerned, while I think we may contemplate with great satisfaction this important fact—that, perhaps for the first occasion in the recent history of South African controversy, there is a general sentiment in the population as to the course of policy that ought to be pursued, and the old distinction of Dutch feeling and Anglican feeling, so far as our information yet goes, is no longer in existence. I am not speaking of the population of the Cape Colony. I must not speak as if we were in possession of final and complete information. The House will recollect that these matters are transmitted by telegraph, which, although it has the advantage in giving us information at an extremely early date, yet necessarily limits its character as compared with that given by the old method. But, so far as our knowledge goes, I think I am justified in the statement I have made to the House. With regard to the subject of Egypt, the right hon. Gentleman observed that we had promised information in the shape of Papers as far as South Africa is concerned; but that we had made no similar promise with regard to Egypt. The reason is a very simple one. In the case of South Africa, Papers are laid on the Table from time to time; but in the case of Egypt there has been an almost constant and scarcely intermittent flow; and although it is perfectly true that there is no reference to the subject of Papers in the Speech, yet Papers have actually been laid before the House by my noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Those Papers, I believe, will come down to the end of September, and will include general information with respect to Egypt, excepting those matters in connection with finance which are specially embraced in the function of Lord Northbrook, and particularly, I will say, they will give to the House the latest information which we have obtained from General Gordon. The right hon. Gentleman observed that we have been silent for a long period respecting General Gordon. It is quite true, and the reason why we were silent was a very good reason—a reason applicable to the conduct both of Governments and individuals with great advantage; and it is, they should be silent when they have nothing to say. The extraordinary difficulties which General Gordon has had to cope with have had the effect of keeping Her Majesty's Government and the country in almost entire ignorance, not so much of his position, but of his views. We have had from other parts incidentally, casually, but still in no inconsiderable quantity taken together, indications as to his actual position, so far as security is concerned; but with respect to his views, I may say that until the arrival of telegrams perfectly recent we have no means of pronouncing upon them. In these circumstances, the course we have taken is, that never has a disparaging or questioning word passed from the mouth, so far as I know, of any Member of Her Majesty's Government. I did think it unfortunate when the right hon. Gentleman himself, at a very early period of the last Session, thought it necessary to say that the Mission of General Gordon had failed. I protested against that declaration at the time, because I felt this—that the Mission of General Gordon must not be considered merely with reference to what it achieved; but also with reference to what it prevented. We must remember the tremendous dangers affecting the whole of Egypt, possibly affecting countries beyond Egypt, which the great catastrophe which happened to the army of General Hicks in November last appeared to threaten. The whole of these dangers have been arrested, and the evil has been kept within local limits through the action of General Gordon; and even if this result had been the only result, it was one of the greatest importance with reference to the welfare of Egypt, and with reference to the state of the Eastern portion of the world. I will only, on the present occasion, refer very briefly to one or two matters mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman says that within a short time after the Mission of General Gordon took place he found he was not to be supported. Now, the right hon. Gentleman will recollect—I do not remember the precise date, I think the 8th of April, but I am not quite sure—a telegram was received from General Gordon, in which he expressed his warm thanks for the support he had received. I think it was earlier than the 8th of April—["No, no!"]—at any rate, on a certain day he expressed his warm thanks for that support. What happened? Almost immediately afterwards General Gordon thought it necessary to centre his policy, and found his policy upon the Mission of Zebehr Pasha. With regard to that Mission, that was undoubtedly a great and sudden change of opinion on the part of General Gordon, because very shortly before he had deprecated in the strongest manner the Mission of Zebehr Pasha. Whether Her Majesty's Government were, right or wrong in declining to send Zebehr Pasha, they were perfectly aware that it was fraught with great embarrassment to General Gordon, and great difficulty was introduced into their relations with General Gordon. But I may remind the House, in the first place, of the state of opinion which prevailed here with respect to the Mission of Zebehr Pasha—such a state of opinion that I very much doubt whether at that time one-tenth part of this House would have been ready to support or tolerate that Mission. Secondly, I must observe this—it is a most important point—when, unhappily, it came about that immediately after we were obliged to make that abrupt refusal, there came the interruption of the telegraph, and the impossibility of communicating with him and putting him in possession of our ideas, or receiving his ideas; and therefore there was much doubt, much embarrassment, and a state of opinion which I think it may be said that those who differed from us were not slow to profit by, and to lay numerous charges against Her Majesty's Government. However, Sir, that, happily, has passed by, and we are enabled to state what we think with respect to the astonishing gallantry and resource displayed by General Gordon. The House does not commit itself, on the occasion of an Address of this kind, to a single sentiment that is contained in the Speech, and I think it is well that the House should not deviate from that form of proceeding, because the precedent might be dangerous; but I am quite sure that among those who hear me there are many who would very gladly concur in the sentiment of the Speech with regard to General Gordon if the form of our proceedings permitted of such a course, and that the House, as well as Her Majesty, is of opinion that the energy, courage, and resources so conspicuously displayed by him deserve warm acknowledgment. It is asked what we mean by "painful uncertainties." We might, perhaps, if we had not been afraid in a case so difficult of placing too cheerful a colour upon intelligence—we might have advised that the Speech from the Throne should say that the general tone and tendency of the recent intelligence from the Soudan was satisfactory. I think, at any rate, it is not going too far for a Minister to express that opinion in the Speech, of course with the reserve that must necessarily attach to any opinion founded on information so imperfect as is ours, and amidst so many uncertainties as attach to a set of circumstances in a country at that distance and existing under these peculiar conditions. But the right hon. Gentleman asked, and was entitled to ask—"What do you mean by commending General Gordon for the defence of Khartoum? And is your policy with regard to Khartoum what it was?" Certainly it is. There has been no change in the policy of the Government in respect to Khartoum. If there had been such a change it would have been the prime duty of the Government to have made it known to the House of Commons. But what we understand, and believe to be the case, from the information before us, is that the defence of Khartoum was concluded by General Gordon to be a matter of absolute necessity, not for his own safety only, but likewise for the safety of those to whom he was committed, and who had committed themselves to him in regard to carrying forward the operations that were necessary to hold off the assailants that surrounded him. That, Sir, is the reason why the words "defence of Khartoum" are introduced into the Speech, and not because we consider there ought to be a retrocession from the policy previously announced. The right hon. Gentleman will now quite understand that "painful uncertainties" refer merely to the grave and serious doubts which I am afraid I must say still hang over the fate of Colonel Stewart. That is a subject on which there will be, as the right hon. Gentleman said, an universal feeling of anxiety and sympathy; and he will, I think, feel that it was a not very unnatural impression on our part that, under all the circumstances, and with the remarkable manner in which Colonel Stewart has participated in these gallant and heroic proceedings, there should be that mention of him in the Speech from the Throne. I do not think there is reason why we should abandon hope, though the apprehensions are certainly grave. All that we know about Colonel Stewart is laid actually on the Table, and will, I trust, be in the hands of Members in the course of a few days. Of course, with regard to the question of supporting General Gordon, the right hon. Gentleman knows that we have been limited by those peculiar conditions of climate attaching to a country like Egypt, and especially of the use of the River Nile as a means of military operations. It has not been a voluntary or capricious delay on our part; but we have felt that it would be improper to expose a mass of British soldiers, in defiance of all reasonable calculations of prudence, even for such an important object as conveying aid to General Gordon. It was our duty to ascertain, as far as we could, what the condition of General Gordon was; and it was our duty, in considering how aid could be supplied to him, to take into view the best means—even, under the most favourable circumstances, means of extreme difficulty—of bringing the Forces of Her Majesty to the point at which their presence would be useful. The right hon. Gentleman also wished to know what information and when information would be given with respect to the subject of Lord Northbrook's Mission. The present position of that matter is as nearly as possible this—We are under the belief that Lord Northbrook will quit Alexandria to-morrow, and that the space of about a week would bring him back, I hope, safe and sound, to this country. I need not say that it was his duty to avail himself of the whole time of his stay in Egypt—during which he really displayed an activity that we have viewed with pleasure, but with some surprise at the amount of fatigue he was able to undergo—it was his duty to avail himself of the whole of that time before endeavouring to bring into shape the important recommendations that he may have to make. No doubt, shortly after he returns he will have those recommendations in form. It will be the duty of the Government, and, in point of fact, the policy of the Government indicates that the Government recognize the necessity of giving to these recommendations their immediate consideration; and the result of that consideration, and the steps they may think fit to take in prosecution of it, will be made the subject of the earliest practicable communication to Parliament. I pass, then, to another question—the great subject that has attracted the heart and mind of the country, especially within the last two months—I mean the representation of the people. The right hon. Gentleman criticized the expressions of my hon. Friend the Secunder of the Address in his able speech; but I think there was an omission in his critical notice which he will forgive me if I supply. He cannot, I think, have failed to observe that while my hon. Friend—both my hon. Friends—delivered their own opinions conscientiously and clearly in respect to the duty of the Government, and the duty of the House to follow a certain course of policy, they both of them, in the strictest manner—and certainly the Secunder no less than the Mover of the Address—abstained from anything that could by possibility be construed as a menace to the House of Lords. Now, considering that the subject of menace to the House of Lords has been long the greatest and most favourite topic of complaint, I think I am right in taking note of, and recording, that undeniable feature of the speeches of the Mover and Secunder of the Address. Now, what am I to say of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite upon this subject? He was pleased to take notice of what he thought an improvement in the tone of the Speech from the Throne. He said that—“The Speech from the Throne in February directed our attention particularly to the Franchise Bill; while the Speech from the Throne at present directs our attention to the subject of the representation of the people, which may include a Bill for the redistribution of seats, or any other portion of the great question of Parliamentary Reform.” The doubt, the friendly doubt, that has arisen in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman, is to know whether we intend to depart from the course we took in the last Session of Parliament. Now, Sir, as far as that doubt is concerned—and a certain degree of pain generally accompanies the existence of doubt on an important subject—I can relieve the mind of the right hon. Gentleman, and, in fact, I believe I had relieved it by the Notice I have given to-night that tomorrow it will be my duty to move for leave of the House to bring in a Bill for amending the Representation of the People, which is precisely the same title that was given to the Franchise Bill last Session. I observe the technical words. If I had given it more briefly it would have been a Notice to ask leave for to-morrow to introduce the Franchise Bill. The House will, I hope, make no difficulty in giving leave for its introduction. It will then have the Bill in its hands, and then, no doubt, it will be perfectly legitimate for any Gentleman who thinks it his duty to make observations, with whatever scope and breadth he may think fit, on the subject of that Bill. But the right hon. Gentleman used some conciliatory words, of which, I am afraid, I must test the value. Nothing could be more gentle than the tone of the right hon. Gentleman; and I trust it will be felt, even by the younger Members of this House, who have not yet had as much experience as some of us have had of what may be called Parliamentary vicissitudes, and the real difficulties of carrying on public affairs. I trust it may be felt that the difficulties in which we stand involve grave, serious, and solemn responsibilities; and that, whatever opinions we may entertain, and whatever conclusions we may feel ourselves compelled to abide by, the maintenance of that gentleness and quietness of tone, of which the right hon. Gentleman has set us a good example to-night, is a duty incumbent on all hon. Members of this House. Now, Sir, what is, after all, the contention of the right hon. Gentleman? He says there are two parts of this subject. He thinks that the effort of Parliament ought to be how to bring about a proper system of representation; and that this cannot be done unless the two parts of the subject—extension of the franchise and the redistribution of seats—are combined together; they must be considered together; they must be treated as one subject; and he earnestly trusts that Her Majesty's Government will consent to treat them as one subject. What is the meaning of these words? In one sense, and that a most substantial sense, it has always been our desire to treat them as one subject; and here I ought to refer to a particular observation of the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the phraseology of the Speech.

Mr. Gladstone

It speaks of Parliament as being brought together to consider the great subject of the representation of the people in Parliament. Well, Sir, what does that mean? Supposing we have our way—supposing that what we think the dictates of wisdom and prudence found their way to the minds of those who are concerned—supposing that, in consequence, the subject of the franchise is disposed of without difficulty—does the right hon. Gentleman suppose that we should be stickling for time on the subject of redistribution? On the contrary, there is no degree of pressure that could be applied to us to which we should not readily answer. It would have been most improper if we had advised the Crown to confine the Speech to the subject of the franchise. It would have been as good as saying that we totally excluded the hope of that reasonable accommodation which, we trust, may be obtained—so much so that we, quite as much as he, from the language of the Speech, desire to treat these two great portions—not the only portions—but these two great portions of the question of Reform as one subject, but as one subject, the parts of which are to be taken in their proper order, and are not to be so disposed and accumulated one upon the top of the other, so that the safety of the whole shall be endangered. It is but right that, without anger or warmth, I should express what I sorrowfully believe to be the true construction of the right hon. Gentleman's words. I am afraid that the true construction of his words is this—that by what he has called, and fairly called, his most “earnest trust,” and with the most winning gentleness of phrase, he simply asks the majority in this House to abandon, after the experience of the last two months, the course which they took without and before the experience of the last two months. That is the request of the right hon. Gentleman. The request of the right hon. Gentleman, I am afraid, is this—“Adopt our views, pursue our methods of proceeding, recede from every declaration you have made; turn topsy-turvey all that you have said about the absolute necessity for the purpose of practically getting through the subject of separating and severing the Bill upon seats and the Bill upon franchise, and then, when you have gone through that process, and undertaken to wear a white sheet, you may rely upon it that we, the minority in this House and the majority in the House of Lords, having completely conquered you, and completely discredited and dishonoured you in the face of those to whom you have made contrary professions, shall be most happy to concur with you in carrying into effect what you propose.” Now, Sir, is that a hopeful state of things? Am I wrong in my construction of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman? I would wish with all my heart that some of those interruptions, some of those cries of “No, no, no!” that we occasionally hear from various quarters on the opposite side of the House, were at this moment to arrest my progress and assure me that I am wrong. But I see hon. Gentlemen, like the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) sitting perfectly satisfied with what I have said. They will forgive the musical and gentle tones of the right hon. Gentleman with which his intentions are declared for the sake of the substance contained beneath them. How does this matter really stand? I must, after what the right hon. Gentleman has said, say a few words on my view of the case, and what I think is the view of the Government. They shall be very few; but they will fulfil the pledge I gave; they will contain nothing that ought to irritate or offend, nor will they attempt to discuss the question; they will simply aim at making plain and intelligible the situation in which we stand. There has been some reference to-night, in one of the speeches, to the conduct of the people in the course of the wonderfully active and extended gatherings and discussions on this great subject. There were few, but still there were certain, exceptions to the order and mildness of conduct which have marked the whole conduct of the nation upon the subject. With regard to these exceptions, I learn, like others, through the newspapers, what has happened at Birmingham; and, again, I learnt, if possible, with even greater regret, what happened personally to Lord Salisbury. I then learnt, though it came from the other side, of the outrages that had taken place in the city of Portadown in Ireland. For my part, if I refer to this subject, I must refer to it first with a strong expression of my extreme admiration of the general conduct of the people with regard to the whole matter. They have shown the greatest triumph of civilization in the capacity of the masses of the nation—sometimes greater, sometimes smaller—to meet together and to discuss questions of the deepest interest, on which the strongest difference prevailed, and yet show respect for every difference of opinion, and, above all, to maintain absolutely the laws of order. I will not do what I might be tempted to do, and will not express my regret about the language and the proceedings that might have been connected with the origin of these infractions of order; I reserve any criticism of that kind until the period when the subject can be controversially debated, which it cannot be by me to-night. I wish to record in the strongest manner my disapproval—I may say my grave condemnation—of all breaches of order in connection with this question, even under circumstances of temptation, or even incitement. The line between order and disorder is a definite line—the question of what is incitement and what is provocation is open to argument and dispute; but the line of order is a definite line, and the maintenance of it is necessary for the honour of the people. I should condemn any disorder in point of policy; and I should condemn it on principle if I did not believe it to be inexpedient. On this subject I am certain I speak the sentiments of my Colleagues as well as my own. What is the position in which we stand with regard to this great and solemn subject? We have, on the one hand, a considerable majority in the House of Lords which has not faced the plain question of affirmative or negative, but which has, by a collateral movement, arrested the progress of the Franchise Bill. We have, on the other hand, a large majority in the House of Commons, a majority so large that on the third reading it was not thought fit to challenge the delivery of the Speaker's opinion that the "Ayes" have it. I know that we had a discussion in which it appeared, on the testimony of two perfectly credible and most respectable Gentlemen, that both of them had uttered a negative; but I do not think that either of them disguises the fact that the negative was so uttered that it was not meant to reach the Chair; and negatives that do not reach the Chair—I believe I am speaking sound

Parliamentary Law in saying—are no negatives at all. Well, Sir, that is our view of the position of the two powers that stand face to face; and, disguise it how you may, the real question is which majority is to prevail. Our contention is, Sir, without wandering into the problems of abstract politics—our contention is that upon the facts of the case before us the majority of this House ought to prevail. Well, why ought it to prevail? What is the function of a majority? I own it appears to me to be expected by some of the Party opposite that the minority is to have the privileges of the majority. What I understand to be the right of the minority—the positive right of the minority—is the right to fair, full, and free discussion, so that none of its arguments may be kept back, but always placed fairly and fully in the view of the country. That I understand to be the right of the minority. But, Sir, upon this occasion we have at all times gone further, and, while firmly exerting the right of the majority, and determined never to recede from it—we have always admitted, and not only admitted but asserted, that that right of the majority ought to be exercised in a spirit of equity and gentleness. We have always desired to give every assurance that could be given; we began by volunteering, which was an unusual step, declarations on the subject of redistribution, which, if they were defective, were not altogether unimportant. They were, it is true, my own declarations; but in their general scope they were successively taken up by other Members of the Government—I think by two Members of the Government whom I now see sitting on the Bench—my noble Friend the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) and the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain)—as they were likewise in the other House of Parliament. Would it not have been a natural course, if there had been a disposition on the part of the minority to push matters forward, for them to say—"Your declarations are good as far as they go, but they do not go far enough, or they ought to go further; you ought to tell us more about what your intentions are." Is it fair or right that the minority should make upon the majority demands which that majority cannot concede without abandoning all its most solemn pledges? We are ready and desirous to meet you by giving you every assurance as to the procedure upon redistribution, which can be given without fatally mixing up together two questions over which, when once mixed, we should have lost all effective power to prosecute to an issue. What is it that you ask of us? It is a surrender at discretion; it is a betrayal of the cause we have taken up. Ask us—and then the gentleness of tone which the right hon. Gentleman observed will be even more appropriate than it was to-night—what you think we can give; but to ask us to surrender at discretion, to ask us to pass under the Caudine Forks, to ask us, the majority, and the large majority of the people who are governed by representative government, to give in to the small, the comparatively small minority in this House which did not think it necessary to assert its convictions on the third reading of this Bill, because there is a majority against it in the House of Lords—do you, as reasonable men, each in your own Chamber, think that that is a demand which it is possible for us to meet? That is your contention; what is ours? Our contention is that while we ought to show all consideration for the minority, who, as yet, have given us no light at all upon the subject of in what any further consideration should be shown—that while we are willing and most desirous to show all consideration for the minority, while our desire is to press to the uttermost the subject of Reform, including the subject of redistribution of seats, to follow immediately upon the franchise, yet we cannot accede to the terms which involve the forfeiture of all our most solemn pledges, of all our deepest convictions, of all our most recent and reiterated declarations. Is our contention, after all, so very unreasonable? Does the right hon. Gentleman see no danger in the state of things that is before him? If this Bill be again—I will not say rejected—but put aside in the House of Lords, does the right hon. Gentleman think that when the controversy is resumed the question of the popular franchise, with or without redistribution of seats, will be the only question raised before the country? [An hon. MEMBER: That is a menace.] Sir, I have hoped against hope; I have laboured with all my heart, to the best of my ability, to confine this controversy within its present limits. I have no doubt there are those who would not be sorry to extend it, and I must say their generosity in consenting to allow me to strive to limit it I am bound to acknowledge; but I am sorry to say that from those who stand in the position of the Leaders of the opposite Party we have heard nothing down to the present time that encourages me to believe there can be any useful result from these efforts. I shall persevere in them notwithstanding, because I am not to assume that there may not be those of different political associations from mine, Members of the Conservative Party, but who, notwithstanding, are not willing to play the rash game of staking the fate of their order and the balance of the Constitution on the opinion they have formed with regard to the severance of the franchise from redistribution. I have been moved by a double motive, and I am moved by a double motive in what I say. We have met here—for what? Not, so far as I am aware, to discuss a new Franchise Bill. I frankly own I have said all I have to say. I believe that the whole of those who sit on this side of the House, or very nearly the whole, have said all that they have to say. Of course, they have no right and no disposition to prevent those who think otherwise from reiterating their arguments if they believe that those arguments are likely to produce any useful effect; but on every ground I cherish the hope that our discussions on the Franchise Bill may not be greatly prolonged, not merely for the important purpose of saving the time of the House, though that is very important in relation to the limits of physical strength—which we so seriously press upon, and in relation to those other subjects which the right hon. Gentleman expresses his anxiety to have time to discuss; but I am afraid a prolonged discussion of the Franchise Bill by this House may not tend to the easy settlement of the question. After all, what we have to do is to make a new appeal to the judgment of the other House of the Legislature. Our opinion is that most important evidence has been brought before the other House of the Legislature within the two months which have just passed. Take it as you like for the present; we shall be ready to discuss that when the time comes. Our desire is, that the consideration of that evidence should, as soon as possible, for the interests of all, come before the House of Lords, and that it should come not clouded and troubled by the effect of discussions, which might be angry discussions, in this House, with regard to which I am afraid the longer they are prolonged the greater will be the difficulties in settling the question. Why do we desire that this question should be settled? I desire it, I am not ashamed to say, on Conservative grounds. I desire it because I wish to secure the extension of the franchise, and afterwards of redistribution of seats, upon principles or rules, if that word is more applicable, which we have every desire to make intelligible to the House and to Gentlemen opposite. But, besides desiring that, I own I do desire that we should keep the question within its present narrow bounds. I deprecate this extension of the controversy; I do not wish it, and I will not be responsible for adding anything to it. Let Gentlemen who are desirous of combining redistribution with franchise take care lest they combine something more critical than either with them both. To the last I will not abandon the hope even of the Leaders of the Party opposite. Of the followers I cannot help entertaining some considerable hope. I tell the right hon. Gentleman that I most earnestly trust that he, while there is yet time, and those who sit around him, will join in the effort to keep this large and important question—I mean this franchise and redistribution question—apart from conjunction with other questions which he assuredly cannot wish to raise. [Opposition cries of "Why not?" and "Order!"] I own, Sir, I am taken by surprise, for I learn it is the desire of some Gentlemen sitting on the Conservative Benches to raise the question of organic change in the Constitution of the country. That is the only meaning which that energetic "Why not?" can possibly carry. I have often thought myself a great deal more Conservative than a great many of them are, and I am confirmed in that opinion by this exclamation. But it is far from my desire to enter into a conflict with anybody to-night. I have merely stated my desire, and I say that even now, at the eleventh hour and past the eleventh hour, I will not altogether allow the hope to be extinguished that the right hon. Gentleman may join in delivering this question from the dangerous neighbourhood of another question which, as a Conservative statesman, he ought to be the very last man in the House to wish to see connected with it.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: The right hon. Gentleman stated that it was far from his intention to enter into a conflict with my right hon. Friend or anybody else in the course of his observations; but the last 20 minutes of his remarks contained nothing but direct attack. The right hon. Gentleman disclaimed any intention of using words of menace; but what is his idea of a menace? He warned us against the danger of a great organic change. The right hon. Gentleman also said that he would not join in any effort to produce such a change until he had exhausted every other means of dealing with the question.

MR. GLADSTONE: No; I am not aware that I used those words.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: I will accept any words which the right hon. Gentleman may suggest; but that was his meaning—[Mr. GLADSTONE: No.]—and was so understood by his supporters below the Gangway. The whole of the last part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech directly menaced the House of Lords and the Opposition in the House of Commons, that if they should not do as the right hon. Gentleman wishes there will be an agitation for an organic change in the Constitution; and he gave us to understand pretty clearly that if that should be the case we need not look for much assistance from him. The right hon. Gentleman began by stating that he had most carefully abstained, during the whole of his Scotch peregrinations, from saying anything disrespectful of the House of Lords.

MR. GLADSTONE: No; I never said anything of the kind. What I said was that all my efforts had been directed towards narrowing the field of the controversy.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: But how did the right hon. Gentleman proceed to narrow the field of the controversy? He pointed out that during the last 50 years the House of Lords had taken no step for the advancement of public liberty, or for the public interest. That is a very strong statement, and that is the special mode which the right hon. Gentleman has adopted of narrowing the field of controversy between the two Houses. Why, the whole of the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman had one tendency only—namely, to bring into the disrepute and disesteem of the masses of the people the votes and position of the House of Lords; and the menaces of the right hon. Gentleman have culminated in his speech to-night. As a Member of the House of Commons, I will not shrink from any responsibility that may devolve upon me in consequence of the course which I pursue. We shall have to discuss this Bill when it comes before us. If the right hon. Gentleman can show any other reasons than those hitherto assigned with so little force and effect upon the matured judgment of the country why this question of the franchise should be altogether disconnected from that of the redistribution of seats, let him adduce them. Hitherto, however, we have heard nothing from the right hon. Gentleman but the language of menace and violence, and to such language there is only one reply—that we will not be guided by such considerations as the right hon. Gentleman has brought before us.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he thought it strange that no Member of the Government had thought it necessary to reply to the noble Lord who had last addressed the House. The statements made by the Mover of the Address had confirmed a suspicion he had long entertained, that the question of the franchise did not admit of any compromise properly so called. That hon. Member had said that under no circumstances must the two measures be made dependent upon each other, and the Prime Minister had more than endorsed that view. On the other hand, the Opposition entertained the notion that under no circumstances could the two measures be separated; and they held that an absolute guarantee ought to be given that one of the two Bills should not become law and take effect unaccompanied by the other. The Mover of the Address had told the House that if the Opposition were dissatisfied with the views on redistribution which the Government had expressed, the Government would, by grouping boroughs, or in some other way, prevent the swamping of the agricultural classes by the voters in towns. What was the value of such guarantees? In his opinion they were insufficient and unsatisfactory; for the right hon. Gentleman could not guarantee that his Government would remain in Office for three months longer; indeed, if the right hon. Gentleman should meet with his deserts he would not remain Prime Minister for a fortnight. Hon. Members below the Gangway on the Ministerial side of the House wished that the Franchise Bill should pass in order that an election might be held under the new franchise with the old constituencies. That was the wish of the extreme Party in the House. [Cries of "No!"] And as that Party almost invariably got their own way, what guarantee could the right hon. Gentleman give that, with the best intentions in the world, he would be able to pass his Redistribution Bill in the teeth of the obstruction of his own Party? The right hon. Gentleman spoke in terms of condemnation of the disorders that had attended some of the franchise demonstrations. But was it possible for the right hon. Gentleman to suppose that his language that evening would not be taken as a direct incitement to greater disorders and outrages? The concluding portions of the right hon. Gentleman's speech were nothing else than a prolonged menace against the House of Lords. They might be placed in a serious, grave, and solemn position; but who was responsible for it? Why did the right hon. Gentleman place Parliament and the country in this position by adopting a method of procedure in connection with the question of Reform which no one had more strongly condemned than he had himself? [MR. GLADSTONE: Never.] The right hon. Gentleman on one occasion characterized as base and contemptible any Government who, when introducing the question of Reform, should omit from their proposals that which was the most important part of the subject—namely, redistribution.

MR. GLADSTONE asked for a definite reference to the speech which the hon. Member had in mind.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he had not the quotation with him, as he had not intended to speak; but he believed his statement was correct. Over and over again the leading Members of the present Government and of the Liberal Party had condemned in no measured terms the method they now proposed to adopt in dealing with the question of Parliamentary Reform. From what they had heard that night in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, he was bound to suspect that the right hon. Gentleman had throughout some dark intentions on the subject, and that he had adopted this novel method of dealing with it in order to raise a cloud of controversy in the country, which would help to obscure his misdoings. In one paragraph of the Speech from the Throne they were told that there was painful uncertainty in the information received from Egypt; but that was the character of the whole history of the present Government. Their whole proceedings since they had been in Office had been nothing but a chapter of uncertainties. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, in his speech, had described the position with regard to the franchise from his view of the case, and had wound up by saying—“Which majority ought to prevail? The majority in the House of Lords or the majority in the House of Commons.” In his opinion, the majority which ought to prevail in this matter was the majority which truly represented the views of the people; and when the right hon. Gentleman talked of the accumulated views which he hoped would now be considered by the House of Lords, what was the evidence of them to which he referred? Except in Scotland, where the Conservative Party had always been in an insignificant minority, as far as he had observed the demonstrations that had taken place, a very large amount of feeling had been called forth in support of the action of the House of Lords. That feeling he felt sure would be shown at the next General Election, whenever the Government dared to take an Election, and would have the effect of removing the right hon. Gentleman from a position his tenancy of which had resulted in seriously endangering the country.

MR. GRANTHAM said, the derisive cheers of hon. Members opposite at the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire's (Mr. Chaplin's) inability to name the occasion on which the Prime Minister had called it base and contemptible were somewhat premature, for he (Mr. Grantham) was in a position not only to name the occasion, but to read the words he then used. It was on the 12th of April, 1866, that he said, after speaking on the importance of redistribution—

Mr. Chaplin

“I had not thought it necessary to say this, because it seemed to me so obvious that nothing could be more contemptible and base than the conduct of a Government which could give forth, with a view of enlisting the generous confidence of its supporters, that it would deal with the subject of Reform and would stand or fall by its propositions, and which all the while could silently exclude from the scope of their declaration all portions of that question, except only the reduction of the franchise, though among such questions we find one only second in importance to that of the franchise itself.” (3 Hansard, [182] 1144-5.)

He had listened with the greatest regret to the language the right hon. Gentleman had used, for it must have been manifest to everyone who heard him that from the beginning to the end of his speech he had but one view in his mind, and that was that the majority in that House which he had led to victory last Session was to be led again by him to victory without the slightest concession being made. The right hon. Gentleman had told them that the minority had a certain right of free discussion, but nothing more, and that the majority had the absolute right to control the practical destinies of the nation. That was not the view which he had always held of the position of a minority, for a few years ago he published an article in a periodical in which he urged the right of a minority to endeavour to change itself into a majority; and he even went so far as to say that it was the right of a minority to do that by obstruction. [MR. GLADSTONE: No.] The right hon. Gentleman said “No;” but that view was expressed in a public print, and the whole subject of that article was the question of obstruction. It was true, however, that at that time the right hon. Gentleman was trying to justify the obstruction of the Irish Members; but it now seemed that the right hon. Gentleman's words applied only when they were obstructing a Conservative Government, and not when the obstruction affected a Liberal Government. The position in which Parliament was placed now was a very simple one. It was similar to that of 1872, when the House of Lords differed from the majority of the House of Commons on the question of the Ballot Act, and refused to pass a Bill which they believed was a bad Bill, and one which would not benefit the country. The Radical majority of the Commons threatened the House of Lords just as much then as now, but the Lords wisely took no notice of it; and what was the result? The Government, instead of giving way to temper, gave themselves up to framing a better measure; and after it had passed the House of Commons the following Session it was accepted by the House of Lords, and all true Liberals in the country joined the Conservative Party in saying—"Thank God, we have a House of Lords." It was the Constitutional right of the House of Lords to check hasty legislation. It had often in the past exercised that right to the great advantage and benefit of the country; and he failed to see why it should be now threatened, because on this particular question, which was one of procedure rather than of principle, it ventured to exercise its undoubted right. The Prime Minister had expressed his thanks to the advanced section of his followers for having allowed him to be so moderate. This was somewhat ominous as to the future course of the agitation. The Prime Minister had referred them to the remarks which he made with regard to redistribution when introducing the Franchise Bill, and said they ought to have accepted them as indicating the intentions of the Government; but they were at the time told that these merely represented the views of the Prime Minister himself, and that the subject had not been considered in the Cabinet. It was quite certain that the Conservative Party would not be satisfied with these shadowy allusions to redistribution. They would not put a rope round their own necks, as suggested by the Prime Minister, by passing the Franchise Bill without a Redistribution Bill. A great deal had been said as to the majorities by which the Bill was carried last Session. It was, however, an absolute misrepresentation of the case to state that the Franchise Bill had been carried by majorities of over 100 time after time. The great principle as to the separating redistribution and the franchise was only decided against the Opposition by about 30 votes. Did hon. Members opposite represent the country? He maintained that they did not; and, indeed, the majorities which were held up with such delight did not represent the opinions of hon. Gentlemen opposite themselves. They voted in fear and trembling of the local wirepullers. One Liberal Member had assured the House that at least 100 of his Colleagues on that side upon the clôture question were voting against their conscience, whilst another, last Session, had told them that he had voted black was white long enough. The Conservative Party believed that a majority in the country was behind them in this contest. The meetings held by them would in numbers, intelligence, and influence, compare well with those on the Liberal side. ["Oh, oh!"] Look at Manchester and Liverpool then. Why were they to be led with a rope round their neck? Why were they not entitled to more liberal treatment at the hands of their Liberal opponents? All that the Tory Party asked for was that the Redistribution Bill should become law during the same Parliament as the Franchise Bill. The matter having been so thoroughly thrashed out during the Recess, and in view of the statement that the Conservative Party were prepared to accept the Franchise Bill in the form in which it left the House last Session, he thought it was too bad, after all that had taken place, of the Prime Minister to come down to the House on the first night of the Session, and throw down the gauntlet in the way he had done, refusing any concession of the slightest importance.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY said, that whatever inconvenience might have been entailed on many Members of the House by the summons they had received to attend in Parliament that autumn, he felt sure that the gravity of the situation and the subjects referred to in the Most Gracious Speech from the Throne had caused them to come readily together to endeavour to assist by their deliberations in the best conduct of the government of the country. The points alluded to in that Speech were of great and grave importance. They had read with the greatest anxiety the accounts of the Expedition sent out to relieve that gallant soldier, General Gordon; they had watched with some anxiety, which must be shared by his right hon. Friend opposite, the probable cost of that Expedition, and they were desirous to know what means the Government would take to defray its cost, it being one of the canons laid down by the Prime Minister that Parliament should be consulted without delay when expenses of that sort had to be incurred. There was also the question of South Africa, which appeared to be full of the gravest danger to the prestige of this country, to the safety of our fellow-countrymen there, and also of those Native tribes whom we were bound in honour to protect. Moreover, the condition of our industrial population in the centres of commercial activity was such as to make them feel the deepest sympathy with the present distress; and he should have been glad to have found some of that sympathy expressed in the Speech, and perhaps some hope held out of an inquiry into the causes of the distress, or an indication that the Government were anxious to seek some measure by which it might be relieved. No less severe was the depression under which the agricultural population were labouring throughout the country. He recognized to the full the benefit which the present low prices conferred on the community in general; but that benefit was purchased at the cost of great loss to the cultivators of the soil; and he should have been glad to see that fact recognized, and the hope expressed that some means might be taken to alleviate the burdens under which the cultivator unjustly suffered. He rejoiced that all the agitation and counter-agitation which had been going on during the last two months—all the irresponsible talk on a thousand platforms—was about to cease; and he hoped that when the subject of contention was brought back to the arena where it could be properly discussed—namely, the floor of that House—the common sense of the whole people of this country would prevail, and it would be possible to find some mode by which a controversy, the prolongation of which could not but be hurtful to the best interests of the nation, though it might serve the ends of extreme Parties, might be brought to a termination. That feeling was much strengthened in his mind when he heard the speech of his right hon. Friend below him that night, in which he expressed, in all truth and honesty, his hope that the Government would take such steps as might enable the Conservative Party to co-operate with the Liberal Party in bringing about the settlement of that question. The Government had found themselves in want of a cry, and had taken up the question only after leaving it alone for four years. They had approached it from the point of view that they could not deal with the two questions of franchise and redistribution together, but could only deal with the more difficult one—that of redistribution—by putting under compulsion not only the House of Commons, but also the House of Lords. That method had gone against the strong feeling of the English character. An Englishman did not object to be led; but he did not like to be dragged with a rope round his neck. This was not a question of mere procedure; it was one affecting the future government of this country. If the question of redistribution was fairly settled, great good might come from it; whereas, if it were carried out on Party lines, the government of the country would then be practically handed over to one Party or the other. With reference to the speech of the Prime Minister that evening, he regretted that the Prime Minister had chosen to regard the language of the Leader of the Opposition as an invitation to abjure everything that they had done. The Prime Minister had told them that the Bill was to go up to the House of Lords with fresh evidence of the feeling of the country, and if that evidence had not its weight, so much the worse. But, in his opinion, there was a good deal of evidence on the other side, as had been admitted somewhat tardily by the leading journal. In 1832 they heard of no counter-agitation; there were no great meetings in favour of the action of the House of Lords. While professing a great desire for a settlement, the Prime Minister had made no move in the direction of conciliation. There was now a universal acceptance of the question of the franchise, which had not been the case in March; and he thought that the Prime Minister might have given them some assurance that he was ready to recognize this. He would venture to re-echo the words of the Prime Minister, and express a hope that, even at the eleventh hour, it was not too late to recognize the strength of these arguments. It was difficult really to sound the feeling of the country on the question by the meetings which had taken place in the autumn; there were vast numbers, no doubt, who were desirous of the franchise; but there were vast numbers who were apathetic on the subject. In the words of the Duke of Argyll, 2,000,000 of people were looking through the half-open doors. In considering a settlement of the question, it should be remembered that if there was high-handed action on one side it would be likely to be followed by stubborn resistance on the other.

MR. LABOUCHERE remarked that in the Queen's Speech he saw it stated that the energy, courage, and resource displayed by General Gordon deserved warm recognition. But the Government had absolutely no information about what was going on at Khartoum, as General Gordon had sent no despatches. How could they possibly tell whether General Gordon was defending Khartoum with energy and success, or whether he was roaming about the country destroying the Soudanese? What they did know of General Gordon did not increase his confidence in him in the slightest degree. General Gordon's instructions had been to evacuate Khartoum as soon as possible. As far as they could see, he certainly was not fulfilling these instructions, for the latest despatches showed that he was urging the Soudanese to slay the Mahdi. He did not wish to say anything about General Gordon; but he could not suppose that that was really the idea taken in the country or that House of what his duties were. This wonderful General did not send to tell them of anything that was taking place; all they knew was that he had bitterly complained of Her Majesty's Government having wished him to act as they desired, and not as he thought proper. General Gordon's wish was to maintain himself in the Soudan, and to establish there some form of Government which would be supported by us. According to all they could learn now, General Gordon did not appear to be in the slightest danger at Khartoum, but was able to send iron-clads to bombard the towns and villages of the Natives. And yet the Prime Minister had told them that these people were fighting for their liberty, and that the Soudan was to be absolutely and entirely independent of the Egyptian Government. What, then, was General Gordon's position? Were they supporting him or not? Were they sending Lord Wolseley to bring him back whether he would or not, or to aid him in those outrageous acts against men who, the Prime Minister said, were fighting for their independence? With regard to the paragraph in the Queen's Speech, which told them that further pecuniary provision would be required, he took a Division last Session when only £300,000 was asked; and when the new Vote should come before the House he would again divide on the subject. He believed that the feeling of the country with regard to Egypt was that we should clear out of it as soon as possible. He did not see why we, who had so many poor people among ourselves, should spend money either to sustain the Egyptian Government or to maintain Gordon in the Soudan. He had the greatest respect for Her Majesty's Government; but he confessed he had never been able to discover what their policy was with respect to Egypt or the Soudan. With regard to the Franchise Bill, the Lords had got another chance. Hon. Gentlemen opposite had complained of the words of menace used by the Prime Minister in the controversy. Did hon. Gentlemen know so little of the feeling in the country as not to be aware that if the Prime Minister had not done everything he possibly could to prevent the agitation going further it would have much exceeded the present demands? He could tell hon. Gentlemen opposite that there was not one of the many meetings which had been held throughout the country at which a resolution would not have been passed almost unanimously for the abolition of the House of Lords, and it was out of respect to the Prime Minister that that had not been done. The right hon. Gentleman had said that if the Bill was thrown out again by the Lords the agitation would assume a different character. That was a fact, and not a threat. He was speaking as an out-and-out Radical; and he could assure hon. Gentlemen that he sincerely trusted and prayed that the House of Lords would throw out the Bill, because he thought the time had come when they should do away with that obstructive Assembly. Thanks to the Prime Minister, the Lords had got another opportunity of reconsidering their conduct, and if they did not do so they must take the consequences, for then there would be such an agitation as would astonish Gentlemen opposite. Did those Gentlemen understand that the backbone of the Liberal Party was the Radicals, though they were not fitly represented in that House? There were some very able Radicals in the House, but there ought to be a great many more. There were Gentlemen who on the hustings professed the most noble Radical principles, but when they came into the House forgot those principles altogether; the country, however, was going to take that matter in hand, and was determined that it would be represented by men who would support its opinions. Gentlemen opposite talked of organic changes; but they would be astonished at the changes which would take place in the next five years.

MR. BOURKE said, he was not surprised that the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) should have been bewildered by some of the paragraphs in the Queen's Speech, because, certainly, the elaborate eulogiums poured upon General Gordon were very different from what had fallen from Her Majesty's Government on previous occasions. All they knew from General Gordon himself was that he was extremely disappointed with the conduct of Her Majesty's Government towards him. That was pointed out last Session, when such despatches proceeded from General Gordon as had never before been penned by a servant, civil or military, to his employers. But now they were told that General Gordon thanked Her Majesty's Government for the support they had given him. The Prime Minister was within his right in using that expression, because General Gordon, thinking that he was to be supported by Her Majesty's Government, did thank them for it. But from that day to this nothing could be more severe than the remarks of General Gordon on Her Majesty's Government. He was glad that even a tardy recognition had been made by Her Majesty's Government of General Gordon's services. He was not disposed to criticize in a hostile spirit that paragraph in Her Majesty's Speech, except so far as to say that they knew nothing whatever of "the energy, courage, and resource displayed by General Gordon" in his defence of Khartoum. He had no doubt that General Gordon had displayed the greatest energy, courage, and resource; but they were entirely without information on the subject, and, therefore, he looked forward to the Papers that were to be produced with a considerable amount of interest; but he very much doubted whether he should find in them any expression of thanks from General Gordon for the way in which he had been supported by Her Majesty's Government. There was one remark of the Prime Minister's which required some explanation. The right hon. Gentleman said that no change of policy was to be followed with regard to Khartoum. He did not believe that it would be possible for Her Majesty's Government to carry out the policy they originally announced with regard to it. An observation fell from the right hon. Gentleman afterwards, which clearly indicated that the course originally proposed by the Government as to Khartoum and the rest of the Soudan could not be maintained, because he said that General Gordon found himself under an absolute necessity of remaining at Khartoum for the safety of those who had committed themselves to him. It would be impossible for them to desert the people who had so faithfully supported General Gordon. Such a course would be received with execration by this country; and foreign nations would regard it with contempt. If the Government desired permanent prosperity in Egypt, the peaceful condition of the Soudan was absolutely necessary. He trusted, however, that the Government had given up the idea that the Soudanese were a people struggling for their liberty. Such an idea was totally inconsistent with the position and the Mission of General Gordon. At the end of last Session they had tried to get information as to the amount of money the Government proposed to spend on the Soudan Expedition; but they had failed. Immediately, however, after Parliament separated, the Government began to spend enormous sums upon it; and he asked whether it would not have been candid if they had taken the House into their confidence, and presented it with the estimates of their intended expenditure. The outlay would be very great, and though he did not doubt its necessity, he must attribute it to the pusillanimity and vacillation of Her Majesty's Government in not having adopted ordinary precautions a year, or even eight or nine months ago, which they had been repeatedly urged to do. He noticed that the advance of the troops to Dongola was mentioned in the Queen's Speech. He could not understand on what grounds the name of that place was inserted. He must assume there was some reason for it; but if the troops were to

he moved there only, it was certain that they would not effect General Gordon's release. He was sure the whole House would sympathize with the remark made by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government with respect to the exertions and activity of Lord Northbrook. He (Mr. Bourke) had no doubt the noble Lord had brought to the discharge of the very onerous duties imposed upon him by the Government all that ability and resource for which he was remarkable; but the Government, of course, were responsible for all he did, and he could not help expressing some regret that his first step should have been to advise the Government to break the law of Europe in a very serious manner. The Law of Liquidation was a most solemn compact entered into about two years ago, and the Concert of Europe was maintained more decidedly in regard to the Law of Liquidation than anything else. He did not desire to make the suspension of the Sinking Fund in itself a very great affair; but it was, no doubt, a very great infraction of the Law of Liquidation. It was, in fact, a laying hold of funds by the Egyptian Government when those funds did not belong to them; and it afforded not only a bad example to Eastern nations, but a very mischievous precedent could also be deduced from it by those nations which wished to repudiate their public engagements. All the Foreign Governments had protested against this step, and they had been brought into contest not only with them, but with the Caisse de la Dette and the international tribunals. This step was not merely a mischievous one; it was useless, for it only involved a matter of £300,000. and for the sake of this Her Majesty's Government advised the Egyptian Government to take a step so important, whereas it was very well known to financiers that there was a variety of ways in which these difficulties might have been avoided. As it was, the matter was left exactly as it stood before. Passing to another matter, he observed that mention was made of the West African Conference. He attached great importance to that Conference, and he believed that no more important question with regard to the future position of the commerce of this country had ever been raised. The interior of Africa opened up an unlimited field for British commerce. In these days of ultra-protective doctrines, it was desirable that England should show that she was in earnest about Free Trade, and should endeavour to secure a free market to our goods, which were now being met with hostile tariffs all over the world. He confessed he was a little nervous about what was going to take place in this Conference, owing to what had already occurred with respect to the Congo. They knew that a most mischievous Treaty would have been concluded with Portugal, which would have had a most disastrous effect upon the commerce of this country, had not the hon. Member for Manchester and others brought the question prominently before the House. The question of the Congo was a very important one. The Government, therefore, ought to be on their guard at the present time, especially considering the course which Germany had taken, and they should ascertain the exact position in which the country stood. England possessed at least 10 or 12 times more interest in these African rivers than all the other nations put together; and it was extraordinary that England should not have been asked her views with regard to the Conference until the last moment. England had already been prejudiced by the agreement between France and Germany. France took good care that her own rivers were excluded from the scope of the Conference; and both agreed that tolls and taxes might be levied on the other waterways to pay for necessary works—a provision under which almost any amount of taxes and differential duties could be imposed. He thought the country would be strengthening the hands of Her Majesty's Government if they made it known that they would be content with nothing less than absolute Free Trade for the great West African rivers, because that would open the door to commerce. It had been stated that if the waters of the Congo and the Niger were free the export of Manchester goods in a limited time would increase by many millions of pounds. In that case, he did not think there was any subject of greater importance than this which the Government could consider. This country might obtain enormous benefit from the Conference if it took place upon proper principles, and if the Government main tained a firm attitude with respect to the Governments of France and Germany. It was grossly unfair for France and Germany to put the Niger and the Congo upon one footing. The Niger had been a river for British commerce for many years. This country had a gunboat there to preserve order, and a British Consul who had made Treaties for the Natives in many parts of the river. The Consul was trusted and looked up to by all the French and German houses, and disputes were settled by him in a satisfactory manner. It was, therefore, the duty of the Government, before they entered into the Conference, to put their foot down and say that the Niger should not be treated in the same way as the Congo, unless all the rivers were made perfectly free.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, the remarks of his right hon. Friend who had just sat down divided themselves into two heads—first, those relating to Egypt; and, secondly, those relating to the Western Coast of Africa. In speaking of Egypt, his right hon. Friend chiefly went over the ground with which the House became familiar during the debates of last Session. He did not propose to reply in detail to his right hon. Friend's remarks, and thus inaugurate a debate on foreign policy, as the Government had announced in the Speech from the Throne that it was their intention to ask the House for a further grant, and a proper occasion would then arise. Upon that Vote the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends would have a full opportunity of urging their views. He, however, thought that the right hon. Gentleman was hardly entitled to say that now, for the first time, Her Majesty's Government had spoken in a manner eulogistic of General Gordon, because throughout all these debates they had given to that distinguished man a firm, loyal, and unflinching support. The only attack made upon General Gordon which he had in mind was made last Session by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite at the moment when the celebrated Slave Trade Proclamation became known in this country. Without waiting for General Gordon to be heard upon the subject in his own defence, they began attacking him, because they thought they might thereby strike the Government. The right hon. Gentleman should have addressed his question with regard to military details to another Department of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to have surpassed himself on this occasion in his efforts to place a different construction on facts than that they so plainly pointed to. Everybody knew that troops had been advanced to Don-gola, and that that place was the centre of military operations in the Soudan. The right hon. Gentleman went on to refer to the Law of Liquidation; but it was clearly stated by the Prime Minister that, until Lord Northbrook's Report was in the hands of the Government, it was impossible for them to enter into a discussion of the difficult financial questions which that Report would raise. Further Papers in regard to Egypt would be in the hands of Members to-morrow morning. There would also be a Paper containing additional telegrams relating to a subject of painful interest—the doubtful fate of Colonel Stewart. Lord Granville was of opinion that the House and the country would wish to have the information before them; and, therefore, these short telegrams had been put together in a single Paper. Incidentally, there would be found information as to the recapture of Berber by the forces of General Gordon. In addition, he would lay on the Table a further general Paper relating to Egypt, which would come down to the 30th of September last. There would also be a few Papers of considerable interest of rather later date, some giving the latest information from General Gordon. He made no complaint of what the right hon. Gentleman had said about the approaching Conference; but he was struck by the tremendous flourish of trumpets about the horrors of Protection, because it was only a few days ago that Lord Salisbury delivered at Dumfries something like a defence of Protection. It might, therefore, be hoped that the zeal of the right hon. Gentleman for Free Trade would not be confined to the West Coast of Africa, but would also be available for home consumption. What the right hon. Gentleman said about the freedom of trade and navigation on the waters of Africa he accepted in toto in the name of the Government. Throughout the negotiations relating to the Congo the Government had the one object to secure such arrangements as would be most conducive to the freedom of trade and navigation. The most important clause of the defunct Treaty from the English point of view was that which proclaimed the freedom of the navigation of the river, and placed it under a Commission, consisting of a Portuguese and an English Member, an arrangement which was attacked with great violence in many parts of Europe as unduly favourable to this country, to which it was said it would have handed over the trade of the river. It was no part of our object to get the trade of the river under false pretences, and the Treaty was attacked on grounds that were mutually destructive, for while it was said here to be unduly favourable to Portugal, it was attacked in France, Germany, and Portugal as unfairly favourable to this country. The right hon. Gentleman did not distinguish between navigation dues and Customs duties, which were totally different. The Portuguese would have had no power to claim navigation dues; they could have been levied only by consent of the Commission; and upon the rivers which would come within the purview of the Conference at Berlin the questions of navigation and of Customs would be treated as two separate questions. What was proposed in the first instance by Her Majesty's Government to Germany, and what had been proposed by Germany and by France to Her Majesty's Government, was that the doctrine of the Congress of Vienna of 1815 in regard to the navigation of rivers in Europe should be applied to the rivers on the West Coast of Africa. The arrangement of 1815 had nothing whatever to do with Customs duties, and applied only to navigation tolls and dues; and the two subjects were not in any way connected. A further proposal was now being made—and the question was raised for the first time—that there should be freedom of commerce in the basin of the Congo; and that proposal, which no doubt must be examined in detail, was one which must be welcome to this country as clearly favourable to British enterprize. A third proposal had been made to the Government—namely, that it should be decided what the formalities were to be which were to make valid any future occupation of unoccupied countries in Africa. It was, no doubt, desirable that that question should be settled, and that through the Conference the opinions of the jurists of the world should be brought to bear upon the question as they had been brought to bear upon the abolition of the Slave Trade, upon privateering, and upon the question of free ships and free goods. Her Majesty's Government had no hesitation in accepting the invitation to the Conference; and he must protest in the strongest language against the statement that we had been left out in the cold. The proposals made with regard to the Congo, as he stated in announcing the withdrawal of the Treaty, had been the subject of communication with the Powers, particularly Germany, and Germany was only proposing to us what we had proposed to Germany, and what it was therefore known we were certain to accept. On the 30th of July last he stated that the Government, although giving up the ratification of the Treaty, were continuing negotiations with the Powers in the hope of keeping that portion of the Treaty which applied to the Congo the doctrines of the Treaty of Vienna; and the Session before last he stated that the freedom of the navigation of the Congo was the point to which the Government attached the greatest importance. The position of the Government in regard to the Congo Treaty had been the subject of much misrepresentation. For a long period Great Britain stood alone in preventing the operation of the claims of Portugal on the Lower Congo; but that refusal was owing to the manner in which Portugal connived at the Slave Trade. That trade having now ceased, Her Majesty's Government had proposed to recognize the claims of Portugal, conditionally on other nations also recognizing them. On their refusal, however, the Treaty fell to the ground, and Her Majesty's Government recovered their freedom of action. Earl Granville had throughout, as Mr. Stanley said the other day, over and over again shown that the Foreign Office had in view the securing of the freedom of the navigation of the Congo and the Niger. The Government would enter into the Conference with the practical understanding that the rights obtained by the Government under the Treaties which had been negotiated by Consul Hewitt should not in any way be prejudiced. He could not promise the Papers at once; but they should be produced as soon as possible. He hoped the explanations he had given would be satisfactory to the House.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he had heard the statement of the noble Lord with great satisfaction, not unmingled with surprise, because he had inferred from the remarks of the Prime Minister that the state of the negotiations would not admit of any full account of them being laid before the House. The statement that the Government were determined to maintain freedom of commerce would be received with satisfaction by the commercial community irrespective of Party; but it was not clear why the announcement was coupled with a sarcasm directed against a recent speech of the Marquess of Salisbury. The noble Marquess did not complain of evils arising from Free Trade in England; but he complained that we had not used all the means in our power, diplomatic and fiscal, to induce other Powers to adopt a Free Trade policy. Therefore, the action of the Government on the Congo, so far from being in antagonism to the speech of the Marquess of Salisbury, was precisely in accordance with carrying out of the policy recommended in that speech; and if the Government had always been as anxious to induce foreign nations to accept Free Trade as the present Government had been to induce Germany, France, and Portugal to accept it on the Congo, British trade would not be in its present depressed condition. The Prime Minister had stated that it was the determination of the Government to see that the Convention made with the Boers was maintained. In carrying out this determination the Government would receive every assistance from Members on that side of the House. The only difficulty would be in South Africa, and that would arise largely from their previous weakness in dealing with the question. The result of the weakness displayed in 1881 would be that the Boers would never believe we were in earnest until they actually saw the gleam of our bayonets. All these difficulties might have been avoided if Her Majesty's Government had only shown common courage in the management of their South African policy. The Prime Minister's statement with regard to Egypt was somewhat remarkable. He said that the benefit arising from General Gordon's Mission was that the power of the Mahdi had been so diminished or so destroyed, [Mr. GLADSTONE: No!]<sup>1</sup>—that a tremendous danger which, after General Hicks's defeat, had menaced, not Egypt only, but many other nations, had been averted. This was the first time they had heard anything from the Government about this tremendous danger; and it threw a curious light on the Government policy in Egypt during the last two years. If the Mahdi was such a tremendous danger after General Hicks's defeat, how was it that the Government allowed General Hicks to go into the desert with so inadequate a force that defeat was inevitable? If the Mahdi's power was such a danger to Egypt and to the world, why was General Gordon allowed to go to Khartoum absolutely unsupported by troops? If he had been supplied with a proper force Government might have accomplished all they required at the expense of a few hundred thousand pounds, and rendered unnecessary the present Expedition to Khartoum, which would probably cost £10,000,000. He had always understood from the Government that the Soudanese were people who were struggling for their liberty; but now the Government said that the chief power in the Soudan was a tremendous danger to the liberties of Egypt and to neighbouring nations. The Prime Minister told them he had not at all changed his opinion in regard to the abandonment of Khartoum; yet the opinion of every soldier was that if there were any danger menacing Egypt from the south, that danger should be met at Khartoum; and the Government now admitted that a great danger might menace, and had menaced, Egypt from the south. How, in the face of this fact, could they now venture to compel the Egyptian Government unwillingly to abandon that town? Turning next to the question of Reform, he would say that the Premier had passed a very eloquent and just eulogy on the people of this country for the moderate manner in which, on the whole, the public debates on the franchise had been conducted in every part of the country. But if the people had been peaceable and orderly in the midst of a bitter political controversy, they had been so in spite of the action of Her Majesty's Government. For the first time in the history of this country they had seen the unholy and unnatural combination of a Minister of the Crown and the political agitator. For the first time they had seen a Cabinet Minister—he alluded, of course, to the President of the Board of Trade—directly inciting men to disorder and riot. The Prime Minister took great credit to himself for the fact that he had striven throughout to confine the controversy to the question of the franchise. But the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners) had pointed out that one of the avowed objects of the Government in not permitting the House of Lords to deal with the franchise and redistribution at once was to make the Members of that House legislate, as he said, with a rope round their necks; and so to deprive them of that freedom which was due to an independent branch of the Legislature. The Prime Minister twitted some Members on that side of the House with being indifferent to preserving the balance of the Constitution; but if the Lords were not to remain an independent branch of the Legislature that balance had already gone. To-night the Prime Minister had been studiously conciliatory in the manner, if not in the matter, of his speech. However, though they could not read the hearts of the Government, it was easy to judge their actions. There was a perfectly plain way by which the Government could show whether they were aiming at obtaining a political advantage by deliberately quarrelling with the House of Lords, or whether their real object was the passing of the Franchise Bill. Did they mean to prorogue at Christmas, or did they mean to adjourn? That was a perfectly plain question, and everything turned upon it. He presumed that if the Lords passed the Reform Bill this Session the Government would fulfil their promise to bring in a Redistribution Bill next year in the confident expectation of passing it. Therefore, it was quite clear that they thought themselves able to pass a Reform Bill and a Redistribution Bill before the end of next August. If then they chose to follow the unbroken precedents of the last 50 years, and to adjourn at Christmas instead of proroguing, so that the Parliamentary period between this time and next summer should all fall within one Session, they would be able, in the course of one Session, to pass a Reform Bill and a Redistribution Bill, and to get over the whole of this controversy with the Lords, to which they professed such loud objection. Unfortunately, however, the limited scope of the Queen's Speech put it beyond a doubt that they intended to prorogue, and not to adjourn at Christmas. This was a clear indication that a majority of the Cabinet were determined to push to the uttermost the quarrel with the Lords, to make what political capital they could out of the operation, and to let the Constitution shift for itself. He regarded with the greatest regret the agitation which the Prime Minister had plainly told them he meant to initiate, supposing that the House of Lords should again postpone the Franchise Bill. He did not see that, from a purely Party point of view, the Conservatives had anything to fear; rather the contrary. The Conservative Party could hardly do otherwise than gain by the fact that the Liberal Party had committed themselves to a reconstruction of the Constitution, inasmuch as moderate men would feel that if a revolution was to be initiated because there existed a difference of opinion on a small question of procedure, the Party which initiated it was no longer worthy of its confidence. He made no complaint of the Radical section of the opposite Party. In thus playing with revolution they only acted after their kind. But he was surprised at the moderate Liberals. They were not less interested than the Conservative Party in the maintenance of the Constitution. If they permitted themselves to be dragged into this agitation, brought about at the bidding of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) and his Friends, an agitation from which they had more to fear than any other persons, and which they had more power to stop, it would be a new and startling proof that Party ties were stronger than almost any ties which could bind men. The Prime Minister's speech had deprived him of any hope which he might have entertained that this question would be settled quietly. He had deliberately told the House that nothing but an unconditional assent to the Bill on the part of the House of Lords would satisfy the Government.

Mr. GLADSTONE, interposing, said, that the hon. Member did not correctly represent what he had said. He had said that if the information possessed by hon. Gentlemen opposite about redistribution was insufficient, the proper course would have been to state wherein it was insufficient, and to ask for further information.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR apologized to the Prime Minister. In the right hon. Gentleman's opinion, information about redistribution was all that the Conservative Party wanted. If so, it was manifest that the Prime Minister did not understand the real subject of controversy. The Standard had told them all they wanted to know about redistribution. But, whether or not The Standard scheme was the actual Bill of the Government, there was no security that such a Bill would pass the House of Commons. And even if did, and the House of Lords disapproved any part of the scheme, they would be absolutely precluded from expressing their opinion, since the penalty for such an expression of opinion would be a Dissolution under the old constituencies and the new franchise. What was required was not knowledge of the redistribution scheme, but power to deal with it fairly. What function did the Government wish to assign, either to the minority in that House, or to the majority in the House of Lords, if they were not to be allowed to deal freely with a Bill so vitally affecting the destinies of the country as a Redistribution Bill? Unless that freedom was conceded a quiet settlement of the question seemed to him impossible; if it were conceded, such a settlement seemed to him to be certain.

MR. ONSLOW said, he wished to ask a few questions relative to the Joint Commission between this country and Russia, which was now on the confines of Afghanistan, for the purpose of settling the North-West Frontier of that country. He wished to know whether the Under Secretary for India could give the House some outline of the objects of that important Mission? Some exception had been taken to the selection of Sir Peter Lumsden to serve on that Commission; but, in his opinion, the Government had exercised a wise discretion in that selection, and, on the whole, he did not think that a better man could have been chosen. The people of India took a deep interest in the question, and it was desirable that the instructions given to Sir Peter Lumsden should be laid on the Table of the House. Then he should like to know what position the Representative of the Ameer held on that Commission? Was he merely to advise, or was he to have a voice in the settlement of the boundary between Afghanistan and Russian territory? Then, suppose that some definite boundary was fixed, what guarantee had the Government that the Commission would be a reality and not a sham, and that the boundary would be maintained? We furnished the Ameer with a large amount of money on condition that he let us know what his foreign policy was to be. Suppose that he had reason to fear that Russia was going to overstep that boundary, what would be our position with reference to Afghanistan or Russia? As far as the latter Power was concerned, the boundary would be fixed for strategic purposes. The Ameer would expect us to recognize that boundary wherever it might be fixed. With respect to the Viceroyalty, he did not think that any wiser selection than Lord Dufferin as the successor of Lord Ripon could have been made. Lord Dufferin would be the man to set things right in India with which Lord Ripon had dealt so unsuccessfully. He should also like to ask the Under Secretary for India whether, in the event of there being any difference between Sir Peter Lumsden and the Chief of the Russian Mission with regard to the North-Western boundary of Afghanistan, the former was to communicate with the Home Government or with that of India? He also wished to know how long this Mission was to last? He also wished to know whether, in the event of Khar-toum being relieved, General Gordon, who had been appointed by the Khedive Governor General of the Soudan, and had been recognized as such by Her Majesty's Government, would be under the orders of Lord Wolseley, or whether the latter would be entirely under his orders? In the latter case, he was afraid that the cost of the Expedition would be enormously heavy.

MR. J. K. CROSS remarked, that in reply to the questions of the hon. Member opposite he had to state that General Lumsden had left this country some time ago, under instructions from Her Majesty's Government to settle, in conjunction with the Russian Commissioner, the North-West boundary of Afghanistan, and on the 17th of November he would arrive at Sarakhs, where he would remain until the Indian contingent, which had now reached the Helmund, and the Russian Commissioner, met him. The Indian contingent included 200 infantry, and with its followers numbered 900 men. It was quite possible that by the end of November all the parties would have met together, and would be able to proceed on their Mission. Of course, however, Her Majesty's Government could not undertake to fix the time of the arrival of the Russian Commissioner, over whom they had no control. The hon. Gentleman had asked him what would happen in the event of any dispute arising between General Lumsden and the Russian Commissioner. General Lumsden would be in communication with the Home Government, and not with that of India. All such matters, however, would be submitted to Lord Dufferin. The position of the Ameer's Representative would be that he would have no vote, and no voice in the direct fixing of the frontier line; but he would be present as the adviser and the trusted Representative of the Ameer, and would give all necessary information to the Commissioners. As far as the matter had gone at present, the contingent had been received very well indeed, and provisions and stores had been placed for them at the appointed stations, and he understood that everything that had been expected to be done by the Ameer had been done. In fact, the action of the Ameer had been thoroughly cordial, and he hoped that by the time General Lumsden reached Sarakhs there could be no doubt as to the satisfactory result of the Mission. The instructions given to General Lumsden were that he should go to Sarakhs, and there await the arrival of the Russian Commissioner and the Indian contingent, and that he should communicate with the Foreign Office on all matters that were going forward. The arrangements as to where the Commission should start from had not been actually decided upon, nor could they be until the Russian Commissioner had met General Lumsden.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked whether, when Lord Wolseley arrived in Khartoum, he or General Gordon was to be supreme, especially as the latter held the position of Governor General of the Soudan under the appointment of the Khedive? He also wished to know whether the uncandid paragraph in the Queen's Speech declaring that Her Majesty had given her support to Egypt in financial matters was intended to indicate that support in the shape of a guarantee or of a loan would be given to that country? The act of suspending the Sinking Fund on the recommendation of Lord Northbrook was a direct violation of the Law of Liquidation, which had been sanctioned by the Concert of Europe; and he was anxious to know whether that act entailed any financial responsibility on this country? With regard to the question of Reform, it was quite clear that the Government did not attach the same importance to redistribution that the Conservative Party did, and that the Government scheme of redistribution would magnify and stereotype the glaring anomalies of representation that now existed. He wished, however, to call attention to the terrible rebuke which the Prime Minister had administered that night to his Colleague, the President of the Board of Trade. He was glad to see the President of the Board of Trade in his place. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman could explain the history of those riots which he himself incited at Birmingham. He would like to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he was not in direct complicity and confidence with the acts of outrage which were perpetrated at Aston Park? The right hon. Gentleman had in no degree reprobated those acts, which were of a most outrageous character. On the contrary, the right hon. Gentleman had commended them in a public address. He begged to draw the attention of the Prime Minister to that fact, because, if the Prime Minister did not condemn those acts, he was as much answerable for them as was the President of the Board of Trade himself. Hon. Members opposite had instituted a system of rioting at public meetings. At Birmingham the Caucasians organized a meeting in opposition to the Conservative gathering at Aston Park, gangs of roughs being hired to interfere with the proceedings. That was exactly similar to the action which caused the Government to suspend Lord Rosmore from the Commission of the Peace, only Lord

[First Night.]

Rossmore did not introduce hired ruffians. The Caucus, under the auspices of the President of the Board of Trade, issued a circular on the Saturday before the meeting was held, calling upon Liberals to assemble at the gates of Aston Park; and two Town Councillors, creatures of the Caucus and of the President of the Board of Trade, recommended the ruffians who assembled to take possession of certain planks in order to use them as battering rams against a wall. That was merely a question of burglary; but in addition to that the Caucus were also guilty of forgery, for, at their instigation, a certain number of tickets were fabricated in order that their agents might gain admittance to the Conservative meeting. The Prime Minister had that evening repudiated the deeds of the President of the Board of Trade. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman appeared not to repudiate them. Then he was responsible for them. If Conservatives could not meet without being subjected to attack by miners and others, surely that freedom of speech of which the Prime Minister professed to be so fond would no longer be enjoyed by the minority in political controversies. In conclusion, he thought they were entitled to some explanation from the President of the Board of Trade, whose conduct in this matter seemed very like that of the Anarchists or Nihilists on the Continent.

AMENDMENT (MR. HARRINGTON)—
CONVICTION OF MYLES JOYCE
AND OTHERS.

MR. HARRINGTON, in rising to move the following Amendment to the Address:—

"And humbly to assure Her Majesty that it is the opinion of a vast number of the Irish people that the present method of administering the Law in Ireland, more especially under the Crimes Act, has worked manifold injustice, and, in the case of the prisoners tried for the Maamtrasna murder, has led to the execution of an innocent man and to the conviction of four other persons equally innocent, and that this House humbly assures Her Majesty that it would ensure much greater confidence in the administration of the Law in Ireland if a full and public inquiry were granted into the execution of Myles Joyce and the continued incarceration of Patrick Joyce, Thomas Joyce, Martin Joyce, and John Casey," said, that in rising, at that late hour of the evening, to move the Amendment,

and in proposing to draw the attention of the House for a moment from the many matters of foreign policy which they had been discussing, in order to bring their notice to another question of no less importance to the good government of the Empire, he had to ask the indulgence of the House, owing to his being taken somewhat by surprise. No doubt, the question of the extension of the franchise was one of very great importance; but it was in vain to extend the franchise to the people if no effort were made by Her Majesty's Government to inspire them with some confidence in the laws of the country. In the absence of any Representative of the Irish Government upon the Treasury Bench—in face of the flight, he might say, of the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Trevelyan), and in the absence of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland—[The SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND here entered the House and took his seat.]—he was glad to see that the hon. and learned Gentleman was now in his place. On the 15th of December, 1882, Myles Joyce, Patrick Joyce, of Shanvallycahill, and Patrick Casey were executed for the murders known as the Maamtrasna murders, and Martin Joyce, brother of Myles, Patrick Joyce, of Cappanachrea, another brother, Thomas Joyce, son of Patrick, and John Casey, of Cappanachrea, were sentenced to penal servitude. There had been cases previously brought under the attention of the House of Commons in which persons had been the victims of mistaken identity; but they were of small importance compared with the case to which he proposed to invite the consideration of the House. In this case, although, no doubt, there was false evidence, though perjured and malignant low-lived characters were employed by the Crown, and though such facts demanded the attention of the House, there was the further and most important charge which he now made—that the officials of the Crown in Ireland, those who were entrusted with the administration of the law, were themselves parties to the conspiracy against the lives of those wretched men. On the night of August 17, 1882, a party of men broke into a house in the village of Maamtrasna, in the County of Galway, occupied by a man named John Joyce, murdered him, his mother, wife, and a young daughter, and inflicted serious injuries upon his two sons, the only other occupants of the house, injuries so severe that one of them died on the following day, while the second lay for some time in a precarious condition. Acting on the information of two brothers, named Anthony and John Joyce, the police arrested, on the 20th, 10 men, all of whom resided at a considerable distance from the scene of the murder—some at a distance of seven miles. The story related by the two brothers, supported by the son of one of them, was of an extraordinary character; but, after the customary remands and inquiries, the 10 men were duly returned for trial at the Galway Assizes. "The Prevention of Crime Act" being in force at the time, the Crown took advantage of its provisions to have the venue changed to the City of Dublin, though there was no suggestion in the evidence of the witnesses, and nothing in the circumstances of the case, to warrant the belief that the murder was of an agrarian character. Some days previous to the trial, which commenced on the 13th of November, 1882, before a special jury of the City and County of Dublin, in Green Street Court House, it became known that Anthony Philbin, one of the accused, had become approver, and would be produced by the Crown to corroborate the three Joyces. The extraordinary story told by Anthony Joyce at the trial was that on the night of the 17th of August he was awakened by the barking of his dogs. He got up, went to his door, and saw six men whom he did not know at first, but whom he subsequently recognized as Anthony Philbin, Thomas Casey, Martin Joyce, Myles Joyce, Patrick Joyce, and Tom Joyce, of Cappanachrea. After a time, with nothing on but his shirt, trousers, and flannel vest, Anthony Joyce went to the house of his brother and saw the men go to the house of Michael Casey. When they came out the number had been increased to 10, by the addition of Patrick Joyce, of Shanvallycahill, Patrick Casey, John Casey, and Michael Casey. The witness and his brother John followed the men to the scene of the murder. It was clearly established that the night was dark, and that the men had blackened faces. Every bit, therefore, of Anthony Joyce's story was inconsistent, as it would have been impossible for him on such a night to have discerned from his house even the figures of the men as they passed, and much more impossible to recognize their faces. A similar story was told by John Joyce; and this was the evidence upon which these 10 men were arrested. He (Mr. Harrington) charged the Government with suppressing certain depositions which were needful to the proper elucidation of the case, and he pointed out that he might indeed find the whole case he had to bring forward upon the single circumstance of the actual murderers having blackened faces. He challenged the Government to show the House that, from the beginning to the end of the trial, which lasted seven days, one word was said by the Crown counsel, or by the counsel for the defence, of this circumstance of the men having blackened faces. After the trial, depositions were made by two of the men who were executed—Patrick Joyce and Patrick Casey—in which, whilst proclaiming their own guilt, they pronounced the third man—Myles Joyce—to be innocent. These depositions had not been produced before the House, and if the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland would produce them, even now, he would at least have done something to ease the public mind. Depositions were also in existence, proving beyond doubt that those who took part in the murders had blackened faces. Yet that fact was deliberately withheld at the trial; for when the solicitor for the defence applied for copies of the depositions, the representatives of the Crown, in a wicked and murderous manner, kept from him the dying depositions of the two lads. But, fortunately, the Irish Government had not it in their power any longer to suppress this evidence, and he should be able to show that not only was it before the lawyers for the Crown—the Attorney General of the day (now Mr. Justice Johnson), Mr. Murphy (now Mr. Justice Murphy), and Mr. Peter O'Brien, Q.C.—but that their attention was specially directed to it. He had, in his hand, the brief used by one of these Crown counsel at the trial. He also had a copy of the brief used by the counsel for the prisoners, and he should be able to show that only such documents were given to the solicitor for the defence by the Crown Solicitor, as would fit in with the theory of guilt which he wished to establish, so as to secure the hanging of these unfortunate men. The depositions which were suppressed would undoubtedly have convinced any jury that, however guilty or innocent the men might be, the evidence on which the Crown proceeded was from the beginning a fabrication. If the Government wished to clear the character of their officials from the stain of perjury and conspiracy to murder, they would be anxious for inquiry. Whether they conceded or refused an inquiry, public opinion in Ireland was already made up on the subject, and nothing would remove the public belief that the Crown officials had sacrificed the life of Myles Joyce. The name of the Crown counsel to whom the brief belonged was not written upon it, but the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland would easily recognize the handwriting of the marginal notes. The counsel had employed his pencil during the swearing of the jury, and wrote down three columns, one for the sworn jurors, another marked with the letter "O," which was the initial letter of "Oathic," and the third headed "Sturdy." That was the manner in which the Government officials endeavoured to command respect for the law in Ireland, by marking every man who belonged to the religious faith of the majority as an outcast, whose oath was not to be trusted. From beginning to end of this extraordinary case, as it had been presented to the Court in Dublin, none of the witnesses were allowed to utter one word about the murderers having blackened faces, or wearing disguises; and, although the Crown lawyers brought the little boy, Patrick Joyce, upon the witness table, and declined to examine him, on the plea that he did not know what would happen to him if he told a lie, yet that proceeding was merely a trick to throw dust in the eyes of the Judge and jury, for three months earlier, on the day succeeding the murders, the boy had been sworn, and his dying deposition had been taken and made a legal instrument capable of being used as evidence on the trial, by Mr. Brady, one of the fortunate men who were thrust into the Magistracy under the Crimes Act. That boy's deposition detailed the circumstances of the murder, and would not have supported the perjury which brought about the conviction of Myles Joyce, for he said—"Two or three men came in. They had black on their faces." The deposition was signed "A. Newton Brady, R.M." It was A. Newton Brady, R.M., who took the deposition of this little boy, and of this little boy's brother, and who conducted the case from beginning to end. It was he who also took the depositions of the two unfortunate men who declared their own guilt and the innocence of the man who was executed with them. But he and Earl Spencer had evidently made a compact that these depositions should never see the light, and that the public, although they might have their suspicions, should never have a clear knowledge of their guilt in connection with these cases. The production of this little boy in the witness chair was, as he had said, an empty farce, for appended to the deposition of the boy in the Crown brief was a note from Mr. George Bolton, the Crown Solicitor, which was well worthy of the consideration of those who wished to investigate this matter fully. The note in question was as follows:—"Patrick Joyce has recovered, but his evidence is worthless." Deny it as they might, there was this damning evidence in the handwriting, he might say, of the Crown Solicitor, that the Crown prosecutors were not to examine this boy on the trial, but that the Executive Government had determined to sacrifice these men, in order to appease the cry for blood that had been raised by the English newspapers. The little boy—Patrick Joyce—might be found at present at Artane Industrial School, and the Crown could examine him if they liked, as he (Mr. Harrington) had done, and see if the statement which he now made corresponded with the statement which he made to the Resident Magistrate on the day after the murder. The case, as he had said, might be allowed to rest altogether on this one circumstance of whether the men who had committed the murder had or had not blackened faces. There was no theory whatever by which they could reconcile the evidence of the three independent witnesses with the fact of the men being disguised. The fact was, that Anthony and John Joyce lived in eternal enmity with the men against whom they gave evidence; and whether they had themselves concocted the story, or whether they were instructed by the police or any of the magistrates or officials, he contended that the case equally demanded the clearest and fullest inquiry. It was after the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) in that House had promised an inquiry into the revelations made by the informers in connection with this case, and after Earl Spencer had refused an inquiry, that his suspicions were aroused that Earl Spencer, and Brady, Bolton, and others acquainted with the case, had a strong and vital interest in keeping the truth from the public. The fullest inquiry was demanded, if they wished to sift to the bottom the infamous transactions connected with the trial, and to show that the Crown officials had not sanctioned a cruel conspiracy. He (Mr. Harrington) had himself spent some considerable time in hunting up evidence in regard to this case. He had gone down into the locality, and taken with him the official map that was used by the Crown at the trial. He invited the Members on the Treasury Bench to send any impartial man into the district, and he would be very glad to leave to such a person the whole question of the guilt or innocence of the unfortunate man who was executed. What he had to charge against the Crown officials was not alone that they proceeded upon the extraordinary story of these men, but at a time when they knew it to be perfectly false. He should be able to show from the handwriting of the officials themselves, that although one of the approvers offered to give the Crown the true version of the murder, as he preferred doing, and telling the truth, the Government would not accept his evidence until he finally consented to perjure himself. It was only by perjury that he was able, therefore, to save his wretched life. The evidence at the trial was confined to three witnesses who might be called independent. Their evidence, however, was corroborated by that of two informers—Thomas Casey and Anthony Philbin—one of whom, as a matter of fact, was not present at the murder, and knew nothing about it, although he was easily able to perjure himself. He had heard the evidence repeated in his presence no less than 12 times; and, therefore, it was not a difficult matter for him to corroborate it.

Still, strange to say, in spite of this, the two informers did not agree in the evidence they offered at the trial. One of them alleged that there were 10 men present at the murder; whereas the other said there were 12, and gave the names of two additional men—Patrick Kelly and Michael Nes. Extraordinary to relate, instead of that discrepancy between the evidence being pointed to by the learned Judge who tried the case, as a ground of suspicion against the testimony of these men, it was the main point upon which Judge Barry relied as confirming the testimony of both. Judge Barry said, in so many words, that the very discrepancy between the evidence of the two men afforded confirmatory proof of the truth of their statements as to the murder. Now, these two men, who, in an endeavour to save their own lives, swore away the life of an innocent man—these two men had since come forward and said, openly and publicly, that the testimony they gave to the Crown was altogether false. The statement now was that there were only seven men engaged in the murder, and that six of those who had been charged by the Crown were wholly innocent, and knew nothing about it. It was further stated that, at the present moment, two of the actual murderers, including the man who really planned the murder, were living in a locality well known to the police, and that another of them was now in England. He thought he should be able to show, still further, that not only had the Crown full knowledge that the actual murderers were living in the locality, but that they were aware that the man who planned the murder, who paid for it, and who assisted in committing it, was still living in the locality, and that at the time the Crown proceeded to try these 10 unfortunate peasants, five of whom were still in gaol, the Crown had full knowledge that they were innocent, and that other persons were guilty of the murder. He thought it necessary to press that extraordinary fact upon the attention of the House. The allegation now made by the informers was, that seven men were present at the murder, and that they never came into a line of march at all; that they saw no men passing by the house, and that if they had passed by no one could have seen them. The allegation now made by one of the informers was, that a man named John

Casey, who had lived at enmity with the unfortunate man who was murdered, was the actual instigator of the murders. Strange to say, John Casey was arrested by the police on the morning after the murders. Knowing the relations which had existed between Casey and the unfortunate man who was killed, the police suspected from the first that he was the man who had concocted the murder, and had paid the perpetrators of it for carrying it out. That man was still living in the locality, having been discharged from the custody of the police, although they knew perfectly well that he was guilty of the murders. He was arrested on the morning after the murders, and the police knew then, and knew now, that he was at the bottom of them. He should be able to show, from the handwriting of the Crown counsel engaged in the prosecution of these unfortunate men, that, at the time he was pushing the law as closely as he could against the men in the dock, he, at least, suspected that the man, whom he (Mr. Harrington) now alleged to have planned the murder of the Joyce family, was at the bottom of the whole transaction. He found in the Crown brief, amongst the evidence prepared by the Crown Solicitor to rebut any alibi that could be produced by the prisoners, an information made by John Casey, of Derry. This was the man whom he (Mr. Harrington) alleged to have planned the murder, to have paid for the murder, and to have held the light while it was being committed. This was Casey's statement—

"I remember the night of the murder. I slept in a room in my own house. My three sons also slept in the house; their names are John, Stephen, and Malachi. I do not know any other Malachi Casey. I accused John Joyce, three years ago, of stealing sheep from me. Sheep have been stolen from me during the last three months, and sheep have been stolen from other people at the same time. I did not go to either the wake or the funeral."

These words were underlined in the brief of the counsel for the Crown, who wrote on the brief underneath them—"Suspect had him murdered." That was a very significant fact, which had been very carefully concealed. It was impossible now to conceal the fact that, while the Executive Government were attempting to hang these 10 unfortunate prisoners, the Crown counsel had a full knowledge as to the man who had really committed the murder, and knew, further, that the evidence on which he was proceeding against the prisoners, whether they were guilty or innocent of the murder, was absolute perjury. The evidence upon which the Crown proceeded in the trial of the eight men, after the two informers, Anthony Philbin and Thomas Casey, had been taken away, was what Lord Spencer now called three independent witnesses—Anthony Joyce, John Joyce, of Derry, his brother, and Patrick Joyce, of Derry, John's son. No doubt, that evidence was supported by the testimony of the two approvers. What was the evidence they had now against the men in gaol? He did not think the House would ask that the evidence to support the innocence of these men should be stronger than the evidence upon which they were sentenced to death. And yet he should be able to show that the evidence on which they were prosecuted, and upon which three men were executed and five others were still suffering penal servitude, stood upon lower footing, and more questionable testimony, which no rational man would credit. They had, first, the revelations made by the two approvers on the trial completely contradicted by themselves. Their characters could have become no worse than they were before, seeing that, at the trial, they stood in the position, not only of approvers, but self-confessed murderers. But what was their most recent testimony supported by? From the passing of the sentence upon the men now in gaol, four out of the five now undergoing penal servitude had never ceased to protest their innocence of the charge. That was not a slight fact in the case, but an extremely strong fact; because it was only four out of the five who made these representations, and those the very four the approver stated to be innocent. He (Mr. Harrington) would read an extract from a letter of one of them to his wife. At the end of the letter the writer said—

"Dear Mary, it is very hard to be here for a crime that I know nothing about. Thanks be to God I know nothing whatever about it. But I fret more for you and the children than I do for myself, for you know God is good, and we will all be happy yet with the help of God. Let me know when you write have you any pigs, how the crops are, and did you pay the rint yet, and I hope you and I will be happy together yet, with the help of God. No more at present from your loving husband,

"JOHN CASEY."

The letter was dated Mountjoy Prison, Dublin, 15th of June, 1883. In another letter, dated the 27th of June, 1884, the same prisoner said—

"I hope you and the priest will petition the Lord Lieutenant as quickly as possible. It is very hard for me to have been in prison and separated from my family, especially as I am innocent. Let me know are the crops promising this year. I hope Peter and father will mind the children in my absence. I hope that will not be very long. Keep good courage, and I will do the same. I hope everything will come to light hereafter. I don't expect to be always here."

Martin Joyce, brother to Myles Joyce, who was executed, and of Patrick Joyce, who was also in gaol, wrote to his wife from Mountjoy Prison on the 5th of September last—

"I hope that God, in His just mercy, who saved me from death, will yet show to the world my innocence of any participation in the crime for which I am the innocent sufferer.—Your affectionate husband, MARTIN JOYCE."

These were extraordinary circumstances, and fully corroborated the later evidence of the approver. No doubt, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland would draw attention to the fact that the men who made these protestations of innocence had not been found guilty by a jury, but had pleaded guilty. That could easily be explained; and when the House knew the facts, he thought hon. Members would attach very little weight indeed to the circumstance of these unfortunate men having pleaded guilty, instead of waiting to be tried and being found guilty by a jury. As he had already stated, eight men were charged. They were taken 200 miles away from their home to be tried by a special jury, who did not understand their language. Their own solicitor and counsel did not understand their language, nor did the Court understand it. They were as absolute strangers in Green Street Court House, in Dublin, as if they had been translated from another sphere. On the evidence adduced at the trial, the jury were only eight minutes deliberating upon a charge which involved the life of the first unfortunate wretch. In the next case, the jury, having the same evidence to go upon, were only 10 minutes deliberating as to the fate of the unfortunate peasant before them. The third jury was empannelled to try Myles Joyce. No alibi was attempted on his behalf, because there was no one to prove it, except his unfortunate wife. The evidence upon which Myles Joyce was tried was precisely the same as that upon which the other prisoners were tried. The verdict was a foregone conclusion, and the Dublin jury simply spent six minutes in deliberating upon the verdict. As he had no doubt the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland would refer to this part of the case, he thought he should be able to show the House that there was nothing whatever in the fact of the rest of the men having pleaded guilty which was worthy of the consideration of the House. Their circumstances were such—a chain of evidence had been wound around them in such a manner—that there was no salvation whatever for them. Nevertheless, they steadily refused to plead guilty until they were waited upon by their priest, who told them that although they were innocent it would probably be better for them to plead guilty, and in the end their innocence would come to light. There was proof that they were led to expect, that if they did plead guilty, their lives would be spared. What were these wretched, unfortunate peasants, wholly ignorant as they were of the language in which they were being tried, and of the proceedings of the Court, to do? He would read the observations made by the Judge in sentencing the second prisoner—Patrick Casey—to death. Mr. Justice Barry, in passing sentence, said—

"Patrick Casey, after a most patient trial, you have been convicted by a jury of your fellow-countrymen of the crime of murder. The murder charged against you, in the indictment on which you have been convicted, is the murder of Bridget Joyce. But the evidence has established clearly and conclusively, and so as not to leave a doubt of your guilt upon the mind of any sane person who has heard or read that evidence, that you not only murdered Bridget Joyce, but four other persons on that one occasion."

That was the language addressed by the learned Judge to the second person tried; and a few minutes after he had used that language, in the presence of the jurors who were waiting to try the next case, the jury was empannelled to try the third unfortunate prisoner—Myles Joyce. He (Mr. Harrington) asked the

House to bear in mind that the remarks of the Judge were heard by the persons empannelled to try Myles Joyce. Therefore, when the priest pointed out to these unfortunate men that it would be better for them to plead guilty, and thus avoid capital punishment, they followed his advice and pleaded guilty, although they were really innocent of the crime of which they were charged. They could see nothing before them but the prospect of an ignominious death; and surely the circumstances were such as to induce ignorant peasants of this description to say they were guilty, in the hope that they would not only save their lives, but, at the same time, have an opportunity of vindicating their character hereafter. There was another circumstance, which he had not touched upon yet, that corroborated the revelations made by the two informers, and which had not been contradicted. He had informed the House that the approvers had completely contradicted the evidence they gave at the trial. They now asserted, in the most open manner, that they were forced to give that evidence, and that it was the only door open to them in order to save their own wretched lives. He thought he had shown how the last statements of the approvers were corroborated in the most striking way by the protestations of innocence on the part of four out of the five men now suffering penal servitude. There was, however, another extraordinary fact. There were five men suffering penal servitude. One of these five men was still alleged by the approvers to have been guilty and to have actively participated in the murders. From the first day of his conviction—from the first day the sentence of death originally passed upon him was commuted down to the present moment, that prisoner had never said one word by way of protesting his innocence; whereas the four men who were now alleged by the approvers to be innocent had expressly, in every letter they had written, protested their innocence. He would go further. The man who was alleged to have been guilty had not been altogether silent upon the subject. His last letter home, he (Mr. Harrington) had been able to get some information about during his visit to the locality. It was an extraordinary document. The man requested his wife to go to "the master," meaning the land-

lord, and get him to intercede with the Lord Lieutenant in order to enable him to make a statement, which, he said, although it might be of no good to himself, he, at least, ought to be allowed to make for the sake of the innocent men who were now in gaol with him. Here, then, they had this extraordinary evidence—stronger than anything which the Crown produced at the trial—that four men who were alleged by the approvers to be innocent, had protested their innocence from the commencement; whereas the man who was alleged by the approvers to be guilty had never made a protestation of innocence, but, on the contrary, had asked to be allowed to make a statement in order to get out of gaol four innocent men who were incarcerated there. He (Mr. Harrington) had the best grounds for saying that this man was not only willing now to make that statement, but that 12 months ago he did make it before certain magistrates in Galway Gaol. But the fact had been suppressed, and was only known to the officials of Dublin Castle. As they knew how much that statement would affect their character, and what a damning effect it would have against them, they had studiously kept it out of the public view. He challenged the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland to produce that statement and submit it to the House. He believed it would be found that it fully corroborated the statement made by the approvers, and the statement made by these four prisoners who had been continually protesting their innocence. It came also from a man who acknowledged his own participation in the murder. It further corroborated the declaration made by the two men who suffered the extreme penalty of the law, the day before the execution, when they acknowledged their own guilt, but confirmed the innocence of Myles Joyce. It further corroborated the statement of the two sons of John Joyce on the morning succeeding the murder of their father, one of whom died from the injuries he had received. There was another fact which bore upon the testimony of these approvers. The approver Casey, in the revelations he had made, said that as they were proceeding to the scene of the murder, they called at the house of another man who resided about half-a-mile from the place, and endeavoured to enlist him in their murderous enterprise. Casey had given to him (Mr. Harrington), in the course of a long interview with him, the name of the man at whose house they called. His name was John Joyce, the same as that of the murdered man, and he was a nephew of the man who was alleged by Casey to have planned and paid for the murder, and to have been present himself, taking a guilty part in it. Joyce would not corroborate the testimony of the informer to him (Mr. Harrington); but, although he refused to corroborate it in words, he gave a corroboration which carried conviction much more strongly to his mind than if the man had expressly stated his agreement in so many words. In the visit he paid to Joyce he was accompanied by a rev. gentleman who was connected with the district. He asked Joyce if it was true that four of the men pulled him out of bed in order that he might take part in the murder. With some adroitness Joyce endeavoured at first to dodge the question, and made several efforts to avoid giving a direct answer. At last, the rev. gentleman told him expressly to answer the question "yes" or "no"—whether, on the night of the murder, the approver Casey, and three other men, went to him and endeavoured to bring him to the murder. To which appeal, Joyce answered—"Don't press me, father." Now, to his (Mr. Harrington's) mind, there could be no clearer corroboration. The man was evidently unwilling to incriminate his uncle, nor would he tell a lie to the priest by denying what had taken place. Therefore, every circumstance stated by the approver in his recent examination was confirmed by an investigation of the locality, and an inquiry upon the spot. Unfortunately, these men had been found guilty by a jury who had never been in the district, or even seen it, and they were tried by a Judge who also knew nothing of the locality. They were tried as absolute strangers, just as though they had been taken into another sphere in order to be tried there. An application made to the Court to enable the jury to go down to the locality and inquire into the extraordinary story told by the independent witnesses, was refused. No effort was made by the Crown to satisfy the public that there was any real desire on their part to have the law impartially administered, least such a course might have deprived the Crown prosecutors of the blood of the victims they were so anxious to sacrifice. The revelations made by the approver Casey were made, some time ago, before His Grace the Archbishop of Tuam, in whose diocese the parish of Maamtrasna was situated. His Grace sent forward a representation on the subject to the Government, and, after pressure had been brought to bear, the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War promised distinctly that if the revelations made by the approver were brought before the Government, they would deem it their duty to inquire fully into them. His Grace the Archbishop had brought them to the notice of the Government, if Earl Spencer could be called a portion of the Government. A communication was duly addressed by the Archbishop to Earl Spencer, setting forth the revelations which had been made by the approver. What was the result? What kind of an inquiry took place? What did Earl Spencer do? He actually employed to draw up the reply the two most guilty criminals in the whole case—Mr. Brady, the Resident Magistrate, who took the depositions of the dying boys, who, from first to last, had known all the facts of the case, and who was the most guilty of all in suppressing the truth; and George Bolton, who was almost equally guilty. Those, of all persons in the world, were the men employed by Earl Spencer to reply to the Archbishop's letter, and they were the persons who were most concerned in procuring a verdict of acquittal for themselves. They prepared, in reply to a letter of His Grace the Archbishop of Tuam, a long Memorandum, and Sir Robert Hamilton appended his name to it, as he was in duty bound, so that it did not go forth to the world as the statement of Messrs. Brady and Bolton. He (Mr. Harrington) thought he should be able, when he compared the real facts of the case with this attempt on the part of the Crown officials to whitewash themselves, to show to every rational man that the approver and murderer Casey, perjurer as he was, was telling the truth, while Brady and Bolton were telling an infamous falsehood. Here was one allegation made by Casey the approver, which was admitted by Sir Robert Hamilton, who simply personated Brady and Bolton in the matter, by appending his name to the Memorandum. Both the Memorandum and the deposition of Casey agreed, to a certain extent—that Casey made an offer to the Crown prosecutor to give evidence; Casey stated that the offer was made two days before the trial was to come on, and he said that he made the statement to Mr. Bolton in the gaol. He subsequently saw Mr. Bolton in the Governor's office, and he said—

"Mr. Bolton was sitting down with his shoes off, warming his feet to the fire. He said, 'Well, Casey, are you going to make a statement?' or something like that. I made an effort to save those who were in. I said, 'The men that did the murder are outside yet, and these men in here are innocent.' He said he had more than that from the Joyces and from my brother-in-law, Philbin; that Philbin swore I went to the house for him, and that he met me in the field. I am not sure whether it is then Mr. Bolton read Philbin's statement for me, but I am quite certain that he read it for me. He would not accept my statement, as I would not make it agree with my brother-in-law, and he called the warder and sent me away."

He (Mr. Harrington) asked the House to bear that fact in mind. The assertion in the Memorandum prepared by Sir Robert Hamilton and published in his name, was this—that the statement which Casey made on that occasion was precisely the same which they accepted from him two days subsequently—namely, on the opening day of the trial, and that Mr. Bolton did agree to accept that information. He would read Casey's statement of this transaction, and read the statement of it which was put forward by Sir Robert Hamilton, asking the House to consider which of the two was more in agreement with common sense and reason. This was the statement made by Casey—

"The trial was to come off on Monday. I saw the Governor on Sunday evening, about 4 o'clock, and I was talking to him. I told him about my meeting with Mr. Bolton. Question—'Had you made up your mind this time to corroborate Philbin?' Answer—'I was making up my mind for it; but I was putting it off for the last moment.' The Governor said to me, if I wished he would speak to Mr. Bolton. I did not then give a decided answer. The next day was the day of the trial. When we were going into the van I saw Philbin going away in a cab. The other men went into the van."

The Government statement was that the Crown officials agreed to accept Casey as an informer the day before the trial; yet he was brought out in the van with the other men, while the other approver was conveyed away separately. Mr. Bolton's statement was that the agreement had been come to at the first interview, and, on the face of it, the statement of the informer was much more credible than that which had been made and published with the authority of Sir Robert Hamilton. Casey continued—

"When we were going into the van, I saw Philbin going away in a cab. The other men went into the van. I was the last to go in, and I then said to the Governor that he might speak to Bolton. I had not given him an answer the night before. We were then brought to the Court. The nine of us were in the room, back of the dock, and my name was called."

He (Mr. Harrington) would now read the account given by Sir Robert Hamilton, who first published the note of Casey to the Crown Solicitor, asking for an interview. The Memorandum went on to say—

"This note was written by Casey, and handed by him to the Governor, with a request that he would have it sent to Mr. Bolton, and it was accordingly transmitted, and until the receipt of it, Mr. Bolton had never spoken to the man, nor had he ever seen him, except when brought up as a prisoner in Court. The Attorney General at the time was in London, and Mr. Bolton at once consulted the counsel for the prosecution, who directed him to see Casey, and be in a position to report to the Attorney General on his return what his evidence would be, but to make no statement and hold out no hope to Casey that he would be accepted as an approver without the Attorney General's authority. Mr. Bolton thereupon went to the prison, and saw the prisoner, not in his cell, but in the Governor's office. The Governor was present at this interview, no other persons being there, and it is untrue that Mr. Bolton used any threat to the prisoner, or made any suggestion to him as to what his evidence should be, or in any manner whatever pressed him. Mr. Bolton told him what he had been directed to tell him by the Crown counsel, and Casey then told Mr. Bolton what he had to prove in reference to the murder, which closely corresponded with his subsequently written statement. It is to be remembered that this happened on Saturday, the trials being fixed to commence on the following Monday, and that the case was considered by the Crown as being perfectly complete and conclusive against all the prisoners. The nature of Casey's evidence having been reported to the Attorney General, it was determined to accept him as an approver. On the following Monday all the prisoners were brought down to Green Street. Immediately on their arrival, Casey sent a message to Mr. Bolton by the Governor, saying he was anxious to see him."

He (Mr. Harrington) asked the House whether that statement did not brand, as a falsehood, the first statement, that the Crown had agreed to accept the former information given by Casey? If, on Saturday, the Crown Solicitor agreed to accept Casey's evidence, would the motion for a second interview come from the Crown Solicitor or from the approver? Was it not more likely that the statement of the approver was true—namely, that in the first instance he would not swear what was false; but after he had been making up his mind as to the statement he was expected to make, and when he had screwed up his courage sufficiently to comply with the requirements of the Crown Prosecutor, he then asked for a second interview? He contended that the admission that the statement came from him, and not from the Crown Solicitor, was the clearest proof in the world that a change had come over his mind, and that he was willing to do what the Crown Solicitor was urging him to do. But there was another thing which showed more clearly still than that admission that the statement of Sir Robert Hamilton was an infamous falsehood. It was this—that Casey said Mr. Bolton went down into the passage below the Court, accompanied by Mr. Brady, and the Governor of the gaol. Bolton called him out and informed him that his evidence would be accepted, provided he told the entire truth. Did not that, in the mind of any intelligent man, prove conclusively that there had been a divergence between Mr. Bolton and the approver, and establish also that Casey had hesitated to do what the Crown Solicitor was urging him to do—namely, commit perjury, and swear away the lives of these men? Then there was another proof, which nothing could get over—not even the ingenuity of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland—and that was, that while the Crown had accepted the statement of Casey, the late Attorney General for Ireland (the present Mr. Justice Johnson), in his opening statement of the case, mentioned that only one approver was coming forward to corroborate the evidence of the witnesses; while he never said one word as to any evidence to be offered by the second approver, Casey. Was it not, then, clear that the statement published by Messrs. Brady and Bolton was an infamous falsehood on the very face of it, and an endeavour to deceive the Government and public in Ireland? If the Crown had agreed, on Saturday, to accept the evidence of Casey, did it not stand to reason and common sense; was it not in accordance with legal procedure and with the duty of the Attorney General, that, having the knowledge that two approvers would be examined for the prosecution, he should stand up in Court and make reference to the evidence of one approver only, stating that he would be examined, and no other? He (Mr. Harrington) thought that the evidence was as clear as noon day that, in their attempt to acquit themselves, these officials had deliberately lied. But there was a Providence watching their actions, forcing their hand, and compelling them to speak the truth, although they were endeavouring to commit falsehood. These were the independent inquisitors, on whom Earl Spencer relied to vindicate his conduct in Ireland—the two men most guilty in the transaction—who gave to the counsel for the defence, what purported to be copies of two depositions in the case, who suppressed the fact that the two boys had made dying depositions which they never gave into the hands of the counsel for the defence. But that was not the only portion of the evidence suppressed by the Crown. When the letter of the Archbishop of Tuam appeared, the whole scene changed, and it was then for the first time that the fact came to light that two informers had made depositions in gaol. Application was made for copies of the depositions on the first day of the trial by the counsel for the defence. Neither the counsel for the defence, nor the Attorney General for Ireland, had heard anything about the depositions in question. Again, application was made for the deposition of the approver Philbin, and although that deposition had been made six or seven days before the commencement of the trial in July, yet the copies were not supplied; and when application was made in Court for either a copy of the deposition, or a postponement of the trial, both applications were refused, and the wretched victims hurried to their fate. The public in Ireland had been, therefore, kept in a state of complete ignorance as to what depositions had been made, nor did they know that any interviews had taken place between the parties in question. He asked hon. Members to look carefully over the matter that had been suppressed by the Crown, and compare it with the testimony given afterwards in the approver's chair. He believed that no one in that House would deny that, if a copy of the depositions had been handed in to the counsel for the defence, it would have been sufficient to have brought out whether the approver's statements were true or false, because there was a considerable divergence in them. Therefore, he asked hon. Members to conclude that, by the suppression of these important documents, the Crown were keeping from the hands of the counsel for the defence weapons which might have possibly saved the lives of these unfortunate persons, and prevented the fearful crime which had been committed in Ireland, as well as the odium which must attach to their system of administration there, unless the Government at once instituted an inquiry into all the circumstances of the case. He had already drawn attention to the suppression of one of the depositions made by the boys on the morning after the murder, and he would now say that in the Crown brief which had fallen into his hands there was established a clear case of conspiracy to murder on the part of officials in Ireland which no amount of shifting should prevent the public from knowing. In that brief the deposition of the boys was set forth, the one corresponding as nearly as it could with the other. It was a strange fact that the important statement of the boys was noted on the margin of the brief of the counsel who had the case in hand, and yet he never, by word or suggestion to the counsel for the defence, intimated that such statement was contained in his brief. That being so, he (Mr. Harrington) asserted, with the fullest knowledge of the responsibility that attached to his words, that the Crown officials were committing a crime nothing short of murder by suppressing for their own purposes, to save their reputation with the Government, this important testimony. In concluding, he would say that it was not for the purpose of satisfying Irish Members on those Benches that the Government were now asked to take up this matter. As far as it was possible for men to make up their minds, they had done so on this question already; they knew the facts of the case before the very important document he had referred to came into his hands, which it did after the concluding letter of the series in which he had published his case had appeared—it came in corroboration of that case, and enabled him to take the initiative in this question. He was able to say, with the knowledge he had previously possessed, that he had never entertained the slightest doubt of the innocence of that unfortunate man, who declared on the scaffold that he knew nothing of the murder for which he had been sentenced to death. There remained now no doubt as to those who were interested in having the murders committed, and yet the Government allowed them to walk about, associating with the people of the district; they knew that perjury had been committed; but rather than discredit the story put forward, and deprive their officials of the glory of having sacrificed 10 or 12 unfortunate peasants, they refused to make any endeavour to convict the actual murderers. It was not to appease Irish Members on those Benches that it was necessary to institute the inquiry asked for. He said that if the Government did not immediately grant that inquiry, the public in Ireland would never be satisfied, and that from the lowest official engaged in this transaction up to Earl Spencer, who had the depositions before him, and who had ample time to telegraph to the gaol and clear up any doubt that existed, before consigning Myles Joyce to a murderer's grave, the verdict would be that there was a conspiracy to murder these unfortunate people. He begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

In the ninth paragraph, after the word "us," to insert the words "and humbly to assure Her Majesty that it is the opinion of a vast number of the Irish people that the present method of administering the Law in Ireland, more especially under the Crimes Act, has worked manifold injustice, and, in the case of the prisoners tried for the Maamtrasna murder, has led to the execution of an innocent man and to the conviction of four other persons equally innocent, and this House humbly assures Her Majesty that it would ensure much greater confidence in the administration of the Law in Ireland if a full and public inquiry were granted into the execution of Myles Joyce and the continued incarceration of Patrick Joyce, Thomas Joyce, Martin Joyce, and John Casey."—(Mr. Harrington.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor,)—put, and agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

THE WEST AFRICAN CONFERENCE.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he would state what is the object of the Conference to be held in Berlin on the state of affairs on the Congo; and, whether the English Government are entering the Conference under any conditions; and, if so, if he would state what these conditions are?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE, in reply, said, that he stated yesterday that Her Majesty's Government were entering the Conference without prejudice to the rights acquired under recent Treaties negotiated by Mr. Consul Hewett.

MR. ONSLOW: Am I to understand that there are to be no conditions at all for entering the Conference?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Her Majesty's Ambassador will naturally receive instructions in regard to the various questions. The Government have given their general acceptance to the Conference; but they have considered it necessary to make specific reservations in regard to the position of this country on the Niger.

AFRICA (SOUTH)—ZULULAND.

MR. GUY DAWNAY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he can give any information to the House as to the present condition of Zululand, especially with regard to the Reserved Territory, and to the truth, or otherwise, of the report that Dinazulu and a Mr. W. Grant issued, on the 16th August, a Proclamation granting to filibustering Boers a large portion of Zulu Territory for use as an "Independent Republic," and in reward for their services in assisting the Usutusi to defeat the appointed Chief Usibepu, and to kill the men, women, and children of his tribe?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: I am happy to be able to say that the condition of affairs in and near the Reserve appears to be much improved. It is reported to us that the Usutusi in the Inkhandlha country have formally submitted themselves in a manner which the British Resident thinks satisfactory, and the General commanding has telegraphed that he sees no objection to a reduction in the strength of the troops in Zululand. Of course, a watchful and ready attitude must still for some time be maintained there. The Proclamation referred to will be found in the Papers laid on the Table of the House, which will be distributed in a few days. It tallies with the terms of the Question, except that there is no mention of any services for which the grant of territory is to be the reward.

MR. W. E. FORSTER wished to know if the Papers would be in the hands of Members to-morrow?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, he hoped that some would be in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow; but these would be the Papers which he promised last Session, and would not bring affairs up to the present date. The Papers to which he referred on Thursday would be another week.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked if he understood correctly that the Papers to be in the hands of Members to-morrow would be only those promised at the end of last Session?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, that, of course, at the end of last Session he could not promise Papers beyond that.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Inasmuch as the state of South Africa is referred to in Her Majesty's Gracious Speech, it would be of immense convenience to hon. Members if the Papers up to date could be in their hands before the debate on the Address is concluded. It will be of great inconvenience if they cannot.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: As far as the Colonial Office is concerned, they have no control over the Papers after they are laid on the Table; but I am pressing the printers and officers of the House to have them distributed as soon as possible.

MR. GUY DAWNAY inquired whether the arrangement mentioned in the Under Secretary's reply had been approved by Her Majesty's Government?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Her Majesty's Government have nothing to do with the Proclamation.

MR. GORST: Perhaps I may be allowed to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, who, I believe, is responsible for the printing of Papers—[Mr. COURTNEY: No, no.] Then I ask the Prime Minister, who is responsible for the printing of Papers laid on the Table, whether Papers, not very voluminous, laid on the Table on Thursday, cannot be distributed before the end of the following week?

[No reply was given.]

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— RELIEF OF GENERAL GORDON.

MR. CHAPLIN asked the Secretary of State for War, If he can state the precise date at which it was definitely decided by Her Majesty's Government to despatch an expedition for the relief of General Gordon?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The Foreign Office Papers which have been laid on the Table contain the principal instructions which have been given from time to time to the General Officer commanding in Egypt, and will supply the full answer to the Question. The Papers will be in the hands of Members in a very few days; but, in anticipation, I may state that the Vote of Credit was passed on August 5, that instructions for making certain preparations for an Expedition were sent on August 8, and that the first orders for the despatch of any troops beyond the frontier of Egypt at Wada Halfa were sent by telegraph on the 23rd.

MR. CHAPLIN asked whether it was to be understood that it was not until the 23rd of August that the decision was arrived at to despatch troops?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I think the hon. Member would do better to wait until he sees the instructions contained in the Papers, because there might be a difference of opinion as to what constitutes a decision to send an Expedition. No orders were issued for the movement of troops until the 23rd of August; but, in my opinion, it takes date from the time when the decision was arrived at.

NAVY—MEMORIALS—THE QUEEN'S REGULATIONS.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, in the absence of more responsible Ministers, Whether the Board will receive a memorial from the leading stokers of the Royal Navy applying for an increase of pay?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: Under the Queen's Regulations, Memorials from persons belonging to the Fleet cannot be received by the Board of Admiralty. The proper course is for representations to be made to the captain of the ship.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON MER- CHANT SHIPPING—THE COMMIS- SIONERS.

MR. COCHRAN-PATRICK asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he can now announce to the House the names of the Royal Commissioners on Merchant Shipping, and the terms of the reference; and, whether Members will be afforded any opportunity of discussing the subjects to be embraced in the inquiry?

MR. MAC IVER asked, Whether any practical steps have been taken with regard to the appointment of a Royal Commission in reference to Merchant Shipping; and, if it is intended that questions affecting the constitution and functions of the Board of Trade shall come within the scope of the inquiry?

Mr. W. E. Forster

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: In answer to the Question of the hon. Member, I have to say that the arrangements for the Royal Commission to inquire into this subject are now complete. The names of the Commissioners have been submitted to Her Majesty and approved of, and we hope that the names of the Commissioners and the terms of the Reference will be gazetted in the course of the next day or two. In regard to the second part of the Question of the hon. Member for North Ayrshire, of course I have no power in any way to limit the discretion or liberty of Members of Parliament; but I would suggest that, inasmuch as the whole subject is now to be inquired into, it would be better to postpone any discussion until the Commissioners have made their Report. As to the second Question of the hon. Member for Birkenhead, I may remind him that I stated last Session that the Reference would include the functions and administration of the Marine Department of the Board of Trade.

ARMY—THE EGYPTIAN EXPEDITION— SADDLES OF THE CAMEL CORPS.

VISCOUNT LEWISHAM asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is correct, as reported, that the saddles provided for the Camel Corps being made of green wood were unfit for service; and, if so, who is responsible?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have no information as to these saddles, which were made in Egypt under the direction of the General Officer commanding.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—ARREST OF MR. CHANCE.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Why the inquiry, promised in this House last August, into the arrest of Mr. F. A. Chance, solicitor, Dublin, has never been granted?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am not a Member of the Government at this moment, and it is only with the indulgence of the House I answer the Question of the hon. Member for Monaghan. I had brought to my notice only to-day, it so happens, the letter written by the Chief Commissioner of the Dublin Police at the end of last month. On reading that letter carefully, I find that Mr. Harrel was under a mistake with regard to the promise which I made in Committee of the House of Commons last Session. The origin of that mistake, no doubt, is that the volume of Hansard was not published; and the reports in the newspapers of what I said are, so far as I have been able to see, extremely brief, and would not convey the full meaning of what I said. But I have written to Mr. Harrel, explaining how the matter stands, and begging that the inquiry may be at once proceeded with.

MR. HEALY: Might I ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether the officials in Dublin Castle are dependent upon volumes of Hansard for the instructions which should be given them by Members of the Irish Government?

WESTERN ISLANDS OF THE PACIFIC— NEW GUINEA—THE BRITISH PRO- TECTORATE.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he can inform the House of the precise extent and situation of the coast line, and of the territory, comprised in the British Protectorate of New Guinea; whether the British authorities will have jurisdiction over the subjects of Foreign Powers, as well as over the Natives, within the Protectorate; and, whether all settlement within the Protectorate is, for the present, prohibited; and, if so, whether there is any precedent for such prohibition within the British Territory, and for how long it is to continue?

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he will inform the House what arrangements the Government have made in connection with the proposed establishment of a British Protectorate in New Guinea; what amount of territory in the interior will be brought within British jurisdiction; and, whether the Government have come to an understanding with Germany as to the occupation by the latter Power of the northern part of the Island?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: The instructions to the Commodore on the Australian Station are to proclaim the Queen's Protectorate over the whole of the Southern Coast of New Guinea, from the 141st meridian east longitude to East Cape, in Goschen's Straits, and over the adjacent Islands. Papers were laid on the Table of the House yesterday which contained an Admiralty chart showing the area in question. It is not possible, at present, to define the inland limits of the British Protectorate, as the country is unexplored and unknown; but its extent will be determined on the spot according to what local circumstances may demand. In reply to the second Question of the right hon. Gentleman, I have to say that British authority will have jurisdiction over the subjects of Foreign Powers as well as over Natives. As to the third Question, settlement within the Protectorate is at present forbidden; but it is intended that as soon as Her Majesty's Commissioner assumes charge, he shall, after consulting the Colonial Government, make such provision for the occupation of land as may sufficiently protect the interests of the Natives, and prevent collisions with them. I may remind the right hon. Gentleman that at the Colonial Convention, held at Sydney last year, there was a Resolution unanimously passed by the Delegates, that after the establishment of British jurisdiction in New Guinea, no acquisition of land should be permitted except through the Crown, and then only for missionary or trading purposes. As to the question of precedents, I am not sure that experience would not assist us more than precedent; but there are, no doubt, cases in which the occupation of land in countries under British Sovereignty and jurisdiction has been restricted; but I have not had time, owing to shortness of Notice, to hunt them up. It is, however, quite obvious that there would be collisions and outrages if land were taken over from the Natives of New Guinea without the control of a British officer. As to the Question whether the Government have come to an understanding with Germany with respect to the occupation of the Northern part of the Island by that Power, I have to answer it in the negative.

INDIA—THE INDIAN VERNACULAR PRESS ACT.

MR. ONSLOW asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he is aware that the Indian Vernacular Press Act was passed at the earnest instigation of Sir George Campbell, now Member for

Kirkcaldy, and many other officials in India of the highest position; and, whether he will produce the telegrams referred to in the following extract from one of his speeches recently delivered in Scotland, as having been sent by Lord Beaconsfield's Government:—

"Suddenly in the dark, in the privacy of the Legislative Chamber, I believe, in answer to messages sent by telegraph without the knowledge of Parliament, without the knowledge of the Country, a Law was passed which totally extinguished the freedom of the Native Indian Press?"

MR. GLADSTONE: I think that with regard to the first part of this Question the hon. Member is under some misapprehension. My hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy had left India several years before the passing of the Vernacular Press Act. I am quite aware that considerable discussion took place in India as to that Act—or, at all events, some measures connected with it—and I have heard that my hon. Friend desired some measure of that description, just as I have heard that one of the stoutest Tories of the country—the Duke of Buckingham—resolutely opposed it. I never said anything with regard to the discussion in India upon that Act; what I spoke of was the manner in which the Act was passed, without the knowledge of Parliament or the people of this country. The paragraph quoted has exclusive reference to that, and not to any discussion in India; and I hold to the principle that it is Parliament, not the local authorities, which is the guardian of the liberties of the people. The telegrams to which I referred are contained in Blue Book 2,040 of 1878. The telegram asking for leave to pass the Bill was sent on the 13th of March, 1878. The telegram from the Secretary of State sanctioning the Bill was sent on the 14th of March, and I believe the Bill was passed on the same day.

MR. ONSLOW: The impression left on the mind of everyone by the right hon. Gentleman's speech was that the initiative came from Lord Beaconsfield's Government, and that is the impression I wish to correct.

MR. GLADSTONE: I said nothing whatever of the initiative.

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR): Are not the debates of the Indian Council reported in the Indian papers as the debates in Parliament here?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not able to say; but that has not the smallest bearing on the question.

CLOSURE OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will consent to the appointment of a Select Committee, with power to summon and examine witnesses, to inquire into the mode in which one of the schemes for Redistribution, which were printed for the private consideration of certain members of Her Majesty's Government, was obtained and published in The Standard?

MR. FIRTH asked whether the printers were still being employed by Her Majesty's Government, or whether they had been dismissed or suspended?

MR. GLADSTONE: The matter of this Question has been referred, in the first instance, to the Solicitor to the Treasury. From my making that statement, it will be perceived by both the hon. Members that until we know exactly what can or cannot be done in that Department it will be better not to enter upon it. But when the proper time comes—it cannot be distant—the fullest information will be given to the House.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I would like to ask whether the Solicitor to the Treasury will have power to examine Members of the Government on the subject?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not aware that the Solicitor to the Treasury has expressed that desire. If he should express it, no doubt it will be conceded.

THE STATE OF TRADE—A ROYAL COMMISSION.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will advise Her Majesty to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the state of trade in the United Kingdom?

MR. GLADSTONE: No; I cannot.

INTERNATIONAL LAW.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether instructions have been sent to the authorities of Hong Kong and Singapore to prevent the coaling of French and Chinese vessels at those ports during hostilities between those Powers; and, whether he will consider whether a more rigid enforcement of neutral rights may not be the means of putting a stop to warlike operations which are so prejudicial to trade and commerce?

MR. GLADSTONE: The time is too early for me to give a positive answer to this Question of the right hon. and gallant Baronet. I have communicated with my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs upon it, and I am able to say that Her Majesty's Government are in consultation with the Law Officers on some points raised in this Question, and also with the French Government; but those communications have not reached such a stage as to enable me to make a statement.

SIR JOHN HAY: Have Her Majesty's Government received any authentic information that the English law has been put in force to compel the Chinese labourers to place coals on board French vessels engaged in hostilities; and, if so, will that be put a stop to?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am afraid I must ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to be kind enough to put his Question on the Paper.

PARLIAMENTARY FRANCHISE—WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

MR. TOMLINSON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, with reference to the following paragraph in the speech made by him on the platform of the Preston Railway Station, on the 26th of September last, viz.:—

"Well, I have shown that the Franchise Bill was a very simple measure, but everything was done by the Tories, whenever they could, to make it complicated. Why, what did they do? They tried to bring in a woman's franchise. What was the object of that? Do you suppose they were very fond of the woman's franchise? If they were so fond of a Woman's Franchise Bill, why did they not bring one in when they were in office for six years? No, gentlemen, their object was to weight the Franchise Bill, and make, as I have said, the ship carry such a cargo as to swamp it."

If he would state to what Amendment to the Franchise Bill of last Session he referred; and, whether he is aware that many members of the Tory Party, including some of the Leaders, have supported female franchise for some years past?

MR. GLADSTONE: I answered a portion of this Question yesterday, and I am now asked to state what Amendments in the Franchise Bill of last Session I referred to. Perhaps I ought to say, with regard to this passage, although I believe it is correctly reported, that on the occasion which has drawn the attention of the hon. Member, the station at Preston—an absolute exception to all the other stations visited in my journey Northward—was in a state of perfect chaos. Hence my reference to this matter was very curt, and was not attended with the explanations which, under other circumstances, I should have been disposed to give. That, I hope, will in some degree satisfy the hon. Gentleman; and I am quite certain that, if he had been a witness of the state of things, he would perfectly well have understood the statement I now make. I, of course, referred to the debate on women's suffrage, and to no other Amendment.

MR. TOMLINSON asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would not give an answer to the Question, which was, What Amendments he referred to?

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, Sir; I have answered it. I ought also to say that I am under the impression that some Members of the Tory Party, like a great many Members of the Liberal Party, are determined and convinced supporters of woman's suffrage, quite apart from political exigencies.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: In consequence of what has fallen from the Prime Minister, I beg to give Notice that on Monday I shall ask the President of the Board of Trade, as being responsible for the railway traffic, Whether he will communicate with the Railway authorities as to the advisability of preventing in the future political demonstrations at Railway stations?

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND) —
THE MAAMTRASNA MURDERS —
CONVICTION OF MYLES JOYCE
AND OTHERS.

MR. CALLAN asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the facts recently disclosed in the letter of His Grace the Archbishop of Tuam to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and which it appears is to form the subject matter of an Amendment on the Address, the Government will lay upon the Table of the House Copies of the dying declarations of two of the men executed for the Maamtrasna murders, admitting their own guilt, but solemnly declaring the innocence of Myles Joyce, executed at the same time, made before Mr., Brady, R.M. in the presence of the Governor of Galway Prison, on the day but one and the day before the executions, which are referred to in the Memorandum of the Under Secretary as having "formed the subject of the most anxious consideration on the part of His Excellency?" He would further say that part of the Question of which he had given Notice had been suppressed; but he proposed, nevertheless, to put it.

MR. SPEAKER: The supplementary Question which the hon. Member now proposes to put was, by my direction, expunged, and I cannot allow it to be put.

MR. CALLAN: Then I will put the Question to the Prime Minister as it now stands on the Paper, with certain words carefully suppressed.

MR. GLADSTONE: I will only refer to the Question as I have seen it. As I understand, it is a perfectly well-established practice in the Home Office with regard to England and Scotland, and in the Irish Government with regard to Ireland—and it is a practice which they conceive best in the interests of public justice—to withhold statements and confessions made by persons under sentence of death. That being the established practice, it would not be deemed advisable to depart from it.

MR. CALLAN: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, in the presence of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, was that principle followed in the case of the dying declaration of Peace?

MR. HARRINGTON: Arising out of the right hon. Gentleman's reply, may I ask, whether it is not the fact that depositions of this description were given by the Irish Government in the case of Francis Hynes; and, whether the Chief Secretary for Ireland did not state to the House that that was done for the purpose of vindicating the jury?

MR. GLADSTONE: From the Office which I hold I am not conversant with the actual Departmental practice in these matters. All I can say is that I will carefully inform myself on any inquiry which any hon. Gentleman may be disposed to put to me.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. BROADHURST: I should like to be permitted to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he can give any assistance or advice to private Members who on the previous day gave Notice of the introduction of Bills? We are in considerable doubt as to whether we should fix a Wednesday on this side of Christmas or not. If the Prime Minister can give us any assistance or advice in the circumstances, it will be very gratefully accepted.

MR. GLADSTONE: What I venture to recommend to the hon. Gentleman would be a postponement of the Question—I hope a short postponement—until the Government can in some degree see their way in regard to the stages of the Representation of the People Bill. I may say that I believe it is pretty well understood by the House that we propose, for the convenience of the House—in pursuance of what we take to be the convenience of the House and the intentions expressed in the Speech from the Throne—we propose to ask the House to consider that Bill from day to day. I hope to obtain leave to introduce that Bill to-night. I do not know absolutely whether the debate on the Address is likely to terminate to-night, or terminate, as some think, on Monday; but I think it right to take this opportunity of stating that, although I may put down the second reading of the Bill for Monday, in order to be prepared for the case of having Monday as a vacant day, yet I should not think of moving the second reading of the Bill on Monday unless it came on at a very early hour, because there is the Report of the Address, which may be more than a merely formal proceeding.

MR. RAIKES: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, whether he intends, in introducing the Representation of the People Bill to-night, to make to the House any general explanatory statement; and, having regard to the possibility of discussion arising, whether he will name any hour after which he would not propose to introduce the Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; I will not say that I will introduce the Bill absolutely without a word; but certainly I do not think that more than two minutes would be occupied in anything

I have to say. I wish to inform the House that, from communications I have received from the authorities of the House, I believe the state of Public Business will allow, and that it would be advisable, to commence Public Business at a quarter past 4 o'clock.

MR. GORST: I wish to ask the Prime Minister, whether he will undertake, after the Papers referred to in the Speech are in the possession of Members of the House, an opportunity will be given to the House for discussing the affairs of South Africa?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think, Sir, it is most proper that there should be some such opportunity; but I do not know exactly when the Papers will be in the hands of the Members of the House. I do not understand the hon. and learned Member to say immediately, but within a reasonable time; and I hope to be able to make an arrangement to that effect.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— GENERAL GORDON.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he would lay on the Table of the House all the telegrams and despatches which have been received from General Gordon since the 1st of May, and especially those received in August this year, in which General Gordon states that he holds the Government responsible for all the evils which have befallen Egypt?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE, in reply, said, he had on the previous day informed the House that full information had been laid on the Table of the House in regard to General Gordon; and if the hon. Member would only have patience until he saw the Blue Book, which would be presented to-morrow or Monday, he thought he would be satisfied with the information it contained regarding General Gordon.

POST OFFICE—SIXPENNY TELEGRAMS.

MR. RUSTON asked the Postmaster General, Whether he could inform the House when he would introduce the sixpenny telegrams?

MR. FAWCETT: In reply to my hon. Friend's Question, I have to say that there is no intention to alter the decision which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced when introducing his Budget, that the reduced rate for inland telegrams would be brought into operation on the 1st of August next.

PUBLIC MEETINGS—THE RIOT AT ASTON HALL, BIRMINGHAM.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER: I wish to put a Question to the President of the Board of Trade of which I have given him private Notice. I should like to state that I ask the Question in no contentious spirit, but simply on account of the serious mischief that may ensue from the attitude apparently taken by the President of the Board of Trade. What I wish to ask is, Whether the right hon. Gentleman is correctly reported to have used these words when alluding to the disgraceful conduct of the rioters at Birmingham at the time of the visit of the Leader of the Opposition—

alluding to the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill)—

“who is so indignant because the working men of Birmingham took him at his word and pulled off the coping of the wall in order to attend a meeting to which they had been invited, and which the Tory managers were endeavouring, by a transparent fraud, to palm off as a representation of the people of Birmingham;”

whether he does not think it a gross insult to the working men of Birmingham to accuse them of such disgraceful conduct; whether he does not think that his words practically condone the proceedings of the rioters; and, whether he considers such conduct worthy of a Cabinet Minister?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to the hon. Baronet for his courtesy in giving me Notice of this Question, although I only received that Notice a few minutes ago on coming into the House. At the same time, I will make no difficulty whatever in answering the Question. I would remind the hon. Baronet, however, that in the Notice which he has given to me, the last two Questions, which appear to be altogether matter of opinion and discussion, are struck out. I have to say that the extract which he quotes appears to me to be substantially accurate, although it is incomplete; and I regret that the hon. Baronet did not quote the earlier words of the paragraph from which he has made the extract, and in which I referred to the language of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), who, at a meeting in Edinburgh, in 1883, declared that he would never give his assent to the franchise until the labourers showed their earnestness by pulling down railings and by engaging the police and the military.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I rise to Order. I wish to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether it is in Order for a Minister of the Crown to put words into the mouth of a Member of Parliament, which that Member of Parliament never uttered?

MR. SPEAKER: If the noble Lord repudiates the words, I have no doubt the right hon. Gentleman will not insist upon them.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I will pledge myself to the House to the substantial accuracy of the words I have quoted.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I deny their accuracy. I never used them.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: Sir, I rise to Order. [Cries of “Order!”] You said, Sir, that if the noble Lord repudiated those words, the right hon. Gentleman would doubtless withdraw them. The right hon. Gentleman has, contrary to your ruling, insisted on the accuracy of the words repudiated by the noble Lord. I ask you whether such conduct is in Order?

An hon. MEMBER: On the part of a Minister of the Crown, too.

MR. SPEAKER: That is not a question of Order. What I said was that the right hon. Gentleman would, I felt sure, not continue to attribute words to the noble Lord which the noble Lord repudiated.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: But he did, Sir.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I understood the noble Lord to repudiate the verbal accuracy of the words I have quoted, and as I am speaking from memory, I do not wish to bind myself to the verbal accuracy of the words; but I pledge myself to prove to the House, if it be necessary, by the actual citation of the words reported in all the papers to have been used by the noble Lord at Edinburgh, the substantial accuracy of the statement I have just made. Now, Sir, I go on to the further Question addressed to me by the hon. Baronet. He asks me whether I do not think it is a gross insult to the working men of Birmingham to impute to them that they have been guilty of such disgraceful conduct. I must say that while the proceedings at Birmingham appear to me to be, to some extent, a matter of discussion, I shall be prepared, if the opportunity is afforded to me, to state to the House what I have heard with reference to them from my constituents, some of whom were eye-witnesses of those proceedings. In the meantime, I have to say that I have not accused the working men of Birmingham of disgraceful conduct. I do not think they have been guilty of it. If my information is accurate, the only persons who have been guilty of disgraceful conduct are the roughs who were hired as "chuckers-out" by the Tory Party.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I wish to ask the President of the Board of Trade, whether, before the debate on the Address concludes, he will take the opportunity, which he deliberately refused last night, when he was charged with direct complicity in these riots—whether he will take the opportunity of more fully going into the matter, and of giving those who differ from him an opportunity of replying to his statement?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Nothing will give me greater pleasure than to answer any accusations which may be brought in this House either against myself or against my constituents. Last night I did not reply to the statement of the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), who appeared to me, on that occasion, to be acting as jackal to the noble Lord.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: In the interests of Parliamentary decency, I rise to Order.

AN HON. MEMBER: Move the adjournment.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I wish to ask you, Sir, whether it is in Order—[Cries of "Oh!"—a point in regard to which hon. Members opposite appear to be in ignorance—whether it is in Order for a Member of this House to apply to another Member the term "jackal?"

MR. SPEAKER: I hope the noble Lord will not take the word in a too literal sense. I regarded it as figuratively used, and not, therefore, transgressing any Rule of the House, and I do not think the noble Lord himself can be serious in the matter.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I cannot help thinking, Sir, that whether the right hon. Gentleman was technically in Order or not, seeing how the expression which he used has been received, that he will venture to withdraw a word which is calculated to give pain, and the use of which, I venture to say, is not in the interests of decent language in this House.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: In answer to the appeal just made to me, I hope the House will allow me to explain that, of course, I had not the slightest intention of describing the hon. Member for Portsmouth as a jackal otherwise than figuratively. [Cries of "Withdraw!"] My intention was precisely the same as when the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) a short time ago used figurative language with regard to the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), whom, if I remember rightly, he described on that occasion as a "bonnet." But if the feelings of the hon. Member for Portsmouth have been hurt, I most willingly withdraw the expression.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I beg to tell the right hon. Gentleman that nothing he can say will affect me in any manner whatever.

MR. CALLAN: May I ask, Mr. Speaker, in the interests of peace and order, whether the word "bonnet" or "jackal" is the most discourteous?

MR. SPEAKER did not reply.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON. The Prime Minister yesterday warned us, in grave and solemn tones, that he was authorized by all his Colleagues to repudiate outrage and violence of every kind. I wish now to ask him—or, if more convenient, I will put the Question again on Monday—if, after the condonation of the President of the Board of Trade of the outrage at Birmingham, he still adheres to that statement?

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not wish to appear discourteous, but I would say that I can answer that Question either now, or, after more consideration, on Monday. Unquestionably, I am not going to abandon to-night a statement I made last night.

PUBLIC MEETINGS (IRELAND)—THE RIOT AT PORTADOWN.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: I beg to ask Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether he has received any particulars of the riots which, according to the newspaper reports, have taken place at Portadown; whether during these riots an attack was made upon Mr. Thomas Dickson, a Member of this House; and, whether he is in a position to state what is the condition of the hon. Member for Tyrone, who, the newspapers state, has been severely injured?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER), in reply, said, he had received a telegram as to the result of inquiries on the subject, and could state from the information thus received that a serious riot had taken place on the occasion of a Liberal meeting held at the Town Hall, Portadown, that several persons had been assailed, and he regretted to add that the hon. Member for Tyrone had been injured. Several persons who were engaged in these riotous proceedings had been identified, and would be prosecuted.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.] [SECOND NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [23rd October,] "That, &c."—[See page. 69.]

And which Amendment was,

To insert in the ninth paragraph, after the word "us," the words "and humbly to assure Her Majesty that it is the opinion of a vast number of the Irish people that the present method of administering the Law in Ireland, more especially under the Crimes Act, has worked manifold injustice, and, in the case of the prisoners tried for the Maamtrasna murder, has led to the execution of an innocent man and to the conviction of four other persons equally innocent, and this House humbly assures Her Majesty that it would ensure much greater confidence in the administration of the Law in Ireland if a full and public inquiry were granted into the execution of Myles Joyce and the continued incarceration of Patrick Joyce, Thomas Joyce, Martin Joyce, and John Casey."—(Mr. Harrington.)

Debate resumed.

AMENDMENT (MR. HARRINGTON)—THE MAAMTRASNA MURDERS—CONVICTION OF MYLES JOYCE AND OTHERS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he wished to remind hon. Members of the House of the precise nature of the case which had been urged against the Government, by those who had carefully and fully investigated the matter in question, concerning what was known as the Maamtrasna murders. The locality in which these murders took place was a wild district in the west of Lough Mask. The district was poor, very wild, the holdings being small, interspersed, badly fenced, and in certain cases difficult to identify. Circumstances which had come to light proved beyond all doubt that, unfortunately, in the community who resided there, there was, it appeared, a local secret society established, and to it many of the people there belonged. John Joyce, the murdered man, who lived at Maamtrasna, was the treasurer of this society, and he had many quarrels with another member of the society named Casey. The latter had been repeatedly threatened by Joyce, but he did not inform the police, because Joyce threatened to make known to the authorities the existence and names of the members of the society. Several meetings of the society were held. Quarrels had occurred as to sheep and other matters, and in August, 1882, an attack, instigated by revenge, took place. At the meetings attended by the Joyces and Thomas Casey, who subsequently became Government informer, it was proved that those who took part in it were provided with disguises in the shape of white coats or coverings. The faces of the other six men were blackened with boot-black. John P. Joyce was disguised by having a soft hat; and Thomas Casey was similarly disguised. Then some of these men adopted for the nonce assumed names. Three of them were named by John Casey as the persons who actually participated in the murder. These men started from a house which was within three-quarters of a mile of Maamtrasna, went direct to the house of John Joyce, and the murder was committed. It was supposed that the two sons had also been massacred, but the younger son survived, and was still living. He and his brother, who succumbed within 24 hours of the murder, gave depositions to the police, which were now in the hands of the Government. The truth was that Joyce had feuds with some of his neighbours, among whom were Anthony Joyce, John Joyce of Derry, and his son and others. Anthony Joyce, as could easily be proved, had, on more than one occasion, tried to wreak his vengeance upon John Joyce; but Anthony knew absolutely nothing about the murder. He was not near it, and only heard of it on the following morning. He, however, went to the scene of the tragedy, made a minute inspection, and then in conjunction with John Joyce of Derry and the son of the latter he concocted a false charge. This charge was supported throughout by the most palpable perjury. His story was that he was awakened on the night in question by the barking of a dog; he had looked out and saw six men passing his house; that he then went to his brother's house and aroused him, and accompanied him in search of the six mysterious figures whom they saw enter the house of Michael Casey, where they were joined by four others. Now, these men—Anthony, his brother, and his nephew—would have them believe that they tracked the 10 men for three miles, witnessed the entry of the house, heard the cries of the victims, and were able to return without being observed. Now, the men who committed the crime were perfectly well known, and some of them had confessed that they started only three-quarters of a mile from the scene of the tragedy. The story of Anthony Joyce was palpably false in every respect, as was clearly shown by the dying depositions of the son of the victim. The boy could not swear to the culprits owing to their disguise, yet the latter were identified by Anthony Joyce and his party on a dark night. Anthony's niece, Mary Joyce, was several weeks afterwards brought forward to bolster up this false statement. One of the informers, Philbin, produced by the Government to furnish the necessary corroboration, had nothing whatever to do with the murder; but the Government's agents arrested him and so practised upon him that he ultimately consented to enter into a treaty with George Bolton, the Crown Solicitor, in regard to giving evidence. Philbin knew perfectly well what he was required to say, and was afterwards put into a yard with Thomas Casey, one of the accused, in order that his statement might be safely corroborated. Philbin, however, himself turned informer, and made two depositions, one on the 9th of November, which was so unsatisfactory that on the 10th of November he made another, each witnessed by Mr. Bolton; and at last Casey expressed his willingness to give some information. But before he did so, Mr. Brady, one of the Resident Magistrates, read over to Casey the deposition of Philbin, in order that he might know what he was required to affirm. Upon the testimony which they must have known to be perjured, the officers of the Crown pressed the case against the prisoners. That was a serious charge to make against the Administration; but he affirmed that the Courts of Queen Victoria in Ireland were no better than some of the Courts of Elizabeth, which Hallam had stigmatized as caverns of murder. Myles Joyce had been as deliberately done to death as had Lord Frederick Cavendish, and it was absurd to profess horror at one crime and to hide another as heinous. Last Session he had brought before the House a Motion to inquire into the proceedings of the Government with regard to certain charges made against high officials in Ireland. That Motion was refused; but subsequent events, the case of Cornwall against O'Brien alone, proved that that Motion was thoroughly warranted. It was known who had been concerned in these murders—J. Casey, J. Casey, junr., P. Leyden, Thomas Casey, Patrick Casey, Michael Casey, and Patrick Joyce. Of these, two men were executed and one man sentenced to penal servitude; but the determination of the Government to have victims sacrificed Michael Joyce, and sent four other men, equally innocent, into penal servitude. It was impossible to bring back the soul of Myles Joyce; but if any respect for the law was to exist in Ireland, it was absolutely indispensable that some indication should be given in this country that there existed some real desire to do equal and impartial justice in that country, and that they should no longer allow legalized murder to stalk with impunity throughout the Island.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, the

demand of the hon. Member was that the Government should review eight convictions, five of which had been obtained on the confession of the accused men, and this demand was made not to satisfy feeling in Ireland, but in order that public justice and the administration of the law might be discredited. It was asked to review convictions made in the presence of a Judge by a jury who were admittedly impartial, partly upon the unsworn statement of an informer, whose case was that he was a perjurer at the trial as well as the murderer of innocent men, and partly on the protestations of innocence made by convicted men. The charge of the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) was that Lord Spencer, Mr. Justice Johnson, Mr. Justice Murphy, Mr. Serjeant O'Brien, and others, had "feloniously, wickedly, murderously"—he used the words of the hon. Member—entered into a conspiracy to suppress evidence in order to obtain the conviction of innocent men, and to screen guilty ones. It was worth remembering that this demand for a re-investigation of the case was made two years and three months after the trial. The hon. Member for Westmeath visited the scene of this outrage, as he said in one of his letters, "to strengthen the position of those who were demanding justice." There was one statement made by the hon. Member last night which impressed him very much, and that was that when he and the reverend gentleman who accompanied him were visiting one John Joyce and asked him a certain question, the man said, in answer to the priest—"Don't press me, father." That expression was an emphatic illustration of the process resorted to by those who were seeking to get up a case against the Government. Another matter dwelt upon by the hon. Member was the briefs of the Crown. The hon. Member for Westmeath, using a euphemistic expression, said—"They had fallen into his hands." For his own part, he attached no value to what was said in a brief which was abstracted from the Crown—stolen, very possibly, and which any man capable of stealing it would not scruple to alter and use. Would anybody standing up in the name of justice and in the interests of justice descend to the use of arguments from such a source? There were two periods when this case was under the consideration of Lord

Spencer—one, when he felt coerced to say the law should take its course; and the second in August last, when Lord Spencer reviewed all the statements made by the approvers, and all the facts of the case, and came to the conclusion that the trial had been a fair one. It would be difficult for anyone who listened yesterday to the statement of the hon. Member for Westmeath to have appreciated the evidence for the Crown. What was that evidence? On the night of the 17th of August, 1882, a horrible massacre of five persons took place at the house of John Joyce, Maamtrasna—the old grandmother of 80, the husband, the wife, the grown-up daughter, the son, were murdered, and an attempt was made upon the life of a child of nine. Old and young were included in that butchery in order that no trace of the murderers might be left. Was it to be supposed that those who prosecuted on the part of the Crown had any special ill-will to Myles Joyce, who was now said to be innocent on the unsworn evidence of a man who admitted that he was in the murder, and whose story, if he came into the box, any jury would be told to discredit. On the morning following the night of the murder three men came forward of unblemished character, without any motive—no reward had been offered, not one sixpence, at the time these men made their statement against those 10 persons. The three men came forward at once and gave information, and the 10 men were arrested and put upon their trial. It was true that John Casey also was arrested, and detained for a short time; but the Crown found that there was no case against him. It was said that the witnesses falsely accused the 10 men. But four of them admitted their guilt. It was said that that was a chance. Was it only a chance that the four men who admitted their guilt were among the 10, especially as one of the four, Thomas Casey, came from a place which was a considerable distance away? The prisoners were arraigned on the 1st of November, counsel and solicitor were assigned them, and the trials were adjourned until the 13th of November to enable the prisoners' counsel to visit the locality, and make up their case; and all that was done at the expense of the Crown. Mr. Malley, one of the most experienced counsel in Ireland in defence of prisoners, was assigned them, and he was paid 20 guineas to enable him to go down and examine the locality. It was said yesterday by the hon. Member for Westmeath that certain depositions were not in the possession of the prisoners' counsel.

MR. HARRINGTON asked whether he was to understand that the depositions of Michael Joyce and Patrick Joyce were included?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, that every deposition was in the possession of the prisoners' counsel. [MR. HARRINGTON: That is not so.] The hon. Member should remember the difference between depositions and declarations. What he was stating now was literally correct, that not only these, but every deposition made at the inquest, including that which the hon. Member said was suppressed, was in the possession of the prisoners' counsel. The trial came on, and the three witnesses were subjected to a searching cross-examination, and there was no impeachment of their character. There were three trials by separate juries; no juror who served on one trial served on another; and in each a verdict of guilty was returned. And now he would give a short account of the evidence given at the trial. On that night in August it was beyond doubt that John Joyce's house was attacked by a party of murderers. In that wild country there was an old road which passed by the house of the two men, John and Anthony Joyce. One of the gang, Thomas Casey, came from some miles away, the others from the immediate neighbourhood. That old road would be the way the men would naturally take. [MR. HARRINGTON: No, no.] He did not interrupt the hon. Member for Westmeath when he was making his statement.

MR. HARRINGTON: I stated facts.

MR. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. Member will allow the hon. and learned Gentleman to proceed.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER), resuming, said, he had himself taken the trouble to walk over every portion of the ground without asking any questions, but having with him one of the persons who gave evidence on the trial, and he took care to see that every spot identified was one about which there was ample grounds for identification; and if there was a doubt they could not have failed to discover it. It was said yesterday by the hon. Member for Westmeath that the night was dark. The constable swore it was a bright, starry night. It was the fifth day of the new moon. There was evidence to show that the night was not too dark to see the murderers. Anthony Joyce, whose house was a short distance away, was awakened by the barking of a dog. He saw figures on the old road, and recognized six men whom he had known all his life. Some of the men lived almost within a stone's throw. The six men in question were Anthony Philbin, Thomas Casey, Martin Joyce, Myles Joyce, Pat Joyce, and Thomas Joyce. Anthony Joyce thought that they were up to no good, and accordingly he went by a short cut to the house of his brother John, which he reached before the murderers could pass it. John Joyce's daughter Mary, a grown-up young woman, saw her uncle Anthony entering her father's house and heard the conversation which passed. It was said that Mary Joyce did not give evidence until some months after the trial. In point of fact, she made a statement on the same day as her father and uncle. John Joyce went up over his house to see where the men were going. He saw that they went in the direction of the house of Michael Casey, a little further on. It had been admitted that Michael Casey was a participator in the murder. Ten men were seen leaving his house. Those men passed within a few feet of Anthony Joyce, his son, and his brother, who followed them along the mountain-path until they took the fields in the direction of the house of the murdered man. There at last the witnesses arrived, and, from behind a bush, witnessed the 10 men enter the yard. They saw a rush at the door, and heard screams, after which they fled in terror to their homes. When Patrick Joyce was arrested on the following day on the information of the three Joyces, one of the first questions he asked was whether Anthony Philbin had been arrested. That was a most singular corroboration. It was asked why were these men not taken red-handed. It should be remembered that there were three against 10, and that the barracks was some miles away from the place where the murders were committed. [Several Irish MEMBERS: No; one mile.] It was stated yesterday that the barracks was five miles away. The House should remember that all Joyce had said had been before three juries. It had been made the subject of examination and cross-examination, and had been dealt with in the Judge's charge. As to the motive which prompted the murder, it had been suggested that the old woman had given information with respect to the murder of the two Huddys which took place some time before, and whose bodies had been thrown into Lough Mask. But the hon. Member for Westmeath, in the letters he had written, had given an ample motive. The hon. Member had said that Patrick Joyce was the head of a Ribbon Society of the district, that John Joyce had been the treasurer of that society, and that the Joyces had given information. Everyone knew that if a member of a Ribbon Society gave information he might be murdered for so doing. It was obvious, however, that some strong motive must have induced the men to murder the old woman. When the evidence of the three Joyces was impeached, the House should consider what was said by the Judge in summing up. The Judge declared that the witnesses gave their testimony in a most satisfactory and trustworthy manner. He wished to point out that on the 23rd of August, 1882, in The Freeman's Journal, the very newspaper in which the letters of the hon. Member for Westmeath appeared, there was given a description of the witnesses at the inquest and of the alleged murderers, and it was stated that the people of the locality described the 10 men who had been arrested as the biggest devils in the district, who had long been the terror of the neighbourhood, and they shook hands with the witnesses and blessed them, and expressed their rejoicing that this murderous gang had at last been run to earth. Public opinion was expressed at the conclusion of the three trials; he referred to the 2nd of November, 1882. At the conclusion of these trials on the 2nd of November, 1882, the same organ of public opinion said that the jury had done their duty, that they had been fairly selected, that it had been shown that Irishmen would not shrink from their duty when a case was proven, that the verdicts would be supported by the feeling of the country, that there was no justification for the charge of jury-packing to obtain a conviction, that the restoration of the Catholics of Ireland

to the jury-box had been vindicated, that they had retrieved the character of Irish juries, whose verdicts would cease to be received with dissatisfaction and murmurs of distrust, that there was a unanimous feeling that justice had been done in the right and Constitutional way, and that it was a satisfaction to the journal to have been an humble agent in achieving this great end. Such was contemporaneous public opinion as expressed in that newspaper when the verdicts were given. In United Ireland, which was a journal of still more extreme opinions, exactly the same commendations were expressed; it was said that the duty of the jury had been honestly and fairly done, and that in future the verdicts of juries would perhaps be rather more scrupulously respected. [Mr. O'BRIEN: At what stage were these remarks made?] They followed the sentence of Myles Joyce, they were made on the 25th of November, 1882, and they were followed by the declaration—

With respect to what had been said about the plea of guilty, he would ask whether it had ever been known in the experience of a criminal lawyer that a man charged with murder had said he was guilty when he was not? Indeed, it seemed to pass the limits of human imagination that it should be so. It was part of the case of hon. Members that not only Myles Joyce was innocent, but that the four men who pleaded guilty were also innocent. The first trial lasted three days, the second three days, the third two days, and two witnesses whose expenses had been paid by the Crown were present for the purpose of proving an alibi. Mr. Malley, counsel for the defence, appealed to the counsel to the Crown to know whether, if the four pleaded guilty, the capital sentence would be remitted; he was informed that no such hope could be held out. Mr. Malley would not take upon himself to recommend the withdrawal of the plea of not guilty by the five prisoners until they had seen their priest, and when they had seen him he advised them to plead guilty.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, that he was stating it on the information of the counsel who was prosecuting. The counsel was told who was their priest; and he (the Rev. Mr. M'Hugh) came up, and having seen them he advised them to plead guilty. It was said that they had refused to do so when the Crown Solicitor asked them; but because they did so on the advice of the priest, we were asked to believe in their innocence. Was it to be said that the rev. gentleman, believing in their innocence, advised them to plead guilty, and yet never uttered a word in explanation to those who held in their hands the issues of life and death? He could not believe it. On the withdrawal of the plea of not guilty, Mr. Malley made an appeal to the Attorney General to be satisfied with the condemnation of the three most prominent of the culprits; and the Attorney General said that he could do nothing. In their subsequent memorial they said they did not enter the house and had no active participation in the crime; and upon that view of the matter the sentence was commuted. It was said there was evidence that could have been given that the men who committed the murder had their faces blackened and were unrecognizable; but when Michael Joyce made the statement on the 18th of August, he was dying; he had two revolver bullets in him which could not be extracted; he was unconscious and raving. True, he said—"Two or three men came in; they had their faces blackened." But to anyone representing the Crown that could not appear to be of the smallest moment. There was ample time for them to have blackened their faces after they left Michael Casey's house. But even if their faces were not blackened, there was nothing more likely than that, in the limited space of the cottage, to the boys awakened by the dying screams of their father and their mother, in the flickering gleams of bog oak torches, the faces of the murderers might well appear to have been blackened. Michael Joyce further said that he was asleep at the time, and he heard a dog bark; that the men said something to his father, and that he had been at mass the day before at Friney. [Mr. HEALY: It was a Catholic holiday.] No; it was not a Catholic holiday. It was the 17th of August, and it had been ascertained that there was no mass there the day before. Then the boy went on to say that he had been sworn on a book not to say anything. It was obvious that it was impossible to attach much value to the evidence of this boy in these circumstances, and when he was passing away from life. So much for Michael Joyce. Then there was the evidence of Patrick Joyce, who recovered. He was a boy about nine, and he made a declaration on the 18th of August, in which he said that these men "had soot on their faces; they had a kippeen each; they lighted them in the house; I got three strokes; they had no coats on and wore bonneens." Anybody who knew the dress the Irish peasants wore in the West, he ventured to say, instead of saying that they were perfectly white, would believe that they were more nearly black. Thus his evidence was wholly inconsistent with that of Anthony Joyce. The point insisted on was that the prisoners' counsel did not know that a statement had been made that the faces of the men were black. The whole of the parties concerned in the trials were charged with having got up a murderous concoction to encompass the death of the prisoners. All he could say was that the depositions at the inquest which proved these statements of the boys as to the black faces were in the hands of the advisers of the prisoners, and they could have asked any question that they wished on cross-examination. It was not the duty of the counsel for the Crown to bring the matter forward. It was suggested that these depositions were kept back; but the fact was that they were published in the public Press and in The Freeman's Journal long before the trials, and the information was thus scattered far and wide. The Judge knew of them, as he had the brief of the Crown counsel before him. Then there was the question of the composition of the jury. Now, there was no challenge of the jury, which was about equally composed of Protestants and Catholics. With regard to the brief which was stolen, it was said that there was the letter "C" marked in it to indicate the word Catholic. Well, the newspapers had called attention to the fact that the number of Catholics and Protestants serving on the jury were equal. The letter "C," however, did not signify the word Catholic, but "challenged." What the word "sturdy" meant he did not know, but believed that whoever stole the brief was quite capable of writing it. With regard to the boy, Patrick Joyce, the Crown had put him forward but did not examine him, and I am informed the counsel for the prisoners extracted that the boy did not understand the nature of an oath. The hon. Member for Westmeath had stated that the convicted men had written letters declaring their innocence. He would like to know whether it was very likely that any person would declare anything else in a letter which passed under the eyes of the officials of the gaol? The Crown had, he contended, only vindicated the law in the course which they had taken. With regard to the statements of Casey and Philbin, it might be that they gave false evidence, and it might be that their statement was false that Myles Joyce entered the house. Well, if he was there with the gang, he was as guilty in the eyes of the law as any of them. [Mr. KENNY: He was not there.] Myles Joyce was not in the house, but was there; that was the explanation which had been put upon the case by three juries. When an inquiry was made for compensation to the families of the murdered persons, the two approvers came forward and repeated the same story, although the proceedings were not conducted by the Crown. He would tell the House something more about Thomas Casey. His statement on the 28th of July last was that Myles Joyce was present at the scene of the murder, but did not go into the house. And on the 10th of August he said he had sworn falsely against Myles Joyce and five other innocent men, and that he suppressed the names of the real murderers because he had been paid money to do so by the son of one of the murderers. It was upon the unsworn statement of such a man that the House was asked to subvert everything which had been done by three juries and an upright Judge, and that John Casey, senior, and his son were asked to be prosecuted. Thomas Casey, no doubt, wanted to rehabilitate himself in the eyes of the lawless people in his district. It was said Thomas Casey was induced to make his original statements by the Crown Solicitor, that Philbin and he were put into the prison yard together, and that he made that statement under protest. The first communication which passed between Mr. Bolton and Casey was a message sent by Casey to Mr. Bolton on November 11th, saying—"I have a little important statement to make to yer honor." The suggestion now put forward by Casey was that Bolton wrote down the statement which he desired him to make. That turned out to be utterly false. The statement was made in the presence of Mr. Bolton, Mr. Brady, the Resident Magistrate, and the prison Governor, and it was written by Mr. Brady with his own hand, and was still in existence to show that Mr. Bolton had not written any of it. This Amendment was supported by an appeal to the unsworn testimony of an admitted murderer and perjurer. It was a deliberate attempt to discredit the administration of all law in Ireland, and to make uncertain the verdicts of juries in Ireland.

Mr. CALLAN rose to Order. He desired to know whether it was in Order for an official of the Crown to charge a Member of that House with a deliberate attempt to pervert the course of justice?

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. and learned Gentleman alludes to any Member of this House when he says there has been a deliberate attempt to pervert justice, he is not in Order in doing so.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, if his words implied such a meaning, he would withdraw. What he desired to convey was that the effect of this Motion would be to discredit the administration of law, and to make jury trials, which were the safeguard of law and order, uncertain. It would have the effect of making the evidence of informers impossible in a Court of Law, which would be a very convenient thing for those engaged in dark conspiracies. But it was well that the conspirators should know that there were amongst them those whom they could not trust, no matter how solemn the oath they took might be. He hoped the House would negative the Amendment.

Mr. GORST said, the question which had been raised by the Amendment was one of great gravity and importance, and he thought it deserved to be treated in a very much calmer and more judicial spirit than had been shown by the hon.

and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland. He did not apologize for taking part in the discussion, because they all were interested in justice being administered in such a manner that the people would have confidence in its administration. In the present case, there were two perfectly distinct questions. One was, whether there had been any miscarriage of justice? And the other was, if there had been any, whether that miscarriage of justice was due to any misconduct on the part of the officials who represented the Crown in Ireland? If it were important that the administration of justice in Great Britain should be free from suspicion, it was ten-fold more important that it should be free from suspicion in Ireland, because Parliament had thought fit to clothe the Executive Government in Ireland with extraordinary powers, and the only check of those powers was the careful and scrupulous administration of justice. Some years ago, he drew the attention of the House to the way in which crime in Ireland appeared to escape punishment, and to the way in which juries refused to return verdicts of guilty, even on the most conclusive evidence; but he should have been extremely sorry if he had supposed it could have been imagined for a moment that he advocated the establishment of tribunals which would exercise anything else than the most perfect and complete justice. When a case of this kind was brought under the consideration of the House of Commons, it was not, in his opinion, seemly that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, as representing the Government, should get up and make a strong partizan speech, ignoring the real difficulties of the case, and, in fact, to tell the House that there was nothing whatever in it—that it was a mere attempt on the part of certain Members to cast discredit upon the administration of the law; and, indeed, that any person who regarded this as a grave matter, deserving earnest attention on the part of the Government, must be either a fool, or in league with disloyal persons. He (Mr. Gorst) could not help thinking that if the prosecution of criminals in Ireland was conducted in the same spirit as the case of the Government had been defended that night by the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland, he was not at all astonished that the people of Ireland should have little confidence in the administration of justice. If (Mr. Gorst) had had some experience of Crown prosecutions. He was, while the late Government held Office, repeated in Crown prosecutions with the late Sir John Holker, who was distinguished for his fairness and impartiality in conducting prosecutions, as also for his ability and knowledge of law. He had not the slightest doubt but that the hon. and learned Gentleman the present Attorney General (Sir Henry James) would take the most scrupulous care that every single fact of importance in a case, whether went for or against the guilt of the prisoner, should be fully and fairly submitted to the jury. He (Mr. Gorst) did not know whether that was done in the Maamtrasna trials; but, certainly, it was not done if the speech of the prosecuting counsel was anything like the speech they had heard that night. He certainly never before heard a more reckless assertion than the one that he just been made by the hon. and learned Gentleman. The hon. and learned Gentleman had been careful to impress upon the House that the identification of the accused men was easy, inasmuch as that night was bright and starlight. He (Mr. Gorst), however, had always understood that a night could not be starlight unless it was somewhat dark. The hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) had asserted that the evidence of Anthony and his brother John and his nephew was uncorroborated, except his niece Mary, and that Mary had given her testimony until some time after her uncle had been examined. The hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland had met that assertion by a declaration that Mary's deposition had been taken on the same day as that of his uncle. In these circumstances, he had asked for the loan of the stolen Crown brief. He did not know how that document had been come by, but there was, as clearly a genuine one as the distribution scheme published by the Standard the other day; and on looking at that brief, he found that whereas the deposition of Anthony was taken on August 20, that of Mary was not taken until August 28.

[Second Night.]

MR. HEALY: No, no; you said the same day.

MR. GORST: The hon. and learned Gentleman certainly made that statement.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): I said the statements were made on the same day. Their depositions were made on different days.

MR. GORST said, he had a distinct recollection of what the hon. and learned Gentleman had said on this point; and beyond that, there was no evidence with regard to their statements, but there was as regarded their depositions. The hon. and learned Gentleman had also asked the House to believe in the testimony of these witnesses, because their demeanour in giving their evidence had been so satisfactory; but their evidence had been given in the Irish language, and it was impossible that anyone who did not understand that language could judge of their demeanour. He should be sorry to ask the House to pronounce judgment as to the guilt or the innocence of these men, but certainly the hon. and learned Gentleman was guilty of exaggeration and would not carry the House with him when he declared that there was no doubt or difficulty in the case. For his part, he (Mr. Gorst) did not think that anybody could be quite comfortable in his mind with regard to the question whether the right men had been convicted and executed. The whole story that had been told by Anthony and John Joyce of the way in which they had identified these men was a most improbable one, inasmuch as they had given no explanation of their conduct in being out at so late an hour, and of following this gang of murderers to the house where the murder was committed, and in their running away. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland had said that there was no motive on their part for giving false evidence; but, on the other hand, there was no motive for the accused persons committing the murder. It might, however, be suggested that a substantial motive existed in the minds of Anthony and John, to induce them to give false testimony, in the very large reward that was given in Ireland to those who gave evidence which secured the conviction of any person charged with murder. He was rather surprised that the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland should rely so much upon newspaper criticism, because he did not know that the remarks which appeared in the newspapers were very much calculated to assist the House in arriving at a conclusion with regard to the matter. He must remark, however, that the eulogies which had appeared in the newspapers, and which had been read, were confined entirely to the conduct of the jury. No one was inclined to find fault with the conduct of the jury, for the evidence laid before them was such as ought to induce them to convict in any case. The hon. and learned Gentleman had dwelt with great force upon the absence of motive evinced for the fact that these five men had pleaded guilty, and no doubt at first sight that did appear to be a very remarkable fact if they were innocent; but with regard to it an important question was this—Had there been any hope held out to these men on the part of the Crown, or by anyone representing it, that if they pleaded guilty, their lives would be spared?—because, if so, that would afford an intelligible explanation of their conduct. It must be recollected that three men had already been tried and convicted upon exactly the same evidence as that which these five men knew would be given against them, and therefore they must have had little hope of escaping conviction, in which case they would have been sentenced to death and hanged, and, therefore, they would naturally have snatched at any hope that might be held out to them by the Crown officials that if they pleaded guilty they would save their necks from the rope. Therefore, what they did was perfectly intelligible. But there was a piece of very striking evidence which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland had entirely and absolutely slurred over. It appeared that they had been induced to plead guilty by the persuasion of their parish priest—at least, that was the effect of the evidence of a religious and respectable man; but what he said, and what the hon. and learned Gentleman had made no allusion whatever to, was very vital. The reverend gentleman said that, at the time, he was by no means sure of the innocence of these men; but that he was inclined to believe that they were so from their declarations. He further said that he had urged them to plead guilty, because if they really were guilty their plea of guilty would do them no harm, and it would save their necks—how he obtained that information, except through the Crown officials, he (Mr. Gorst) could not conceive—while if they were innocent, he felt that eventually the truth would leak out, and that a huge wrong could not continue for ever, and that he saw a chance of the men being at length returned to their homes and their families without a stain on their characters. The reverend gentleman further declared that, in advising the men to plead guilty, he had not been influenced by a belief in their guilt; but that, on the contrary, he had rather believed them to be innocent. Now, the House would note how carefully the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland ignored all that. He came now to what he regarded as the kernel of the matter—the most preposterous and absurd argument that had been put forward by the hon. and learned Gentleman. He (Mr. Gorst) had been so much struck by the extremely partizan speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman, that, while the hon. and learned Gentleman was addressing the House, he had remarked to an hon. Friend near him that he should not be surprised if the hon. and learned Gentleman did not say black was white before he sat down, and the hon. and learned Gentleman had literally done so. The evidence on which these men were convicted was that the murderers had white faces and black clothes. But the two poor boys, on the day after the murder, the first opportunity after they had been struck down, and without the slightest chance of collusion between them, had stated that the men who had attacked them wore white coats, and that they had their faces blackened, and therefore they were unable to recognize them. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that the fact was that the men had white faces and black coats, and that in their delirium the lads had mistaken the white faces for white coats and the black coats for black faces. Now he (Mr. Gorst), on this point, must say that he considered the conduct of the Crown officials and the Crown Prosecutor, in keeping back the fact that the men's faces were blackened, was absolutely indefensible, and such as he was quite sure would never have been committed by the hon. and learned Attorney General for England, whom he saw opposite, nor by any of his Predecessors. The action of this case turned upon the question of identification on this "bright starry night." If there was one fact in the case more clear than another, it was that these men had blackened faces—in fact, it was in the Crown brief, and was there to be seen now. The morning after the murder, the people who came to the house found one boy of 17 years dying, and a little boy of 10 years also apparently dying, but who had since recovered. As he had said both these lads mentioned, and there could have been no collusion between them, that the men who had entered the house, and who had committed the crime, had their faces blackened, and that they could not recognize them; but the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland, indeed, would have them believe that the deposition of Michael Joyce was that of a raving maniac; but he found in that Crown brief, and he supposed it was a fact, that the deposition of this "raving maniac" was taken by one Mr. Brady, Resident Magistrate, and he supposed that Resident Magistrates knew their duties better than to take the declarations of raving maniacs; but it was not only that—the fact of the blackened faces was set forth in a further deposition, and was a prominent feature of the case, and when the guilt of the prisoners depended on the evidence of Anthony Joyce and his accomplices, and when the credibility of the witnesses rested on their power of identification on that starlight night, the fact that the faces were blackened was of most vital importance, and one which should not have been withheld from the cognizance of the jury. He challenged the hon. and learned Attorney General for England to say whether he did not consider that that fact ought to have been communicated to the jury by the Crown counsel; and whether, if such a case occurred in England, the hon. and learned Gentleman would not have taken the most scrupulous care that this important fact should be solemnly brought to the knowledge of the jury? Well, again, he noticed on the second day of the trial a most remarkable thing. In the report of the proceedings which he held in his hand, it appeared that John Collins, who was first in the house after the murder, deposed to finding

[Second Night.]

Michael Joyce still alive. That was on the morning of the 18th, and upon the witness making that statement, one of the jurors—a Mr. Pim—who appeared to be a most sagacious and intelligent man, inquired whether Michael Joyce had made any statement to him when he entered. The Judge, however (Mr. Justice Barry), interposing, said—“That question need not be answered. We have had already a statement of the doctors that Michael was raving, and unable to make any statement.” Now, if Mr. Pim, instead of thus being interfered with, and cut short by the Judge, had been informed that Michael Joyce had made a statement to John Collins and to a police constable, and a dying declaration before a Resident Magistrate, in all of which he had given the blackened state of the men’s faces as the reason why he could not identify them, he (Mr. Gorst) did not know but that that might have altered the verdict of the jury. He hoped the hon. and learned Attorney General for England (Sir Henry James) had read the evidence as he (Mr. Gorst) had done. He had done so very carefully, and he found that the case, apart from the informers who had recanted, rested on the evidence of Anthony Joyce, and he asked himself this question—If Anthony Joyce and his party could, on a starlight night, identify all these men, with their faces blackened, at a distance of 40 or 50 yards—[Mr. HARRINGTON: 150 yards]—well, it would serve his purpose—he asked himself how it was that, if they could that night identify anyone at that distance, Michael Joyce, awakened in the middle of the night with the light of torches around him, could have failed to identify the murderers, even if they were strangers? [Mr. HARRINGTON: They were cousins.] He (Mr. Gorst) had never been awakened in the night to see a murderous face; but if he were, he thought he would recollect that face to the end of his days. To him it seemed incredible almost that the Crown Prosecutor could have held back so much; and he could not think that even the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland could rest satisfied with a verdict so open to doubt as that. But he had just forgotten one further instance of the recklessness of the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland.

Mr. Gorst

It was asked—Why did not these men when terrified, go to the barracks? “Oh,” said the Solicitor General for Ireland, “the barracks was five miles off;” and he (Mr. Gorst) thought no more of it, believing, of course, that the hon. and learned Gentleman would not say that if he did not know it was a fact. But the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had just informed him (Mr. Gorst) that he had measured the distance on the Ordnance map in the Library, and found it was under one mile. All he could say was, that if prosecutions in Ireland were conducted as this case would have one to suppose they sometimes were, and as the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland would tend to prove, then he was not in the least surprised that there was sometimes discontent amongst the Irish Members and people, and miscarriages of justice. The facts were that three men were found guilty and hanged, the third of whom died solemnly protesting his innocence to the last. The other two men made depositions, which the Government would not produce, admitting their own guilt, but denying the guilt of the unhappy man who suffered with them. Five other men were sentenced to penal servitude, of whom four asserted their innocence, and the fifth, according to an hon. Member, had said that he was guilty. An informer, upon whose evidence these men were convicted, came forward to say that he had told a tissue of falsehoods. The other informer, he (Mr. Gorst) believed, had made a similar statement. The whole case, in fact, upon which the Crown hanged Myles Joyce had crumbled away, with the sole exception of the statement of Anthony Joyce and his party, evidence which was open to the very gravest doubt. Could the Government be sure, in such a case, that there had been no miscarriage of justice? And would they not at least undertake that there should be a searching inquiry made on the spot, such as was made in Kilmartin’s case, which had been attended with the best results, and that the witnesses should all be examined? They were not dealing with unknown persons. He thought the dying depositions of these executed men might very properly be produced. Now, there was a second allegation made on the responsibility of the Archbishop of Tuam—namely, that there was misconduct on the part of the Crown officials, regarding which it was said there had been an inquiry. It was true that the Government had made an inquiry of some kind or other; but who had been the investigators? Why, the inculpated officials themselves. He did not hesitate to declare such an inquiry as that a complete farce. If ever there were a case in which the Executive Government of Ireland should have welcomed some independent inquiry, it would be a case of this sort. He (Mr. Gorst) could understand them refusing any inquiry at all; but, if they conceded any kind of a trial, he should have thought that, for their own sakes, they would have got hold of the most independent person they could lay hands on—an English Judge, for instance, such as Lord Bramwell—and would have invited him to inquire whether the administration of justice had been in accordance with the maxims and principles happily prevalent in the Kingdom of England. If Lord Bramwell had looked into the matter, and had acquitted the authorities, the Government would have had a triumphant justification before the whole of the United Kingdom; but for the Lord Lieutenant to write to the Archbishop and say that he sent him a Memorandum in which he entirely concurred, and when this Memorandum had obviously been drawn up by the inculpated officials, such an inquiry was a perfect farce. The inquiry which had been held was unsatisfactory and unreliable, and therefore he (Mr. Gorst) did earnestly impress upon the Government the paramount importance of placing the administration of justice in Ireland above all suspicion, and of selecting someone of the position, and with the authority, which Lord Bramwell possessed to inquire into the case. If that was done, he thought everybody would be willing to abide by the result of such an appointment.

MR. HEALY said, he was sure that he spoke the sentiments of his Colleagues when he said that Ireland owed a deep debt of gratitude to the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) for the speech which he had just delivered. He (Mr. Healy) could not imagine any hon. Member voting against the Amendment before the House, for the two propositions it contained were incontestable. It could not be denied that it was the opinion of large numbers of the Irish people that the Maamtrasna prisoners were innocent, and it could not be denied that the confidence of the Irish people in the administration of justice would be strengthened if the inquiry were made. In asking for it, the Irish Members founded themselves upon the promise made solemnly to them by the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington), that if the Archbishop of Tuam would come forward and make a statement, an inquiry would be granted. He (Mr. Healy) asked the noble Marquess, as a gentleman and as a man of honour, whether that promise had been kept? Could he lay his hand upon his heart and say that an inquiry by Messrs. George Bolton and Newton Brady into the acts of Messrs. Brady and Bolton was a fulfilment of that promise? Bolton and Brady were the very gentlemen whose conduct of the case was impeached by the Irish Members, and Earl Spencer interpreted the pledge for an inquiry by announcing that, after some secret colloquy, Bolton himself and Brady found themselves not guilty. If this were a matter of English concern, and the promise had been in regard to some conduct of Lord Wolseley in the Soudan, and a full inquiry were promised, would the noble Marquess be satisfied to know that Lord Wolseley had inquired into his own deeds, and found himself not guilty? The case had all along been "instructed" by Mr. Brady, and it was with great regret that he (Mr. Healy) impeached any statement of that gentleman. He had the honour of knowing his father, the Inspector of Fisheries, and no better official existed, and he much regretted having to impeach the conduct of his father's son. Upon him, however, heavily lay responsibility. What experience had he when, as Resident Magistrate, he began to investigate the circumstances of the murder? The crime was committed on the 17th August, 1882, and Mr. Brady was gazetted on the 1st of that very month. A magistrate of 17 days' experience, not knowing a word of the Irish language, was sent down from his desk in the Castle to a district where every man was an Irish-speaking person, and where Mr. Brady had no possible knowledge of the modes of thought or habits

miles away. The House should remember that all Joyce had said had been before three juries. It had been made the subject of examination and cross-examination, and had been dealt with in the Judge's charge. As to the motive which prompted the murder, it had been suggested that the old woman had given information with respect to the murder of the two Huddys which took place some time before, and whose bodies had been thrown into Lough Mask. But the hon. Member for Westmeath, in the letters he had written, had given an ample motive. The hon. Member had said that Patrick Joyce was the head of a Ribbon Society of the district, that John Joyce had been the treasurer of that society, and that the Joyces had given information. Everyone knew that if a member of a Ribbon Society gave information he might be murdered for so doing. It was obvious, however, that some strong motive must have induced the men to murder the old woman. When the evidence of the three Joyces was impeached, the House should consider what was said by the Judge in summing up. The Judge declared that the witnesses gave their testimony in a most satisfactory and trustworthy manner. He wished to point out that on the 23rd of August, 1882, in The Freeman's Journal, the very newspaper in which the letters of the hon. Member for Westmeath appeared, there was given a description of the witnesses at the inquest and of the alleged murderers, and it was stated that the people of the locality described the 10 men who had been arrested as the biggest devils in the district, who had long been the terror of the neighbourhood, and they shook hands with the witnesses and blessed them, and expressed their rejoicing that this murderous gang had at last been run to earth. Public opinion was expressed at the conclusion of the three trials; he referred to the 2nd of November, 1882. At the conclusion of these trials on the 2nd of November, 1882, the same organ of public opinion said that the jury had done their duty, that they had been fairly selected, that it had been shown that Irishmen would not shrink from their duty when a case was proven, that the verdicts would be supported by the feeling of the country, that there was no justification for the charge of jury-packing to obtain a conviction, that the restoration of the Catholics of Ireland

to the jury-box had been vindicated, that they had retrieved the character of Irish juries, whose verdicts would cease to be received with dissatisfaction and murmurs of distrust, that there was a unanimous feeling that justice had been done in the right and Constitutional way, and that it was a satisfaction to the journal to have been an humble agent in achieving this great end. Such was contemporaneous public opinion as expressed in that newspaper when the verdicts were given. In United Ireland, which was a journal of still more extreme opinions, exactly the same commendations were expressed; it was said that the duty of the jury had been honestly and fairly done, and that in future the verdicts of juries would perhaps be rather more scrupulously respected. [Mr. O'BRIEN: At what stage were these remarks made?] They followed the sentence of Myles Joyce, they were made on the 25th of November, 1882, and they were followed by the declaration—

With respect to what had been said about the plea of guilty, he would ask whether it had ever been known in the experience of a criminal lawyer that a man charged with murder had said he was guilty when he was not? Indeed, it seemed to pass the limits of human imagination that it should be so. It was part of the case of hon. Members that not only Myles Joyce was innocent, but that the four men who pleaded guilty were also innocent. The first trial lasted three days, the second three days, the third two days, and two witnesses whose expenses had been paid by the Crown were present for the purpose of proving an alibi. Mr. Malley, counsel for the defence, appealed to the counsel to the Crown to know whether, if the four pleaded guilty, the capital sentence would be remitted; he was informed that no such hope could be held out. Mr. Malley would not take upon himself to recommend the withdrawal of the plea of not guilty by the five prisoners until they had seen their priest, and when they had seen him he advised them to plead guilty.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, that he was stating it on the information of the counsel who was prosecuting. The counsel was told who was their priest; and he (the Rev. Mr. M'Hugh) came up, and having seen them he advised them to plead guilty. It was said that they had refused to do so when the Crown Solicitor asked them; but because they did so on the advice of the priest, we were asked to believe in their innocence. Was it to be said that the rev. gentleman, believing in their innocence, advised them to plead guilty, and yet never uttered a word in explanation to those who held in their hands the issues of life and death? He could not believe it. On the withdrawal of the plea of not guilty, Mr. Malley made an appeal to the Attorney General to be satisfied with the condemnation of the three most prominent of the culprits; and the Attorney General said that he could do nothing. In their subsequent memorial they said they did not enter the house and had no active participation in the crime; and upon that view of the matter the sentence was commuted. It was said there was evidence that could have been given that the men who committed the murder had their faces blackened and were unrecognizable; but when Michael Joyce made the statement on the 18th of August, he was dying; he had two revolver bullets in him which could not be extracted; he was unconscious and raving. True, he said—"Two or three men came in; they had their faces blackened." But to anyone representing the Crown that could not appear to be of the smallest moment. There was ample time for them to have blackened their faces after they left Michael Casey's house. But even if their faces were not blackened, there was nothing more likely than that, in the limited space of the cottage, to the boys awakened by the dying screams of their father and their mother, in the flickering gleams of bog oak torches, the faces of the murderers might well appear to have been blackened. Michael Joyce further said that he was asleep at the time, and he heard a dog bark; that the men said something to his father, and that he had been at mass the day before at Frinney. [Mr. HEALY: It was a Catholic holiday.] No; it was not a Catholic holiday. It was the 17th of August, and it had been ascertained that there was no mass there the day before. Then the boy went on to say that he had been sworn on a book not to say anything. It was obvious that it was impossible to attach much value to the evidence of this boy in these circumstances, and when he was passing away from life. So much for Michael Joyce. Then there was the evidence of Patrick Joyce, who recovered. He was a boy about nine, and he made a declaration on the 18th of August, in which he said that these men "had soot on their faces; they had a kippeen each; they lighted them in the house; I got three strokes; they had no coats on and wore bonneens." Anybody who knew the dress the Irish peasants wore in the West, he ventured to say, instead of saying that they were perfectly white, would believe that they were more nearly black. Thus his evidence was wholly inconsistent with that of Anthony Joyce. The point insisted on was that the prisoners' counsel did not know that a statement had been made that the faces of the men were black. The whole of the parties concerned in the trials were charged with having got up a murderous concoction to encompass the death of the prisoners. All he could say was that the depositions at the inquest which proved these statements of the boys as to the black faces were in the hands of the advisers of the prisoners, and they could have asked any question that they wished on cross-examination. It was not the duty of the counsel for the Crown to bring the matter forward. It was suggested that these depositions were kept back; but the fact was that they were published in the public Press and in The Freeman's Journal long before the trials, and the information was thus scattered far and wide. The Judge knew of them, as he had the brief of the Crown counsel before him. Then there was the question of the composition of the jury. Now, there was no challenge of the jury, which was about equally composed of Protestants and Catholics. With regard to the brief which was stolen, it was said that there was the letter "C" marked in it to indicate the word Catholic. Well, the newspapers had called attention to the fact that the number of Catholics and Protestants serving on the jury were equal. The letter "C," however, did not signify the word Catholic, but "challenged." What the word "sturdy" meant he did not know, but believed that whoever stole the brief was quite capable of writing it. With regard to the boy, Patrick Joyce, the Crown had put him forward but did not examine him, and I am informed the counsel for the prisoners extracted that the boy did not understand the nature of an oath. The hon. Member for Westmeath had stated that the convicted men had written letters declaring their innocence. He would like to know whether it was very likely that any person would declare anything else in a letter which passed under the eyes of the officials of the gaol? The Crown had, he contended, only vindicated the law in the course which they had taken. With regard to the statements of Casey and Philbin, it might be that they gave false evidence, and it might be that their statement was false that Myles Joyce entered the house. Well, if he was there with the gang, he was as guilty in the eyes of the law as any of them. [Mr. KENNY: He was not there.] Myles Joyce was not in the house, but was there; that was the explanation which had been put upon the case by three juries. When an inquiry was made for compensation to the families of the murdered persons, the two approvers came forward and repeated the same story, although the proceedings were not conducted by the Crown. He would tell the House something more about Thomas Casey. His statement on the 28th of July last was that Myles Joyce was present at the scene of the murder, but did not go into the house. And on the 10th of August he said he had sworn falsely against Myles Joyce and five other innocent men, and that he suppressed the names of the real murderers because he had been paid money to do so by the son of one of the murderers. It was upon the unsworn statement of such a man that the House was asked to subvert everything which had been done by three juries and an upright Judge, and that John Casey, senior, and his son were asked to be prosecuted. Thomas Casey, no doubt, wanted to rehabilitate himself in the eyes of the lawless people in his district. It was said Thomas Casey was induced to make his original statements by the Crown Solicitor, that Philbin and he were put into the prison yard together, and that he made that statement under protest. The first communication which passed between Mr. Bolton and Casey was a message sent by Casey to Mr. Bolton on November 11th, saying—"I have a little important statement to make to yer honor." The suggestion now put forward by Casey was that Bolton wrote down the statement which he desired him to make. That turned out to be utterly false. The statement was made in the presence of Mr. Bolton, Mr. Brady, the Resident Magistrate, and the prison Governor, and it was written by Mr. Brady with his own hand, and was still in existence to show that Mr. Bolton had not written any of it. This Amendment was supported by an appeal to the unsworn testimony of an admitted murderer and perjurer. It was a deliberate attempt to discredit the administration of all law in Ireland, and to make uncertain the verdicts of juries in Ireland.

MR. CALLAN rose to Order. He desired to know whether it was in Order for an official of the Crown to charge a Member of that House with a deliberate attempt to pervert the course of justice?

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. and learned Gentleman alludes to any Member of this House when he says there has been a deliberate attempt to pervert justice, he is not in Order in doing so.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, if his words implied such a meaning, he would withdraw. What he desired to convey was that the effect of this Motion would be to discredit the administration of law, and to make jury trials, which were the safeguard of law and order, uncertain. It would have the effect of making the evidence of informers impossible in a Court of Law, which would be a very convenient thing for those engaged in dark conspiracies. But it was well that the conspirators should know that there were amongst them those whom they could not trust, no matter how solemn the oath they took might be. He hoped the House would negative the Amendment.

MR. GORST said, the question which had been raised by the Amendment was one of great gravity and importance, and he thought it deserved to be treated in a very much calmer and more judicial spirit than had been shown by the hon.

and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland. He did not apologize for taking part in the discussion, because they all were interested in justice being administered in such a manner that the people would have confidence in its administration. In the present case, there were two perfectly distinct questions. One was, whether there had been any miscarriage of justice? And the other was, if there had been any, whether that miscarriage of justice was due to any misconduct on the part of the officials who represented the Crown in Ireland? If it were important that the administration of justice in Great Britain should be free from suspicion, it was ten-fold more important that it should be free from suspicion in Ireland, because Parliament had thought fit to clothe the Executive Government in Ireland with extraordinary powers, and the only check of those powers was the careful and scrupulous administration of justice. Some years ago, he drew the attention of the House to the way in which crime in Ireland appeared to escape punishment, and to the way in which juries refused to return verdicts of guilty, even on the most conclusive evidence; but he should have been extremely sorry if he had supposed it could have been imagined for a moment that he advocated the establishment of tribunals which would exercise anything else than the most perfect and complete justice. When a case of this kind was brought under the consideration of the House of Commons, it was not, in his opinion, seemly that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, as representing the Government, should get up and make a strong partizan speech, ignoring the real difficulties of the case, and, in fact, to tell the House that there was nothing whatever in it—that it was a mere attempt on the part of certain Members to cast discredit upon the administration of the law; and, indeed, that any person who regarded this as a grave matter, deserving earnest attention on the part of the Government, must be either a fool, or in league with disloyal persons. He (Mr. Gorst) could not help thinking that if the prosecution of criminals in Ireland was conducted in the same spirit as the case of the Government had been defended that night by the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland, he was not at all astonished that the people of Ireland should have little confidence in the administration of justice. He (Mr. Gorst) had had some experience in Crown prosecutions. He was, while the late Government held Office, repeatedly in Crown prosecutions with the late Sir John Holker, who was distinguished for his fairness and impartiality in conducting prosecutions, as also for his ability and knowledge of law. He had not the slightest doubt but that the hon. and learned Gentleman the present Attorney General (Sir Henry James) would take most scrupulous care that every single fact of importance in a case, whether it went for or against the guilt of the prisoner, should be fully and fairly submitted to the jury. He (Mr. Gorst) did not know whether that was done in these Maamtrasna trials; but, certainly, it was not done if the speech of the prosecuting counsel was anything like the speech they had heard that night. He certainly never before heard a more reckless assertion than the one that had just been made by the hon. and learned Gentleman. The hon. and learned Gentleman had been careful to impress upon the House that the identification of the accused men was easy, inasmuch as the night was bright and starlight. He (Mr. Gorst), however, had always understood that a night could not be starlight unless it was somewhat dark. The hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) had asserted that the evidence of Anthony and his brother John and his nephew was uncorroborated, except by his niece Mary, and that Mary had not given her testimony until some time after her uncle had been examined. The hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland had met that assertion by a declaration that Mary's deposition had been taken on the same day as that of her uncle. In these circumstances, he had asked for the loan of the stolen Crown brief. He did not know how that document had been come by, but there it was, as clearly a genuine one as the redistribution scheme published by The Standard the other day; and on looking at that brief, he found that whereas the deposition of Anthony was taken on August 20, that of Mary was not taken until August 28.

[Second Night.]

MR. HEALY: No, no; you said the same day.

MR. GORST: The hon. and learned Gentleman certainly made that statement.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): I said the statements were made on the same day. Their depositions were made on different days.

MR. GORST said, he had a distinct recollection of what the hon. and learned Gentleman had said on this point; and beyond that, there was no evidence with regard to their statements, but there was as regarded their depositions. The hon. and learned Gentleman had also asked the House to believe in the testimony of these witnesses, because their demeanour in giving their evidence had been so satisfactory; but their evidence had been given in the Irish language, and it was impossible that anyone who did not understand that language could judge of their demeanour. He should be sorry to ask the House to pronounce judgment as to the guilt or the innocence of these men, but certainly the hon. and learned Gentleman was guilty of exaggeration and would not carry the House with him when he declared that there was no doubt or difficulty in the case. For his part, he (Mr. Gorst) did not think that anybody could be quite comfortable in his mind with regard to the question whether the right men had been convicted and executed. The whole story that had been told by Anthony and John Joyce of the way in which they had identified these men was a most improbable one, inasmuch as they had given no explanation of their conduct in being out at so late an hour, and of following this gang of murderers to the house where the murder was committed, and in their running away. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland had said that there was no motive on their part for giving false evidence; but, on the other hand, there was no motive for the accused persons committing the murder. It might, however, be suggested that a substantial motive existed in the minds of Anthony and John, to induce them to give false testimony, in the very large reward that was given in Ireland to those who gave evidence which secured the conviction of any person charged with murder. He was rather surprised that the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland should rely so much upon newspaper criticism, because he did not know that the remarks which appeared in the newspapers were very much calculated to assist the House in arriving at a conclusion with regard to the matter. He must remark, however, that the eulogies which had appeared in the newspapers, and which had been read, were confined entirely to the conduct of the jury. No one was inclined to find fault with the conduct of the jury, for the evidence laid before them was such as ought to induce them to convict in any case. The hon. and learned Gentleman had dwelt with great force upon the absence of motive evinced for the fact that these five men had pleaded guilty, and no doubt at first sight that did appear to be a very remarkable fact if they were innocent; but with regard to it an important question was this—Had there been any hope held out to these men on the part of the Crown, or by anyone representing it, that if they pleaded guilty, their lives would be spared?—because, if so, that would afford an intelligible explanation of their conduct. It must be recollected that three men had already been tried and convicted upon exactly the same evidence as that which these five men knew would be given against them, and therefore they must have had little hope of escaping conviction, in which case they would have been sentenced to death and hanged, and, therefore, they would naturally have snatched at any hope that might be held out to them by the Crown officials that if they pleaded guilty they would save their necks from the rope. Therefore, what they did was perfectly intelligible. But there was a piece of very striking evidence which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland had entirely and absolutely slurred over. It appeared that they had been induced to plead guilty by the persuasion of their parish priest—at least, that was the effect of the evidence of a religious and respectable man; but what he said, and what the hon. and learned Gentleman had made no allusion whatever to, was very vital. The reverend gentleman said that, at the time, he was by no means sure of the innocence of these men; but that he was inclined to believe that they were so from their declarations. He further said that he had urged them to plead guilty, because

if they really were guilty their plea of guilty would do them no harm, and it would save their necks—how he obtained that information, except through the Crown officials, he (Mr. Gorst) could not conceive—while if they were innocent, he felt that eventually the truth would leak out, and that a huge wrong could not continue for ever, and that he saw a chance of the men being at length returned to their homes and their families without a stain on their characters. The reverend gentleman further declared that, in advising the men to plead guilty, he had not been influenced by a belief in their guilt; but that, on the contrary, he had rather believed them to be innocent. Now, the House would note how carefully the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland ignored all that. He came now to what he regarded as the kernel of the matter—the most preposterous and absurd argument that had been put forward by the hon. and learned Gentleman. He (Mr. Gorst) had been so much struck by the extremely partizan speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman, that, while the hon. and learned Gentleman was addressing the House, he had remarked to an hon. Friend near him that he should not be surprised if the hon. and learned Gentleman did not say black was white before he sat down, and the hon. and learned Gentleman had literally done so. The evidence on which these men were convicted was that the murderers had white faces and black clothes. But the two poor “boys,” on the day after the murder, the first opportunity after they had been struck down, and without the slightest chance of collusion between them, had stated that the men who had attacked them wore white coats, and that they had their faces blackened, and therefore they were unable to recognize them. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that the fact was that the men had white faces and black coats, and that in their delirium the lads had mistaken the white faces for white coats and the black coats for black faces. Now he (Mr. Gorst), on this point, must say that he considered the conduct of the Crown officials and the Crown Prosecutor, in keeping back the fact that the men’s faces were blackened, was absolutely indefensible, and such as he was quite sure would never have been committed by the hon. and learned Attorney General for England, whom he saw opposite, nor by any of his Predecessors. The action of this case turned upon the question of identification on this “bright starry night.” If there was one fact in the case more clear than another, it was that these men had blackened faces—in fact, it was in the Crown brief, and was there to be seen now. The morning after the murder, the people who came to the house found one boy of 17 years dying, and a little boy of 10 years also apparently dying, but who had since recovered. As he had said both these lads mentioned, and there could have been no collusion between them, that the men who had entered the house, and who had committed the crime, had their faces blackened, and that they could not recognize them; but the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland, indeed, would have them believe that the deposition of Michael Joyce was that of a raving maniac; but he found in that Crown brief, and he supposed it was a fact, that the deposition of this “raving maniac” was taken by one Mr. Brady, Resident Magistrate, and he supposed that Resident Magistrates knew their duties better than to take the declarations of raving maniacs; but it was not only that—the fact of the blackened faces was set forth in a further deposition, and was a prominent feature of the case, and when the guilt of the prisoners depended on the evidence of Anthony Joyce and his accomplices, and when the credibility of the witnesses rested on their power of identification on that starlight night, the fact that the faces were blackened was of most vital importance, and one which should not have been withheld from the cognizance of the jury. He challenged the hon. and learned Attorney General for England to say whether he did not consider that that fact ought to have been communicated to the jury by the Crown counsel; and whether, if such a case occurred in England, the hon. and learned Gentleman would not have taken the most scrupulous care that this important fact should be solemnly brought to the knowledge of the jury? Well, again, he noticed on the second day of the trial a most remarkable thing. In the report of the proceedings which he held in his hand, it appeared that John Collins, who was first in the house after the murder, deposed to finding

[Second Night.]

Michael Joyce still alive. That was on the morning of the 18th, and upon the witness making that statement, one of the jurors—a Mr. Pim—who appeared to be a most sagacious and intelligent man, inquired whether Michael Joyce had made any statement to him when he entered. The Judge, however (Mr. Justice Barry), interposing, said—“That question need not be answered. We have had already a statement of the doctors that Michael was raving, and unable to make any statement.” Now, if Mr. Pim, instead of thus being interfered with, and cut short by the Judge, had been informed that Michael Joyce had made a statement to John Collins and to a police constable, and a dying declaration before a Resident Magistrate, in all of which he had given the blackened state of the men’s faces as the reason why he could not identify them, he (Mr. Gorst) did not know but that that might have altered the verdict of the jury. He hoped the hon. and learned Attorney General for England (Sir Henry James) had read the evidence as he (Mr. Gorst) had done. He had done so very carefully, and he found that the case, apart from the informers who had recanted, rested on the evidence of Anthony Joyce, and he asked himself this question—If Anthony Joyce and his party could, on a starlight night, identify all these men, with their faces blackened, at a distance of 40 or 50 yards—[Mr. HARRINGTON: 150 yards]—well, it would serve his purpose—he asked himself how it was that, if they could that night identify anyone at that distance, Michael Joyce, awakened in the middle of the night with the light of torches around him, could have failed to identify the murderers, even if they were strangers? [Mr. HARRINGTON: They were cousins.] He (Mr. Gorst) had never been awakened in the night to see a murderous face; but if he were, he thought he would recollect that face to the end of his days. To him it seemed incredible almost that the Crown Prosecutor could have held back so much; and he could not think that even the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland could rest satisfied with a verdict so open to doubt as that. But he had just forgotten one further instance of the recklessness of the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland.

It was asked—Why did not these men, when terrified, go to the barracks? “Oh,” said the Solicitor General for Ireland, “the barracks was five miles off;” and he (Mr. Gorst) thought no more of it, believing, of course, that the hon. and learned Gentleman would not say that if he did not know it was a fact. But the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had just informed him (Mr. Gorst) that he had measured the distance on the Ordnance map in the Library, and found it was under one mile. All he could say was, that if prosecutions in Ireland were conducted as this case would have one to suppose they sometimes were, and as the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland would tend to prove, then he was not in the least surprised that there was sometimes discontent amongst the Irish Members and people, and miscarriages of justice. The facts were that three men were found guilty and hanged, the third of whom died solemnly protesting his innocence to the last. The other two men made depositions, which the Government would not produce, admitting their own guilt, but denying the guilt of the unhappy man who suffered with them. Five other men were sentenced to penal servitude, of whom four asserted their innocence, and the fifth, according to an hon. Member, had said that he was guilty. An informer, upon whose evidence these men were convicted, came forward to say that he had told a tissue of falsehoods. The other informer, he (Mr. Gorst) believed, had made a similar statement. The whole case, in fact, upon which the Crown hanged Myles Joyce had crumbled away, with the sole exception of the statement of Anthony Joyce and his party, evidence which was open to the very gravest doubt. Could the Government be sure, in such a case, that there had been no miscarriage of justice? And would they not at least undertake that there should be a searching inquiry made on the spot, such as was made in Kilmartin’s case, which had been attended with the best results, and that the witnesses should all be examined? They were not dealing with unknown persons. He thought the dying depositions of these executed men might very properly be produced. Now, there was a second allegation made on the responsibility of the Archbishop of Tuam—namely, that there was misconduct on the part of the Crown officials, regarding which it was said there had been an inquiry. It was true that the Government had made an inquiry of some kind or other; but who had been the investigators? Why, the inculpated officials themselves. He did not hesitate to declare such an inquiry as that a complete farce. If ever there were a case in which the Executive Government of Ireland should have welcomed some independent inquiry, it would be a case of this sort. He (Mr. Gorst) could understand them refusing any inquiry at all; but, if they conceded any kind of a trial, he should have thought that, for their own sakes, they would have got hold of the most independent person they could lay hands on—an English Judge, for instance, such as Lord Bramwell—and would have invited him to inquire whether the administration of justice had been in accordance with the maxims and principles happily prevalent in the Kingdom of England. If Lord Bramwell had looked into the matter, and had acquitted the authorities, the Government would have had a triumphant justification before the whole of the United Kingdom; but for the Lord Lieutenant to write to the Archbishop and say that he sent him a Memorandum in which he entirely concurred, and when this Memorandum had obviously been drawn up by the inculpated officials, such an inquiry was a perfect farce. The inquiry which had been held was unsatisfactory and unreliable, and therefore he (Mr. Gorst) did earnestly impress upon the Government the paramount importance of placing the administration of justice in Ireland above all suspicion, and of selecting someone of the position, and with the authority, which Lord Bramwell possessed to inquire into the case. If that was done, he thought everybody would be willing to abide by the result of such an appointment.

MR. HEALY said, he was sure that he spoke the sentiments of his Colleagues when he said that Ireland owed a deep debt of gratitude to the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) for the speech which he had just delivered. He (Mr. Healy) could not imagine any hon. Member voting against the Amendment before the House, for the two propositions it contained were incontestable. It could not be denied that it was the opinion of large numbers of the Irish people that the Maamtrasna prisoners were innocent, and it could not be denied that the confidence of the Irish people in the administration of justice would be strengthened if the inquiry were made. In asking for it, the Irish Members founded themselves upon the promise made solemnly to them by the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington), that if the Archbishop of Tuam would come forward and make a statement, an inquiry would be granted. He (Mr. Healy) asked the noble Marquess, as a gentleman and as a man of honour, whether that promise had been kept? Could he lay his hand upon his heart and say that an inquiry by Messrs. George Bolton and Newton Brady into the acts of Messrs. Brady and Bolton was a fulfilment of that promise? Bolton and Brady were the very gentlemen whose conduct of the case was impeached by the Irish Members, and Earl Spencer interpreted the pledge for an inquiry by announcing that, after some secret colloquy, Bolton himself and Brady found themselves not guilty. If this were a matter of English concern, and the promise had been in regard to some conduct of Lord Wolseley in the Soudan, and a full inquiry were promised, would the noble Marquess be satisfied to know that Lord Wolseley had inquired into his own deeds, and found himself not guilty? The case had all along been "instructed" by Mr. Brady, and it was with great regret that he (Mr. Healy) impeached any statement of that gentleman. He had the honour of knowing his father, the Inspector of Fisheries, and no better official existed, and he much regretted having to impeach the conduct of his father's son. Upon him, however, heavily lay responsibility. What experience had he when, as Resident Magistrate, he began to investigate the circumstances of the murder? The crime was committed on the 17th August, 1882, and Mr. Brady was gazetted on the 1st of that very month. A magistrate of 17 days' experience, not knowing a word of the Irish language, was sent down from his desk in the Castle to a district where every man was an Irish-speaking person, and where Mr. Brady had no possible knowledge of the modes of thought or habits

of life of the people. It was curious that Irish Sub-Inspectors and other Constabulary officials were required to know French and German; but though their duties must bring them in constant contact with Gaelic-speaking persons, it was not held necessary that they should know one word of their own tongue—the Irish language. One of the chief points in the case rested upon the dying declarations of Patrick Joyce and Casey, who were hanged with Myles Joyce. These were given in Irish in Galway Gaol before the execution. They were volunteered on different days by two men locked into separate cells, who, being kept apart, could have had no knowledge of each other's intentions. They were taken in Irish and written down by Brady, through an interpreter. The Lord Lieutenant stated that though they tried to exculpate Myles Joyce, they were still consistent with his presence at the murder, although striking no blow. If what these men wished to express were not made clear, what a load of responsibility lay upon the head of Mr. Brady. But if there were anything in the depositions which left any doubt upon the case, why could not the Lord Lieutenant telegraph to Mr. Brady and ask him, so that the doubt might be cleared up. Lord Spencer, in his reply to the Archbishop of Tuam, said that he gave the depositions the most anxious consideration; but he also said that they were compatible with the fact of Myles Joyce having a guilty knowledge of the intended murders. Remembering that Lord Spencer did not adopt the course he had referred to, that he did not ask Mr. Brady to clear up any cloudiness in the dying depositions by putting the direct question to the real murderers, "Was Myles Joyce with you or not on the occasion of the massacre?" he looked upon the Viceroy's reply to the Archbishop as one of the meanest, most paltry, and most contemptible things that a Lord Lieutenant had ever been guilty of. He could not conceive a Nobleman occupying the position of Governor of the Irish people, who certainly had no want of keenness, putting forward such a statement, and hoping that it might obtain credence. It was said that these depositions did not say that Myles Joyce had no part in the murder. But why was not an endeavour made to extract from the condemned men exactly what they meant to say? Why did not Mr. Brady put the question, "Was Myles Joyce there at all, or was he not?" For any defect in the depositions, Mr. Brady, who took them, was, in the first instance, responsible; and Lord Spencer, in the next place, seeing that he kept the Galway telegraph office open all night before the execution, could not be held guiltless for not asking his Resident Magistrate to extract from the murderers the exact meaning they wished to convey. If the Government were so very clear about the case, and that no injustice had been committed respecting it, what was their objection to granting an inquiry? Why not heap coals of fire upon the heads of the Irish Members, and bury them in the iniquity of having trumped up these charges? Why not take the revenge that they (the Government) must be so anxious to have upon them, by proving by means of this inquiry that he and his hon. Friends were in league with murderers and assassins? They gave the Government this alternative. Either they had a good case, or they had a bad one. If they had a good case, why not grant an inquiry? Since they would not grant an inquiry, what was the inference? And what had the Irish Members been accused of? They had been accused by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland of bringing forward this case to discredit the ends of justice. They were accused of discrediting the ends of justice, by demanding an inquiry which, if it failed, could only recoil upon their own heads. And they demanded an inquiry, with the full knowledge that on the only occasion on which an inquiry of this description had been granted—that conducted two months ago into the conviction of Bryan Kilmartin—that inquiry did discredit the administration of justice, and did not discredit the men who brought forward the allegations that Kilmartin was innocent. But great good the inquiry would have done Bryan Kilmartin, if the shot that was fired by the other man had taken effect. He would have been hanged; and, nevertheless, if a dying declaration, such as was made by Ganly in that case, had been brought to their knowledge, the Irish Members would have been bound in that House to have urged for an inquiry. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland began his statement that night by taunting them with the fact that they brought forward this demand for an inquiry two years and two months after the trial. It was absurd, and he thought a little unjustifiable, to say that, when, as a matter of fact, if the hon. and learned Gentleman had been longer an official in the House, he must have known that the moment after Parliament met in 1883, they challenged in that House the conviction and execution of this man, Myles Joyce. The question was—What explanation was there now for refusing to lay upon the Table the depositions of these two executed men, Patrick Joyce and Casey? The Prime Minister, giving, of course, the reply that was provided and prepared for him by the Irish Government, said, to-day, that it was not usual to give statements made by persons under sentence of death. He was surprised that the Prime Minister, with his varied and vast knowledge, should have pledged himself to such a flimsy statement as that. Was the right hon. Gentleman not aware that in the Butterknowle murder, in the county of Durham, not three months ago, the Secretary of State for the Home Department released, unconditionally, one of the men convicted (Siddle), and that the man who was hanged for the crime (Lowson) declared that this man who was convicted with him was not guilty, and that this dying man's declaration was published to the whole world? They had also the case of the assassin, Peace, whose dying declaration exculpating the convicted man, Habron, for the murder of the policeman, Cox, at Manchester, was published to the whole world. Then they had the case of Francey Hynes, where all the Papers, in 1852, were laid upon the Table of the House. The Prime Minister said it was not usual, and was contrary to Departmental practice, to publish condemned men's depositions. He (Mr. Healy) said, that if it was not usual to give statements made by persons under sentence of death, it ought to be usual. What did the Irish Members care about the Government Departments? What they wanted was to have wrongfully-convicted men liberated, and sent back to their wives and children; and it was no answer to tell them that it was not the practice to publish declarations of that kind. These depositions existed; they declared the innocence of Myles Joyce and of the other four still imprisoned men, and he (Mr. Healy) said that, if they had to wring them out of the Government, they would have these depositions. He, in common with the other Irish Members in that House, was independent of both the Whig and Tory Party. The Whig and the Tory Party had their exigencies, and they (the Irish Members) had before now wrung concessions out of the exigencies of British Governments. Therefore, when the Government came into a crisis later on, such speeches as that made by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite that night would not be calculated to help them over the stile. He told the hon. and learned Gentleman that they would yet have these depositions, although they were refused two years ago by Lord Spencer; and even if every man of them was to be consigned for months to the plank bed, they would make the whole country ring with the charge of murder against Dublin Castle. The noble Marquess opposite had promised an inquiry into this matter, and he (Mr. Healy) now declared that the Irish Members should take notice of that breach of faith in some marked manner. He further denied that the three independent witnesses were of the unimpeachable character represented. They were the scamps of the neighbourhood, and one of them, he believed, was himself in the murder conspiracy, and thus was able to hit on some of the right men. Others were then dragged in to gratify private revenge, and he would point out that, although the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland was technically correct in saying that no reward had been offered, the Joyces pocketed £1,500 blood-money. They were also told that these men were identified passing along the road. It was well known that the only thing in the shape of a road in the district was a stream that was dry at the time this murder was committed, and which a party on such an errand would have avoided as the only highway likely to be frequented up the mountain. He had expected a much more clear statement on that point; but, beyond the fact that he had visited the place, the Solicitor General for Ireland was careful not to draw upon his personal experience on that matter. It was, however, a well-known fact, which he (Mr. Healy) could substantiate, having been at the scene of the murder, which he had visited out of curiosity, as he happened to be in the neighbourhood, and he maintained that it would be quite impossible for a person standing at the angle of the house, where these men stated they identified the prisoners, to see the road at all, or any person on it. Then they had the extraordinary fact that the identifying parties placed themselves some yards further on towards John Joyce's house when the murderers rendezvoused at Casey's. How did they know that they were going to John Joyce's house, and why should they have placed themselves above instead of below Casey's house, nearer instead of farther from the scene of the murder, as if they knew the subsequent destination of the party plotting inside? In addition to that, they had the personally conducted tour of the Solicitor General for Ireland, which that hon. and learned Gentleman appeared to have undertaken to the district. But he did not give them any explanation of one extraordinary fact, that the three independent witnesses said they identified these men from behind the house, and the approver Philbin said he placed himself in the exact spot where the three independent witnesses must have been lying in wait. All that the hon. and learned Gentleman did was to favour the House with a flimsy statement, omitting all reference to the points that were made in favour of the prisoners by the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington), and giving a rehash of the case for the prosecution at the trial of these unhappy men. The Government, relying on the Caucus, were sure of the votes of their supporters, and were, therefore, quite satisfied, no matter what was said; and English Members not unnaturally said they could not understand this fearful mixture of Joyces and Caseys. The Irish Members would be satisfied with a Select Committee to inquire into the case, and even if the majority on the Committee were their most determined opponents, they were content to stand or fall by the verdict of that Committee. But they would not be satisfied with Lord Spencer's summary mode of disposing of the case, by asking Bolton and Brady, "Are you guilty or not guilty?" and then complacently recording their acquittal of themselves. This was not an agrarian murder, so far as they knew, and why was the venue changed? No man was justified in advising the Crown to change the venue to the City of Dublin. It was simply criminal for the Crown to drag those unfortunate men, who did not understand a single word of the proceedings, 200 miles away from their own district, away from any help from their witnesses, and put them on their trial before a special jury in Dublin. It was one thing to pay for the defence, and another thing to consult the convenience of the accused. The accused applied for a postponement, in order that they might have the opportunity of rebutting the evidence of the informers, but that postponement was refused; and although the brief for the Crown was printed—and it was the practice in Ireland to give to the accused copies of printed documents—yet in this case the Crown withheld the brief. The right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Trevelyan) had resigned, and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was not yet in existence; and the right hon. Gentleman did not take the trouble on the previous night to attend and hear the arguments of the hon. Member for Westmeath. Although the Lord Lieutenant was chiefly impugned, yet the late Chief Secretary for Ireland could not, by simply jumping into the post of Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, completely wash himself free of concern or responsibility in this matter. Myles Joyce and his ghost would haunt the right hon. Gentleman for many a long day. There ought to be some person in that House capable of dealing with the arguments of hon. Members in a proper manner; and he totally objected to hon. and learned Gentlemen like the Solicitor General for Ireland, who replied to statements by omitting to notice every strong point. They had it from him that the two wounded boys, in their dying declarations, were totally mistaken as to the colour of the clothes and the faces of the men who attempted to batter out their brains. A Solicitor General's £1,500 a-year enabled him to see at once that the boys were mistaken, and that the clothes of the men, although originally white, became in process of time considerably darker, and that their faces were, in reality, not black, but white, which was much the same colour!

When a statement was made by a dying boy, that he was murdered by a man with a black face and a white coat, it would take the nerve of an Irish Solicitor General to assert that the man had a white face and a black coat. But supposing the hypothesis of the hon. and learned Gentleman to be correct, why not let the jury know all about it? Myles Joyce, the alleged murderer, was a first cousin of these boys, and the others were near neighbours, familiar to them all their lives. Was it likely they would not have known them had the assassins been recognizable, as the "unimpeachable witnesses" swore? The Solicitor General for Ireland had made some strong remarks on the fact that his (Mr. Healy's) hon. Friend the Member for Westmeath had obtained possession of one of the Crown briefs, and he appeared to think that it was very dishonourable. But it was much more dishonourable for the Government to have withheld the facts from the jury. It was the business of the Irish Members to get hold of all such documents in the interests of good government. It was not half so dishonourable as when the Government were so unscrupulous as to steal their letters, as they had done for many years, and to open them as they passed through the Post Office. They could not take a peep at a Crown brief; but the Solicitor General for Ireland and the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland, who was that night in an an amphibious and ambiguous position, might spend a whole night in reading his letters, seized in the Post Office. Of course, he did not suppose the right hon. Gentleman did it himself. He had some deputy, or deputy's deputy, to do it for him, and unless the letters contained something of peculiar interest they would not be brought under his own personal notice. What objection was there to seeing the brief, if there was nothing to be ashamed in it? The hon. and learned Gentleman had stated that the brief was stolen, and he left it to be inferred that his hon. Friend had gone up to Mr. George Bolton some evening, and picked his pocket. The hon. and learned Gentleman might well regret the loss of the Crown brief, because, in his (Mr. Healy's) opinion, a more disgraceful document had never been brought to light. First, they were told all the depositions were given to the accused. Then the Solicitor General for Ireland said it was all the depositions at the inquest; and then, being pressed further, he said the deposition of one of the boys was not given, because he was raving; but he omitted to state anything whatever about the deposition of the boy who was not raving. How careful they were not to embarrass the defence by not confusing them with a raving deposition! But this pleasant explanation did not hold good in the second boy's case, who was admittedly clothed in his right mind, and was now alive and well. Would the late Chief Secretary for Ireland give an explanation of that, or would he adopt his old plan of omitting to notice any strong point? The right hon. Gentleman would, no doubt, give them his Swan song that night. If so, would he do them the parting favour, so as to show them there was no ill-feeling, to take a note of that little point and explain why the deposition of Patrick Joyce was not given? The deposition contained the statement that the faces of the murderers were black, and that was a very important point. How would a boy nine years of age not know his own first cousin, who had lived within half-a-mile of him? Mr. George Bolton, with the astuteness which distinguished that wily man, who had stood the Government in such stead through many years in jury-packing and blood-spilling in Ireland, appended to the Crown brief in italics—"Patrick Joyce has recovered, but his evidence is worthless." Whether his evidence was worthless or not was a question for the jury. They did not complain of the jury. What they complained of was, that the jury had not got the evidence before them, and why were they not allowed to decide it? The Judge and the jury were blinded, befooled, and bewildered by the Crown officials in this matter. They impeached neither Judge nor jury—they impeached Mr. George Bolton, and Mr. Newton Brady, and Lord Spencer, and every other person connected with getting up the case; and they wished to know from the Government why the evidence of this boy, which was stated to be worthless, was not given to the jury? The Solicitor General for Ireland had come back from a few days' excursion to Maamtrasna, with the intelligence that Patrick Joyce did not understand his catechism. He might not have understood his catechism; but, at least, he might have known the difference between black and white. Patrick Joyce, it was said, did not know who God was, nor what would happen if he swore a lie. But he was for three months under the thumb of the Crown officials in Ireland; and if they wanted him to know his catechism, it would not have taken very long to have instructed him. They knew it took less than three months to metamorphose Patrick Delaney, the Phoenix Park assassin, from a murderer, perjurer, and highwayman, into a respectable man, fit to swear away the lives of innocent men. Then, in addition to the dying declarations of the two men, they had the confessions of the informers Casey and Philbin. He (Mr. Healy) joined with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) in saying that the statements of those men might be set down as worthless, unless they were corroborated. They were simply an element in the case. But what was the statement of the informer Casey? He (Mr. Healy) had himself questioned this man for about an hour, certainly in the most hostile manner. He took him over the entire case, and he had been perfectly unable to shake his testimony. How was his statement confirmed? He was a Roman Catholic, and, bad as he undoubtedly was, they must suppose him to be possessed of some relics of a conscience. Casey had gone to confession since the murder—although none of the other men had—and in the presence of an entire congregation the wretched man, believing as he did to the full in the consequences of what he was stating, made a declaration on this solemn occasion that his former statements were lies, and that he had been instrumental in hanging an innocent man. In examining this testimony, what did they find? That Casey had no knowledge of what the depositions were which were made to the Crown, and that he had no knowledge of the fact that the two boys had declared that the murderers had blackened faces. Yet, in this very first interview, he said that the men had their faces blackened and wore white flannel vests. The Government attempted to make out a case by alleging, on their own mere dictum, that everything the Irish Members said was false, and everything they said themselves was true; and they refused to grant any inquiry by which it might be determined which side was right. The dying depositions of the two men were another corroboration of the informer, and he asked why were not these depositions produced? The Irish Members said these corroborated Casey's confession, and they challenged the Government to deny it. His confession was also corroborated by the testimony of the men in gaol. They were confined in penal servitude, and did not know what was going on outside; and, moreover, they did not speak English. Yet these four men, in different gaols, continued to make protestations of innocence; and one, who was guilty, declared the innocence of the others, and admitted his own guilt. If the Government did not grant an inquiry, the public would draw the inference that, having hanged a man in the wrong, they were determined to brazen it out, even as far as the sacrifice of those other four men. Again, Philbin, the second informer, corroborated Casey's statement; and if those various pieces of testimony had gone to corroborate the statements of Casey, not when he was giving evidence of the innocence of those men, but when he was giving evidence before the jury, the Crown would have declared that they were entitled to every consideration. But, oh, the Government said—"We have the great fact, after all, that five of the men pleaded guilty." But the hon. and learned Member for Chatham had completely disposed of that argument. Why should those men not have pleaded guilty? The three men who were previously tried were found guilty by the jury—one of them after eight minutes' deliberation, another after 12, and another after six minutes' deliberation; and the jurors who were to be availed of heard the statement of the Judge that they had been convicted on the plainest testimony. There was, therefore, the best reason why those men, when they were promised their lives, should have pleaded guilty, because in doing that lay their only chance. The quotations which the Solicitor General for Ireland made from The Freeman's Journal and United Ireland were the best justification for the men pleading guilty; because they proved that the opinion in the minds of all reasonable men was that the story of the witnesses was absolutely true. While there was life there was hope, and the facts that had come to light since the trial justified the men in deciding to plead guilty. It was untrue to say that they pleaded guilty at once on the request of their counsel, for, as a matter of fact, Mr. Malley could not get them to plead guilty, and it was only done when the priest laid before them the fact that there was a universal concurrence of opinion of their guilt. Again, it was asserted that Casey and Philbin only came forward now because they were safe, and would attain popularity in the district. That, however, was an entire mistake; because, instead of their being safeguarded by their declarations, they were in greater danger of being murdered in consequence of their confession than they were before. Casey, the informer, had made a statement which implicated the "gombeen" man, the leader of the Ribbon faction, a man of the district, and had denounced him as the real murderer in that case. There was, then, far more risk to the life of Casey and of Philbin than there was previously at any time in their careers. It was almost disgusting that the Solicitor General for Ireland should make statements in that House which the moment Irish Members heard them they knew to be grossly untrue. Of course, the hon. and learned Gentleman did not know it himself. Learned gentlemen were brought over, at great inconvenience, from Green Street to fill him with the information. Earl Spencer, in his Memorandum, attempted to make out that Casey was not pressed by the Crown Solicitor, and that it was not until the Attorney General for Ireland had been consulted that his evidence was accepted. Well, he (Mr. Healy) would brand that statement of whoever had instructed the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite as a deliberate and palpable falsehood. It was a falsehood beyond all doubt. What proved it, was the fact that the late Attorney General for Ireland, who had been a respected Member of that House, but who was now Mr. Justice Johnson, made no allusion to it in his opening statement. In opening the prosecution he made no allusion to it; and was it to be supposed that if the learned Gentleman had information of it two days in advance, he would not have made a tremendous point of it? It was actually at the very moment he was making his opening statement that Thomas Casey was induced by George Bolton to come forward and implicate these innocent men. How did Earl Spencer deal with the case in this audacious Memorandum, than which a greater tissue of fraudulent and audacious statements had never been put forward by any official? Why did Mr. Justice Johnson, if the Lord Lieutenant's statement were true, from first to last make no allusion to the fact that Casey was to be one of the witnesses? They could, in this case, trace the slimy serpent trail of perjury and falsehood from first to last. There was the Crown brief of one of the Crown prosecutors, who might be at no great distance from where they were. They could easily, by the evidence of experts, decide whose was the writing on the Crown brief—"Suspect got him murdered," against "big" Casey's name. This man, who was suspected by the Crown to have got him murdered, was stated to be the head assassin of the district; and, in fact, the same statement was made by Casey the informer. How could the English Government expect to maintain peace and order when they had 4,000,000 of people in Ireland firmly convinced that the statement of Casey—murderer and perjurer that he had been—was perfectly true, and that Myles Joyce was innocent? Was that so light a matter? Their system of justice had broken down when they refused an inquiry into a case of that kind. In the case of the man Kilmartin, whose innocence had been established, the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland got up at that Table, and sneered at the most sacred feelings which were instilled into the bosom of every Catholic in childhood, and endeavoured to urge that the dying declaration of the man to his clergyman was but a new proof of the guilt of the other. Well, that inquiry was wrung out of him, thanks to the aid afforded by several hon. Members, and it was found that the jury had been packed and that the man had been wrongfully convicted. Circumstances had also come to light which showed his innocence. And so, some of the Maamtrasna prisoners were alive to-day, and would have the benefit of an inquiry, he trusted, sooner or later, for the evidence against the Government was too great.

[Second Night.]

It had sunk down into the minds of the people of Ireland. The Government dared not grant the inquiry, and let the truth be known. If the Government must keep up the Coercion Code in Ireland, they must use that tremendous engine with care. He must say that he never knew a case which carried conviction more than the Maamtrasna case. If they could not get the inquiry, and obtain the liberty of these innocent men, the Irish Members would go back to Ireland, and from the Giant's Causeway to Cape Clear they would ring into the ears of Earl Spencer and his associates a charge of foul and infamous murder.

COLONEL NOLAN said, that there were two branches of this case, the first having reference to Myles Joyce, and the other to those men who were now lying under penal servitude. The latter branch of the question was the one to which he now wished to call the attention of the House. It would, perhaps, be said that no more impartial inquiry could be made than that of the trial at which they had been convicted; but it should be remembered that practically there was no Judge and no real jury. The general belief was that these men had pleaded guilty under the advice of the parish priest and of their counsel, Mr. Malley, who had certainly done his best for them. They were then sentenced to be hanged, and for some time the capital sentence was not respited. It was believed throughout the whole of the West of Ireland that Mr. Malley had advised the prisoners to plead guilty under an understanding with the Crown authorities that these men would not be hanged. Time still went on and their sentences were not commuted, and in consequence of that delay there was a set battle going on between Mr. Malley and the Crown authorities upon the subject, and eventually it was acknowledged that an intimation had been given that in no case should these men be hanged, and the sentences were commuted to penal servitude. That was generally considered to be the real object of the men in pleading guilty. Thus there had been practically no investigation at all into the case of these men on the trial. He believed that to be the origin of the strong feeling which existed in the West of Ireland in respect to this matter. A prima facie case had been made out, and it was extremely well worthy of further investigation. Again, he thought, that if ever there was a case in which pity should be shown towards accused persons, it was where they did not understand the language of the Court in which they were tried, or even of their advisers, which was the case with these men. Another point which he would impress on the Prime Minister, who had paid so much attention to Ireland, was that the Archbishop of Tuam, who had taken up the case, was a man who was entirely on the side of moderation, and was not likely to take up any case which he did not believe could be proved before the public. The confessions which the Archbishop received had been made in the most public manner, and although he had never made a similar request before, he felt himself bound to state his own prima facie opinion that in the interest of justice an impartial further investigation was imperatively demanded. He did not think that the Government ought to refuse an investigation which was asked for by a large number of Irish Members. They had made no charges against the jury in this case, because they believed that upon the evidence before them the juries brought in a right verdict. What they complained of was that all the facts were not revealed. He did not believe that a reinvestigation would unsettle people's ideas of justice, but thought it would act in an entirely opposite manner. When the Irish Members asked for an inquiry in Kilmartin's case, they were told repeatedly that it would not be granted, and but for the interposition of the Prime Minister no investigation would have been held. The result, however, of the inquiry which was instituted proved that the Irish Members were right, and Kilmartin was released. He appealed to the Prime Minister to adopt a similar course in this instance, believing that, whatever the result might be as to the guilt or innocence of the men now in prison, it would at least have the effect of satisfying the people that the Government were desirous of acting justly.

MR. JOHN REDMOND said, that the discussion which had arisen on the Amendment of his hon. Friend was second to none in importance to the welfare not only of Ireland, but of this country. Questions of Colonial aggrandizement, foreign relations, and domestic reform might come and go; but this Irish Question they always had with them, and any discussions which tended to throw a fierce light upon the action of the Executive officers in Ireland, and which revealed the true opinions and wishes of the majority of the people of that country, ought to be welcomed by all those who wished to see a speedy end of Irish disaffection and English injustice. The Solicitor General for Ireland had stated that the action of the Irish Members was taken to discredit the administration of justice. He believed that to further discredit the administration of justice in Ireland was well nigh impossible. English law meant Irish robbery, murder, and confiscation; and the so-called administration of justice by England meant in every department of social and political life in Ireland the persecution of the people at the hands of partizan Judges and packed juries. The rule of England in Ireland could have no satisfactory foundation so long as the administration of justice failed to command the confidence of the majority of the people. The present Liberal Government at the commencement of their reign in Ireland, with the shibboleth that "force is no remedy" on their lips, adopted a system of savage coercion, on the pretext that it was necessary to suppress crime which everybody knew their policy in the past had created. Power was placed in the hands of such men as Bolton and French, and he should like to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland whether that was the way to win the confidence and respect of the people? The effect of such a system upon the people was bad enough; but the effect upon the administrators of the law themselves was even worse. It was said by Englishmen that the bad old times were past and gone; but there was no use in laying that flattering unction to their souls. The continued exercise of tyrannical legislation and arbitrary power tended inevitably to injustice and corruption, and it was not at all to be wondered at that the results of such a system were a crop of hasty convictions and executions of the innocent. Ireland had passed through two terrible periods of misery and crime, and for those two periods Irish Members held the present Liberal Government responsible. The first was a period of "State-created crime," to use a phrase of Sir John Pope Hennessy. Outrages were committed, and the perpetrators were not discovered. The period which succeeded was infinitely more horrible; the bloodhounds of vengeance were let loose among the people; Lord Spencer took Office to vindicate the majesty of the law, and he sought to punish a victim for every crime in Ireland; the ordinary process was to arrest a number of men on suspicion, to visit them in their cells, to tell them that others had confessed, and urge them to do so, and in this way innocent men were sent to the gallows and to penal servitude. The old watchword of English law—"Let the guilty escape rather than that the innocent should be punished," had been reversed by Earl Spencer, who had adopted as his motto—"Let hundreds of innocent men suffer in the convict cell and on the gallows rather than that one guilty man should escape." By mere chance Kilmartin escaped the gallows and was sent to penal servitude. When a man died in America declaring that he was the perpetrator of the crime, Lord Spencer remained unmoved, and the Chief Secretary glibly declared that he had convinced himself of the justice of the conviction. To satisfy the consciences of English Members inquiry was granted and the injustice of the conviction established, and then Kilmartin was ungraciously released "without impeaching the correctness of the original conviction," but because "subsequent information had created some doubt" about it. That case should be a warning to English Members not to place too much reliance upon the glib declarations of Irish officials. Such cases furnished a strong argument for some sort of criminal appeal. In the case now under discussion all that was asked was that the House should force the Irish Executive to grant full, open, and sworn inquiry, the contention being that one man who was executed and four who were in penal servitude were wrongly convicted, and that the two chief culprits, the paymasters and ring-leaders of the gang, were at large, and were well known to the Government. As to the motive for the murder, the theory of the Government was that it was done to destroy possibly future evidence in connection with a crime committed at a considerable distance. There was not one tittle of evidence from beginning to end in support of that theory. Subsequent revelations showed clearly enough that the murder sprang out of the operations of a Ribbon Society. The whole case against the prisoners rested on the most incredible story ever told in a Court of Justice of three men having tracked the murderers for about three miles across the country to the scene of the murder, and having recognized them on what they said was a bright starlit night. But the force of that evidence was completely destroyed by the declaration of the only living person who witnessed the murder—namely, young Joyce, who stated, as he had previously done in a solemn deposition, that the murderers had blackened faces; and that was confirmed by his elder brother. He wanted to know the reason for the suppression of that deposition, and also why Lord Spencer refused to give credence to the declaration of innocence made by Myles Joyce, fresh from the hands of his clergyman, and having made his peace with God? The hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) stated that such a suppression could never have taken place in any similar case in England. He would await with interest the speech of the late Chief Secretary, to hear whether the right hon. Gentleman could make a positive assertion that the men now in prison who protested their innocence had no hope of mercy held out to them to induce them to plead guilty. He and his hon. Friends did not go the length of saying that they had proved the men innocent, but they asked for an opportunity of proving it. The inquiry held in the Recess did not fulfil any one of the conditions of a satisfactory investigation. It was not full, it was not open, it was not upon oath. It was, in fact, a sham inquiry. In a back parlour of Dublin Castle, Mr. George Bolton was politely asked whether he was guilty of the charge made against him; and having, of course, replied that he was not, Lord Spencer declared himself perfectly satisfied. But if Lord Spencer was satisfied, the Irish people were not; they demanded a full and open investigation upon oath. They demanded the examination of those men who had made statements since the trial, and also the production of the dying declarations of the men who had been executed. Until these things were done, they would believe that Myles Joyce was judicially murdered, that Lord Spencer knew it, and that his only motive for refusing inquiry was to screen himself and his subordinates. After the refusal to grant an inquiry, he believed the Irish people would say once for all that they had had enough of the administration of Earl Spencer. Probably, no English Administration that ever held sway in Ireland was so universally despised and detested as the present. If any Englishman should doubt the correctness of this assertion, he would remind him of the recent experience of Lord Spencer, when, surrounded by soldiers and guarded by detectives and policemen, he made a tour to the South of Ireland much in the same way in which the Czar travelled through his Dominions in Russia. In every town Lord Spencer visited the shops were closed, the shutters put up, and black flags floated from every house. That reception was in strong contrast to that accorded to Lady Burdett Coutts, who everywhere met with a most enthusiastic welcome. No confidence could be placed in the existing Administration, whose chief representatives to the Irish people to-day were the partizan Judge and the hangman, and whose hands were believed to be red with the blood of innocent Irishmen. Let no man tell him that it was their duty to tolerate such an Administration because they hoped to receive the boon of a Franchise Bill. The time had arrived when the franchise must be extended in England and Scotland, and Irishmen knew that no statesman dare withhold it from Ireland, and at the same time profess to govern the country Constitutionally. They cared not whether they got this boon from a Whig or from a Tory Government. In the circumstances, he did not hesitate to say it was the highest duty of the Irish Members to seize the first opportunity given to them of assisting in hurling from power this Government of coercionist Radicals and hypocritical Whigs.

Mr. WARTON said, he considered it as extraordinary that no Member of the Liberal Party sitting behind the Leaders of this precious Government had evinced the slightest anxiety to express an opinion as to the advisability of granting the inquiry which was asked. No doubt, they thought it far more important to shorten the debate in order that the Prime Minister might make his two minutes' speech on the Franchise Bill; and, consequently, they would not give their minds to the very important question whether or not a case had been made out for inquiry and consideration. If it was a troublesome question to the Government, they had only themselves to blame for it; for if they had not thrown over Mr. George Bolton, who had served them long and well, the charges founded upon the statement of the informers would never have been brought forward. Looking dispassionately at this case, he must say that if hon. Members below the Gangway really wanted an inquiry, he doubted the discretion of their making an attack upon Lord Spencer, because the Government must stand by the Lord Lieutenant. Again, it was wrong to charge all the officials with being in a kind of conspiracy. No one who knew Mr. Justice Johnson could believe that he was otherwise than a highly honourable man, who would not lend himself to any conspiracy whatever to do injustice to anybody. He (Mr. Warton) did not agree with the hon. and learned Member for Chatham that the Solicitor General for Ireland had conducted the defence of the Government in a way to which exception could be taken. There was no doubt in this case both Judge and jury had acted properly, and a right verdict had been come to. It was quite clear that the suggestion as to the men's faces being blackened had been brought forward in the newspapers.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL remarked, that he did not think that the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) need be very much concerned because the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) disagreed from him, because, as far as he could gather from the somewhat rapid and not altogether coherent utterances of the latter, he appeared to betray the same want of information upon this question which characterized his general remarks. He must at the outset express his regret that the case of these Maamtrasna murders had not elicited from hon. Members opposite—many of whom, as far as he could judge, had listened to the discussion that had taken place with attention—any expression of opinion, because no Party question could arise out of this matter, inasmuch as both sides of the House must be equally animated by the desire that justice should be fairly administered in Ireland as well as in England. He thought, therefore, that it would have been well—as no other Business of importance was likely to come on—if some hon. Members opposite had for the moment shaken themselves free from the shackles of Party that usually bound them, and had given the House and the public some idea of the opinion which they had formed of the manner in which the proceedings in question had been conducted. He had no doubt that the Government, in connection with this case, were in about as awkward a dilemma as, he supposed, they had ever been on any Irish matter since the present Parliament came together. The Secretary of State for War at the close of last Session, for the purpose of easing the progress of Supply, gave the Irish Party to understand that there would be an inquiry into this case by the Government, and, of course, Irish Members who heard that intimation desisted from their opposition to the Vote then before the House, believing that the promised inquiry would be of a kind that would be satisfactory to them. And, no doubt, the noble Lord, cautious though he always was, did convey to hon. Members the idea that the inquiry to be made by the Government would be an impartial and an independent one; and it was in consequence of that supposition on the part of Irish Members that the Government were allowed to take the Vote upon the particular item of the Irish Estimates which was then under discussion, and which was at that time urgently required. The necessary Vote having been obtained, the pledge had to be fulfilled, and, as was the case with regard to many other Government pledges given with the object of escaping from a momentary Parliamentary difficulty, it became a question with the Government with how little impartiality, with how little sincerity, and with how little of bona fides their pledge could be carried out. Of course, when he was speaking of Government pledges, he had in mind those that had been given in reference to the Transvaal, and to Egypt, and of others. There could be no doubt in the mind of anyone as to what a bond fide inquiry was. The Government themselves had given the House a good specimen of one in the case of Kilmartin.

[Second Night.]

The Prime Minister had been very much impressed by the nature of that case, so much so that he had given a personal pledge, and undoubtedly the inquiry was a satisfactory one. It had been conducted by means of an independent barrister sent down to the locality, and who took evidence upon the spot, and the result was that the innocence of Kilmartin was clearly proved. Before he left the case of Kilmartin he wished to express his regret at hearing from the hon. Member for New Ross (Mr. J. Redmond) that when Kilmartin was released, the Lord Lieutenant had taken steps to send him back to his home with every stigma of crime attaching to him. If that story were true, all he could say was that such a mean and wretched proceeding on the part of the Irish Government could scarcely be exceeded. Be that as it might, however, the inquiry itself was a bond fide and satisfactory one, and it was such an inquiry as that which the noble Lord the Secretary for War was understood to have promised would be made into the present case. But the inquiry into the present case could not be said to have been in any sense satisfactory, for it was in the nature of a Judge reviewing his own sentence. Lord Spencer having caused a capital sentence to be carried out, was called upon to say whether he had acted rightly in so doing. The noble Lord thereupon considered the matter in the recesses of the Castle, and on reflection he arrived at the conclusion that he had acted rightly. Now the matter had come up again, and Her Majesty's Government found themselves placed in a very difficult position indeed. The hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had felt the importance of the case, and he had put it in such a way that the Government themselves felt the importance of it, and no one had more felt its importance than the Prime Minister, and the Prime Minister himself, no doubt, would have liked to have made this concession to the Irish Members, which his own high sense of justice would urge him to make, especially when that concession would be of immediate political advantage. The Prime Minister must have two points of difficulty before him. He had to keep in view the Division on the Franchise Bill, which was likely to take place in that House before long, when it would be of vital importance to him to sustain his numerical majority. And the Prime Minister had also to take into account that if, in order to maintain that numerical majority, he was to make this concession to the Irish Members, he would be met by the prompt resignation of Earl Spencer. It must be obvious to hon. Members opposite that if the Government made any concession that night to the Irish Members upon this point, that Earl Spencer must be discredited, and could not remain in Office. The inquiry that had been held into this case had been conducted by Earl Spencer himself, and he had written to the Archbishop of Tuam to say that after careful inquiry he had come to the conclusion that the judicial process had been properly carried out, and that his decision with regard to the execution of the sentence was a just one. It would, therefore, be perfectly clear to every hon. Member in that House that, if within a few weeks of Earl Spencer writing that letter, the Government were to come to the conclusion that his inquiry was worthless and that his decision did not deserve their confidence, Earl Spencer would have to come away from Ireland, and thus colour would be given for the suspicion that had been excited in the minds of the English people that there was some foundation for the suggestion that a bargain had been entered into between the Government and the Irish Party, of which such free mention had been made in the newspapers, and that the Irish Party would not support the Government unless Earl Spencer and Mr. Trevelyan were brought away from Ireland. It was clear, therefore, that whatever might be the immediate gain to the Government through making such a concession, it would be lost by them in another way. The House would therefore agree with him that the Government were placed in a position of great difficulty, a difficulty which arose entirely from the fact that the whole of their policy in Ireland had always been conducted, not with the view to the benefit of Ireland, nor with a view of securing the prosperity of the people of that country, but solely from time to time of taking such steps as their particular political difficulties might demand. When the Prime Minister introduced the Land Act of 1882, he said that he would be guided by the Divine light of justice, and that guided by that light he could not possibly err. Unfortunately that evening the right hon. Gentleman had not been guided by the Divine light of justice, but solely by a regard for Parliamentary exigencies. The debate had been resumed about 5 o'clock, and, excepting the speech of the Solicitor General for Ireland, which did not count, the House had not yet been favoured with the views of the Government. No one could throw so much light upon these matters as the right hon. Gentleman who had said he was not a Member of the Government, and if that right hon. Gentleman did not feel in a position to-night to make any remarks, he hoped on Monday he would appear in the full-blown character of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and address the House. A careful and impartial examination of the Maamtrasna case led one irresistibly to the conclusion that an inquiry was necessary. It was not disputed that a very important piece of evidence was kept back from the jury by the Crown counsel, and that the counsel for the defence had no opportunity of bringing that particular evidence before the Court. These facts would cause the House to consider the mode in which criminal trials were conducted in Ireland. For some years there had been great difficulty in obtaining evidence in Ireland, and certain laws had been passed in consequence in order to facilitate the conduct of trials. The result had been that the officials charged with the vindication of the law had shrunk from hardly any process in order to obtain convictions, irrespective of the guilt or innocence of the accused. That was not the way in which criminal trials were conducted in this country. No one would condemn more strongly the course taken by the Crown counsel in the Maamtrasna case than the Attorney General for England, and he felt sure that such a course would never be followed by the hon. and learned Member. The time had arrived when Parliament should express its views on the question whether far greater caution ought not to be exercised in the conduct of criminal trials in Ireland. The Prime Minister, alluding to the state of Ireland, said the other day in Edinburgh that, as a result of the policy of the Government, the Irish people placed greater confidence in the administration of justice. But how could the Irish people feel any increased confidence in the administration of the law after hearing of the great miscarriage of justice in the case of Kilmartin, and of the miscarriage caused by the conduct of the Crown counsel in the Maamtrasna case, in which case evidence immediately relevant to the issue was kept back from the jury? It was said that if the inquiry which was demanded were granted a severe blow would be dealt to the administration of criminal justice in Ireland; but were they on that account to refuse to do justice in this case? At Edinburgh the Prime Minister had also made a remark distinctly appropriate to the present issue, when, with reference to the conduct of another Assembly, he said that there was nothing more to be deprecated than the fear of being thought afraid. Were the Government afraid of being thought afraid to do justice in Ireland lest Judges and Crown counsel might have their credit shaken? Considerations like these, if allowed to influence them, were fatal to the cause of good government in that country. He appealed to the Government to grant the inquiry. If by giving way on this question they should secure a few Irish votes, he should not object, and they need fear no taunt from him. If the Government felt that the conduct of this trial was not such as to reflect credit on those who were responsible for it, or to conduce to a certain and sure result in the verdict of the jury—if they felt that, then let them get up and state to the House that though the result of an inquiry might be temporarily inconvenient to themselves, they would do this for the benefit of Ireland.

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the noble Lord's speech did not contain many very definite propositions. He has asked the Government to meet the difficult situation in a way which he did not exactly define. He did, however, lay down one definite proposition. He said the Government were in a very difficult position. Now, in that respect, I do not agree with the noble Lord. The noble Lord tells us—if I slip out the word "we" in the course of the few remarks I have to make, I hope it will be understood what I mean—the noble Lord tells us that we have not only to think of the Divisions on the Representation of the People Bill, but that we have to think of the existence of the Government. We may have to think of those things, but we do not think of them, and this matter concerns one of those departments of human life in which no Government has a right to think of any political considerations whatever; and I think that the noble Lord, if he had thought for a little while longer before he got up, would not have indulged in Party taunts in this matter of life and death, and liberty and detention of men in prison. Certainly, the Government feel that if they were to allow political considerations to influence them in a matter of this description—in a matter that concerns the question whether law and order shall exist in Ireland, and whether justice shall be duly administered in such a manner that Ireland can be a habitable country—they would be guilty of the greatest iniquity a Government could be guilty of. Such a course reminds me of the line of the Roman poet—

We have come to a decision on this matter from considerations quite different from those which have been stated by the noble Lord; and I will endeavour to explain what the considerations are upon which the Government have acted, following, in the course of my explanation, two or three of the most marked speeches which have been made in the course of the evening. The noble Lord has said that my noble Friend the Secretary of State for War gave a pledge, at the end of last Session, which pledge has not been fulfilled with the sincerity and bona fides with which a Government pledge ought to be carried out. I have at this moment before me Hansard's Parliamentary Debates. Hansard's Parliamentary Debates, as hon. Members are well aware, are very much the most accurate record of those proceedings which take place late in the Session, and on Money Bills, and my noble Friend desires me to say that he was so very anxious that the words of that pledge should be before the House in such a shape that they might be indubitable, that he forebore to make in Hansard those verbal corrections, and those corrections even of punctuation, which hon. Members feel themselves at liberty to make. He wished that Hansard should be an instrument of appeal in exactly the shape in which his words were taken down, at the moment they were uttered, by the reporters in the Gallery. Now, what are the words of my noble Friend? He says—

"It has been stated by the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) that these allegations rest, to a great extent, on statements which have been made in a formal and solemn manner before a certain dignitary of the Roman Catholic Church. If these statements are prima facie of a bona fide character, and are vouched for by the dignitary of the Roman Catholic Church before whom they were brought, and are brought formally under the notice of Her Majesty's Government, they will receive consideration; and if there appears to be a case for further inquiry, that inquiry will be granted."—(3 Hansard, [292] 676.)

Now, Sir, the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), in a speech which I am told was considered by hon. Members to be singularly clear, as it doubtless was, and likewise singularly well informed in all branches of the subject—with which I do not equally agree—the hon. and learned Member for Chatham said that the Archbishop of Tuam had brought a charge of misconduct against an official, and, therefore, that the Government to which my noble Friend belonged was bound to fulfil its pledge. But the Archbishop of Tuam does not bring the charge. He is but the person who conveys it. The Archbishop does not know anything about it himself. He depends on the testimony of another person; and who is that other person? None other than that informer and accomplice of whose testimony the hon. and learned Member for Chatham himself, a few sentences before in his speech, stated that his evidence was absolutely worthless. And that is the sole evidence which the Archbishop of Tuam has for the charge he makes against the Government officials for the manner in which they took the evidence of Casey. I consider that my noble Friend, who had not been informed of the circumstances of this case, was perfectly justified in making the promise he made last Session in the House of Commons; and I consider that when the Irish Government looked into the matter and found that the prima facie case consisted merely of the evidence of a thrice-perjured man—[Cries of "Oh!" from the Irish Members—]—yes; a thrice-perjured man, coming forward not even with perjuries, but merely with statements, and that when those statements were disproved by the three officials to whom they were referred, I consider that the Government were justified in saying that they had made a perfectly adequate inquiry under the circumstances. [Cries of "Oh!" from the Irish Members.] That is my opinion, at any rate. Now, it must be remembered that not only were these unsupported statements of Casey's tainted by the very source from which they came, but they were also the most reckless and ill-considered statements that ever were placed before the public. They consisted of a series of interviews, which I believe to have been reported with very great care by the persons with whom the interviews were held. One is by the reporter of The Freeman's Journal, and others by the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington). But these reports contain all sorts of discrepancies of a very serious character, and especially in connection with the reported interview with Mr. Brady, Mr. Bolton, and the Governor of the gaol. In The Freeman's Journal of the 11th of August, 1884, it is stated, in the report of an interview which took place between Thomas Casey and the special correspondent of that paper, that on the Thursday before the trial Bolton saw Casey in Kilmainham Prison by himself, and showed him Philbin's report. It is also stated that at Green Street, Bolton met Casey a second time, when he made his statement about the murder. I do not lay any stress upon the fact that it was the wrong day, but there was a very definite statement that Casey was informed first by Bolton reading the evidence of Philbin; whereas, according to the statement of the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington), whose extraordinary industry in getting up the case is a proof of his sincerity, Casey stated that he had been informed on the morning of the trial of what he had to say in a conversation he had with Mr. Bolton. Here, then, we have Casey stating to the correspondent of The Freeman's Journal that he was informed of what he was to swear on the Thursday or Saturday in the previous week, by means of having evidence read over to him, while afterwards, in speaking to the hon. Member for Westmeath, he stated that on the following Monday he would not have been aware what evidence he was wanted to give, had he not been prompted vidé voce by Bolton on the spot. In the hon. Member's sixth letter in reference to the case, dated the 7th of October last, it is stated that the confession took place in Green Street Court House on the first morning of the trial. As reported by the hon. Member, this is what happened—

"The next day was the day of the trial. When we were going into the van I saw Philbin going away in a cab. The other men went into the van. I was the last to go in, and I then said to the Governor that he might speak to Bolton. I had not given him an answer the night before. We were then brought to the Court. The nine of us were in the room at the back of the dock, and my name was called. I was brought a few yards to the right to a little room where Mr. Brady, Mr. Bolton, and the Governor of the gaol were. Mr. Bolton was the first who spoke. He said—'Now, Casey, you are going to make a statement.' He pulled out his watch and said I had only a short time. I said I'd like to give evidence fair. He replied that I had only 20 minutes to consider my neck. Mr. Bolton asked—'Who are the three men that went into the House?' I did not answer fast enough. Mr. Brady then said, low, across the room, to Bolton, 'I know them—Pat Joyce, Pat Casey, and Myles Joyce.' Then I knew what names I should say."

Here we have Casey stating to one person that he was informed of what he should have to say on the Thursday or the Saturday of the previous week by means of having the evidence of Philbin read over to him by Bolton, and we have him stating, some time afterwards, to the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) that when the Monday, which was the morning of the trial, came, he was not aware what evidence he had to give, and had to be prompted vidé voce on the spot. That is a very good instance of the inaccuracies which pervade the statements of Casey, and it is on these inaccurate statements, inaccurate in themselves as compared with each other, and frightfully at variance with the statement sworn to by Casey on previous occasions, that the Government are asked to go in the teeth of a solemn trial, and consent to an inquiry which, in my opinion, and in the opinion of the Government, would be a severe blow to the administration of the law, and would shake the foundations of justice in Ireland. Here is another instance. In The Freeman's Journal of the 6th of September, 1884, there is an account of an interview between a newspaper correspondent and Thomas Casey, when Casey stated that there were no such people as Nee and Kelly, but that they were false names taken by two Caseys, father and son, alleged by Thomas Casey to have been at the murder. In the letter of the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) of the 2nd of October, 1884, Thomas Casey says—"Old Casey was Kelly, and John Casey, junr., was Nee." But in a statement made on the 28th of July, 1883, to District Inspector Stokes, Casey, the informer, said "Nee was Walsh"—a name which appears quite incidentally and then disappears again. Thomas Casey, on the same occasion, urged Inspector Stokes to prosecute Walsh and the two Caseys. Here, then, are three different statements which Casey makes as to Nee and Kelly, and this is the man, whose unconsidered statements, flying loosely about, but which he thinks will be for his own advantage, we are to take for the absolute truth.

MR. HARRINGTON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the statement to Stokes was not made before the confession to the Crown officials?

MR. TREVELYAN: It was made on the 28th of July.

MR. HARRINGTON: Before the confession?

MR. TREVELYAN: It was a somewhat curious statement, because it came about half-way between the earlier statement on oath and the subsequent statement, and it differs very materially from both of them. Then there is another exceedingly important statement. At the trial, Casey, as is well known, swore that Philbin was present. The Solicitor General for Ireland gave collateral evidence also as to the presence of Philbin. It is a very interesting fact that the two men among the three Joyces, who knew Philbin by sight, also swore to his presence. He was not, however, sworn to by one of the three cardinal witnesses who did not know him by sight. The Solicitor General also reminded us how one man, who was undoubtedly guilty, and who was afterwards executed for this miserable murder, when he was arrested, asked the policeman whether Philbin had not been arrested likewise. Casey swore that Philbin was there; Philbin himself swore that he was there; and, in fact, the evidence which pointed to his presence on that occasion was clear and overwhelming, and the further evidence of Casey, at a subsequent period, when his object was not to confirm his previous evidence—namely, at the trial for compensation for the murder—corroborated his former statement.

MR. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman quote his statement?

MR. TREVELYAN: Yes, I have no objection to quote his statement when he did not come forward to give evidence as an approver.

MR. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman say what punishment he was subjected to?

MR. TREVELYAN: The hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), in his remarks this evening, denied that this evidence had been given. He said that the statement of the Solicitor General for Ireland was absolutely without foundation. I will read the first few lines of the evidence—

"I am one of them," said Casey, "charged with the murder of the Joyces. Anthony Philbin, my brother-in-law, was also one of the party on the night of the Joyce murder."

That was all he said about Philbin in the course of the evidence; but I will read on if it is considered necessary. Well, Sir, here we have proof, by the most undoubted testimony of Philbin himself, of Casey, and others, of the presence of Philbin at the murder; and, again, since Casey appeared as a Crown witness to the murder, we find him giving evidence, in an incidental case, that Philbin was there; but now, in a statement made at random to persons who did not take testimony on oath, Casey says, in an off-hand manner, that Philbin was not there at all. But I will not be content with relying on the fact that this was a man who, by his own confession, was a murderer and, if everything that he said was true, was a double murderer of the most fearful nature. This man confesses that he took part in the hideous crime in the Joyces' cottage. He says now that he swore away the lives of innocent men. On the top of all this, I have shown that he has been in recent days, for motives into which I will not enter, but which are very obvious, and which the House may very well define, sowing broadcast, not, indeed, perjuries, but statements which, if there was any prospect of this inquiry on oath we are asked for, would very soon become perjuries of the deepest dye; and it is on this man's evidence, and this man's evidence alone, that the House is asked to say that a prima facie case exists for an inquiry. [Cries of "No, no!" "Not at all!" from the Irish Members.] The inquiry promised by my noble Friend rests absolutely on this man's evidence alone, for the House is asked to grant that part of the inquiry which refers to the conduct of the Crown officials in the matter of getting this evidence solely upon this man's evidence. ["No!"] I say yes; there is nothing else.

MR. HARRINGTON: There was suppression of evidence.

MR. TREVELYAN: I say that, as far as the question of the conduct of the Crown officials in taking Casey's evidence is concerned, although possibly I might allow that there are other matters connected with the rest of the case—and, of course, I propose to go into those parts of the statement of the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington)—but as regards the inquiry into the conduct of Mr. Brady and Mr. Bolton, there is absolutely nothing but this man's evidence. The hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) went through this part of the case with, I thought, considerable moderation of language, although he now and then broke out into vituperation, which I shall have to refer to by-and-bye. If, in the remarks I have to make, I attend a little more closely to the speeches which have been made to-day than to that which was delivered by the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) last night, it will not be from want of interest or attention to the exertions of the hon. Member, who certainly stated his case with the greatest care, but I prefer to confine my remarks mainly to those speeches which are still fresh in the recollection of the House. The hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) has attacked the witnesses. The Solicitor General, who has been referred to, I think, by some of the speakers with almost unfairness, made a speech which I must say I thought was most exhaustive, and I am not going to apply any other phrase to it—it was perfectly exhaustive on this important subject, and was contained within a very moderate compass, seeing that it produced such a result. When we are told that it was a partizan speech, and a heated speech, I wish hon. Members to compare it, as far as partizan-ship is concerned, with the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), or, as far as heat is concerned, with the speech of the hon. Member for New Ross (Mr. J. Redmond). I do not think that the Solicitor General at any period of his speech passed the bounds of that honest indignation which is everywhere in place, and which is most certainly in place when the House of Commons is being turned into a Court of Appeal, and when hon. Members on one side or the other are speaking, to the disadvantage of the country, as legal advocates. This case rests primarily and principally on the evidence of three persons, who stated that they followed the band of murderers, and who absolutely identified them with one exception. One of the three witnesses did not identify one of the murderers—that is to say, Philbin—but Philbin himself confessed that he was there, and his evidence was supported by the evidence of a respectable female—I believe a very respectable female. Well, Sir, hon. Members and hon. and learned Members on the other side of the House have impugned the evidence of these witnesses. The hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor), who began the debate this evening, spoke of palpable perjury. The hon. Member used very strong expressions about the witnesses, and he has been followed in this respect by other hon. Members. I would ask hon. Gentlemen who sit around me to consider what chance they have of arriving at the truth about these witnesses—they who cannot see them, who cannot hear them give their evidence, and who cannot hear them being cross-examined. ["Oh!"] Obviously, they cannot see the witnesses.

MR. HEALY: Bring them before a Select Committee.

MR. TREVELYAN: Surely, the proper course on a point of this sort is to refer it to those great committees of the nation which are appointed to inquire into these criminal cases—the Courts of Law—where men are trained and paid for the purpose of sifting evidence; where they give their whole time, and where they have the benefit of a long experience. Now, what was the effect produced by these witnesses upon the Court of Law? The Judge charged the jury to the effect that the witnesses were, in his opinion—I am not sure of the exact words, but they were much stronger than those I will employ—that the witnesses were as respectable and as trustworthy witnesses as had ever appeared before him in Ireland. The words used were words to that effect, if they are not the exact words. The same Judge—Mr. Justice Barry—charged three juries in regard to these witnesses, and those juries all agreed in believing the witnesses, not only after hearing them give their evidence, but after they had heard them cross-examined by very able counsel—counsel who, as I shall show, had every means of knowing every point upon which the evidence of the witnesses could be broken down, if it was possible to break it down. Of what nature were the juries which were convinced by the evidence of these witnesses? I am not going to do so useless a thing in the House of Commons as to read over a second time what has been read already to the House by my hon. and learned Friend, although I am sorry to say that many hon. Gentlemen now in the House were not present when my hon. and learned Friend was addressing it earlier in the evening; but I can assure them that the strongest testimony to the character of the juries as being representative juries, not composed of one religion or being juries of one class, was given by United Ireland and by The Freeman's Journal, the latter being a paper which, on that point, deserves to be listened to with very great interest and all the more attention on account of the difficulties into which it brought itself with the Court in regard to this very subject of juries. Well, Sir, I take it for granted that every hon. Member of the House will admit that, at the time of the trial, all Ireland and every Irishman was satisfied—reasonably satisfied—with the composition of the juries. Why do I say this? It is for this reason—that this morning an extremely able publication has been placed in the hands of hon. Members, and I know too well by experience how much more an hon. Member is affected by an able publication which he can read than by a speech—generally not very able—which he can only listen to—a publication drawn up with great ability, in some respects with very great candour and fairness, because the Lord Lieutenant's case is inserted at the end of it, but a publication which contains a preface and introduction of six pages, printed in large type, and just that sort of introduction which 10 men would read for every one who read the book from the first page to the last. In that preface, in large type, there is this passage—

“Application on the part of prisoners' counsel for postponement, and for what is known as a ‘view jury,’ were refused. The juries were packed after the manner of all political and agrarian trials in Ireland. Eight minutes' deliberation sufficed to satisfy the mind and consciences of the first jury, and Patrick Joyce was adjudged guilty and sentenced to death. Patrick Casey was then immediately put upon his trial on the same evidence, and the jury gave 12 minutes' consideration to his fate.”

Now, can any hon. Gentleman who approaches this case without knowing anything about it read that passage about the packing of the juries, and the short time they took to consider their verdict, and not come to the conclusion that the writer of the passage was of opinion that the prisoners had been condemned with indecent and undue haste by a packed jury?

MR. HARRINGTON: Thirty-six jurors out of the special jury panel were ordered to stand aside by the Crown in the case of Patrick Joyce, and in the case of Myles Joyce there were 10 Protestants and only two Catholics upon the jury.

MR. TREVELYAN: I do not dispute what the hon. Member's opinion is, or that he has ever written anything in the least degree inconsistent with the opinion he now advances; but, seeing that hon. Members will have read the opinion of the hon. Member as contained in this publication, it was not, I think, superfluous on the part of my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland to remind the House that United Ireland admitted at the time that the juries who tried the case were comparatively fairly composed.

MR. O'BRIEN: For the first time on record.

MR. TREVELYAN: United Ireland said, in reference to the first of the prisoners charged with the horrible butcheries at Maamtrasna—

“On the trial of the first of the prisoners charged with the horrible butchery at Maamtrasna—may we venture for once to hint post hoc, ergo propter hoc?—there were at least five and, we believe, six Catholic jurors. Their duty was not less fearlessly done, and their verdict will be, perhaps, rather more scrupulously respected."

After the third trial and conviction had come to an end, and when the rest of the prisoners had pleaded guilty, the same paper says—

"The Maamtrasna trials are over, and such of the miserable creatures as did not turn approvers have been sentenced to be hanged. We believe the public are satisfied that a disgusting butchery has been avenged upon convincing evidence by juries comparatively fairly chosen."

That admission, considering the quarter from which it comes, is higher praise than the conduct of any criminal trial in my day in Ireland ever received before. The first three trials ended in the conviction of three prisoners, who were sentenced to be hanged; and now I come to the case of the other five prisoners. The other five pleaded guilty. They pleaded guilty with hesitation, and after seeing their priest; but they did plead guilty; and I emphatically say that the recollection of the Crown counsel is perfectly clear and vivid that they pleaded guilty with the knowledge that if they did so their lives would still be in danger. I come now—and this is a point to which I wish most anxiously to direct the attention of the House—I come now to the judgment to be passed on the action of the Viceroy. The Viceroy had to consider what he should do in this case. Three independent juries, after a careful trial, had condemned to death three men on evidence which convinced the juries thoroughly, and on the same evidence; and there were five men who, on going to trial, pleaded guilty, and gave up the case. I ask whether there was anything that could possibly have made the Viceroy think that it was his duty to spare any of those three men in the case of a murder so horrible and so general, unless he was a disbeliever in the efficacy of punishment altogether, in which case I conclude it would have been impossible for him to have undertaken the duty of dispensing life and death at all? I cannot possibly conceive what ground there is for saying that Earl Spencer did not do his duty on that occasion. The one argument—and even in that the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) is agreed—was the confession of the two men who were executed. With regard to that confession, which the Prime Minister has said cannot be laid before the House, there is nothing which a man says upon the scaffold which ought to outweigh a trial, the solemnity and certainty of which are absolutely overwhelming. I am not now talking about any of the matters brought forward and insisted upon by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst). They were all subsequent; but at the moment these three men were sent for execution the case was this—three convictions and five confessions out of the 10 men arrested—seven of them having, as it were, agreed in the same story, three of the prisoners having been condemned on the evidence, and there being nothing against it except the confession of men about to ascend the scaffold. I do not consider that Earl Spencer had any choice in the matter; and if this Resolution is passed condemning the execution of Myles Joyce, I must say that the most unjustifiable and unjustified condemnation will have been passed on a public servant that ever was passed by the House of Commons. I will come afterwards to the incarceration of the four other men. I am brought to the end of the first period of the case, and now I come to the next period—the one to which the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) has directed most of his observations. Since this moment what has happened? Two things in particular have happened—or, rather, one thing has happened, and another thing has been insisted upon. That which has happened is that one of the informers, who was also one of the witnesses on the trial, has come forward and stated that he perjured himself, and sent these men to the scaffold in order to save his own neck. Well, Sir, it should be borne in mind that this witness's evidence was not necessary to the case; it was hardly important to the case. It was brought forward at the eleventh hour—so much at the eleventh hour, indeed, that the hon. Member for New Ross (Mr. J. Redmond), arguing about the statement with regard to the sanction of the Attorney General for Ireland, said that the Attorney General did not use it. And why did not the Attorney General use it? It was because the witness was brought forward at so late an hour, that at the time the Attorney General was opening the case the evidence was being taken down—not by Mr. Bolton, as Casey said, but by Mr. Brady. It was in Mr. Brady's handwriting from the first word to the last. As a matter of fact, it was evidence that was not in the mind of the counsel for the Government at the time they determined to open the case against the prisoners. All I can say is, that if the House consents to grant an inquiry into this case on the ground that an unimportant witness and informer, and an accomplice, two years after the event, came forward and said that he had sworn to a lie, there is no verdict in England or in Ireland that would hold good. All that a man would have to do, when he wanted to get off, would be to induce somebody to come forward and give some trumped-up evidence—evidence important enough to induce the Crown counsel to accept it, and then afterwards say that the evidence he had given was false. If that were done, the verdict must be upset. What has been the conduct of Casey? It is a curious thing to watch the different stages of his conduct. As long as he did not see that his interest lay in any other direction he stuck to his original story. When he came forward about the compensation case, he thought that his interest lay in going to the Government and in turning informer again. Do not let hon. Members carry away the idea that the principal object of Casey was to save the life of anybody. His object was not that; but his object was to make himself important by bringing an accusation against three other men. On the 28th of July, in this year, he came and told District Inspector Stokes that he was prepared to swear away the lives of three more men in addition to those he had sworn away already. That was the first form in which Casey's additional evidence came. Then, in an incidental manner at the end of the conversation, Stokes asked Casey if Philbin was there, and Casey replied—“No; Philbin was not there.”

MR. HEALY: When did Stokes put the question?

MR. HARRINGTON: Why was Casey asked the question?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am unable to say. Probably, Philbin had not been mentioned in Casey's previous statement. Stokes asked him if Myles Joyce was there, and his answer was that Myles Joyce was there, but that he did not go in. Now, there is no contention that Myles Joyce went in. Myles Joyce suffered on the scaffold, not because there was any evidence that he went into the house of the murdered man—

MR. HARRINGTON: There was direct evidence that he did not go in.

MR. TREVELYAN: Myles Joyce was sent to the scaffold, not because there was evidence that he went into the House, but because the evidence satisfied the jury that he had been with the murderous party who went to the house—a party which was watched not from the distances we have been told to-night, and by the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington), but in some cases from a distance of a very few feet by men who identified amongst them every individual composing the party. The hon. Member tells us that the localities are now thoroughly known and studied; that he has himself studied the localities with great interest; and he tells us, further, that the jury were not taken to the spot. Now, I do not know that it is the custom generally for a jury to examine the localities unless there is some important dispute on the question. I do not know that it ever has been the custom. What the custom is is this. If there is any doubt, the counsel for the defence goes down and examines the localities; and in this case not only did the counsel for the defence go down and examine the localities, but a special fee was paid to them for doing so by the Government. The Attorney General (now Mr. Justice Johnson) stated that the matter was of much importance; and, therefore, a special fee was given to men so eminent in order to make it worth their while to go down to the spot. Casey having found that this statement of his was received very coldly by the Government, and that the Government did not think there was any reason for proceeding against the three men he was anxious to implicate in the murders, turned round and told an entirely different story. Now, let the House reflect upon what the Government was asked to do. This was not a question of condoning or acquitting, but a question whether, on the desultory talk of one perjured murderer, we were to proceed against three men against whom a jury could get no fresh evidence unless they were to call upon men now serving their time in penal servitude, and who had themselves confessed that they were guilty of a capital offence. But I would ask any lawyer how often it is that an innocent man, much less five innocent men, declare themselves guilty of a capital offence? It is said that these men were told to do so by their priest; and a letter has been read from the rev. gentleman himself, in which he states that, although he thought the prisoners on the whole were innocent, he advised them to plead guilty. Did the rev. gentleman know that in that course he was taking away the last shadow of evidence which could have been offered in favour of the three men who had been sent to the condemned cell, and that he actually made it certain that they would suffer the extreme penalty of the law? I must say that that was the terrible and the awful result of such advice; and, putting aside the wickedness of the thing, I would rather prefer to think that the rev. gentleman is defective in his memory than to think that he did give such advice, because if he did the advice he gave certainly put the rope around the necks of the men who had already been convicted.

MR. HARRINGTON: It was already around their necks.

MR. TREVELYAN: The right rev. Archbishop speaks, in his letter to Earl Spencer, of the immense importance of declarations made under clerical advice and influence. I cannot give his exact words at this moment; but I think the Archbishop will read with very great pain and wonder the comments which may be made on the advice thus given to these prisoners, as admitted in the letter of the rev. gentleman. How can the mere fact of clerical advice be an argument in favour of the truth of a declaration, when a rev. priest himself tells us that five men, whom he believed on the whole to be innocent, were persuaded by him to plead guilty?

MR. HARRINGTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to correct him? It is due to the rev. gentleman to say that he did not state that he believed them on the whole to be innocent, but simply that he was rather inclined to that belief. He says there was nothing for him to go upon but their own declaration? Will the right hon. Gentleman read his statement?

MR. TREVELYAN: I will do so—

"The case was then laid before me, and in the interest of the prisoners I considered it the wiser course to plead guilty. I was by no means clear at the time that they were innocent. I was certainly inclined to the belief that they were; but I had no grounds for such a belief but their own declarations to me. I argued with myself thus—If the men were guilty their plea of guilt can do them no harm, and will save their lives; and if they were innocent I felt that the truth would leak out, as, from my knowledge of the locality and the people, I believed such a huge wrong could not continue. In this way I saw a probability of these men coming back to their wives and families and homes without a stain on their character. This was the argument I made use of to the men themselves in the cell of Green Street Court House; and I dare say it was the argument which induced them to withdraw their plea of 'not guilty,' and enter a plea of 'guilty.' From this you will see that in recommending the prisoners to adopt this course I was by no means actuated by a belief in their guilt. On the contrary, I rather believed they were innocent."

If I said anything stronger than that I will recall it; but I do not think that I did. There is one other point, and at this moment I can remember only one other besides this declaration of Casey, which has been insisted upon very much to-night, and upon which, before I sit down, because I really have come to the end of this story, I must say a few words. I refer to the depositions and the dying declarations of the two young Joyces. The House will, I hope, carefully distinguish—because it is an important point—between the depositions, which are referred to as having been made at the Coroner's inquest, and the dying declarations. At the Coroner's inquest, two persons—John Collins and Constable Johnson—came forward and gave evidence, from which I will read two or three words in each case. John Collins said that—"Michael Joyce"—that is to say, the elder of the boys, and the one who died—"said he did not know the men, as they had their faces dirty;" and Patrick Joyce, the boy who was severely injured, but who survived, told Constable Johnson that "he did not know them, as their faces were black." These depositions were made before the Coroner, and they were very notorious. They appeared in the public papers, and were quoted everywhere, and it is a fact that these depositions were actually in the hands of the prisoners' counsel. I wish the House carefully to mark that fact—namely, that these depositions were in the hands of the prisoners' counsel.

But besides the depositions there were two dying declarations made. Those dying declarations were taken by Mr. Barry, and in one case, I am glad to say, it turned out not to be a dying declaration. These dying declarations have been frequently read and referred to in the course of this evening. In both of them the boy stated the men had blackened faces; but the dying declarations were of a nature which the Crown counsel thought could not be put into evidence. [Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Irish Members.] If hon. Members will be quiet I think they will find that my story, at any rate, has considerable meaning in it. These declarations were not put in evidence. Now, what is it that the Crown solicitors usually put into a brief? They put in those articles of evidence which they consider ought to tell for the conviction of a prisoner; and if they think a certain declaration cannot be substantiated, and ought not to be taken into account by the jury, they have no right to put it into the brief. It may be said that in that case serious injury was done to the prisoners. There was no injury at all, because the prisoners' counsel were in full possession of the fact that these boys had stated that four of the men's faces were blackened.

MR. HARRINGTON: That was secondary evidence which could not be used.

MR. TREVELYAN: I will come to that point presently. I would never venture to argue the question with the hon. Member unless I had a prima facie case to go upon. No doubt, that evidence was secondary; but the Crown counsel, being anxious that it should not be secondary evidence, actually called as a witness the boy Patrick Joyce. They did not want him for their own purposes. They had no object in examining him; but they called him as a witness solely for the purpose of enabling the counsel for the defence to have an opportunity of examining him on various points, including the point of the blackened faces. But the counsel for the defence, being in full possession of the question of the blackened faces—

MR. HARRINGTON: That is a mistake; they were not.

MR. TREVELYAN: Collins and Constable Johnson were both examined as witnesses, and Patrick Joyce was produced.

Mr. Trevelyan

MR. HARRINGTON: The depositions were not produced.

MR. TREVELYAN: The boy Joyce was put on the table and cross-examined.

MR. HARRINGTON: No; he was not cross-examined.

MR. GORST: He was not sworn, and, therefore, he could not be cross-examined.

MR. TREVELYAN: He was produced, and the prisoners' counsel certainly put questions to him.

MR. HARRINGTON: If the right hon. Gentleman will refer to the trial, he will find that the prisoners' counsel did not ask the boy a question. He was asked by the Crown counsel whether he knew the nature of an oath.

MR. TREVELYAN: The only object of producing the boy was that, if possible, the prisoners' counsel might cross-examine him; but the prisoners' counsel did not think it necessary to do so, probably for the same reason that occurred to the Correspondent of The Freeman's Journal as early as August, 1882, when he stated that in regard to the men's faces being blackened, the Irish-speaking witnesses used a word which, literally interpreted, meant "dirty," but did not mean to indicate that they were otherwise disguised. Possibly they may have put crape over their faces; or there is a much more tenable theory—that, at that hour of the night, the poor boys, being suddenly awakened out of their sleep, and almost immediately disabled by terrible blows, might very well, by the miserable light of the cabin, have thought that these murderous ruffians who were committing this deed had blackened faces. The counsel for the defence put so little stress upon that point that he made no use of it in the evidence that could outweigh the statements of the informers—perjured murderers as they might be—or the evidence of the independent witnesses. I hope the House of Commons will arrive at the same conclusion as the juries. It is not difficult to look for motives which might induce informers to turn their backs on their former evidence. It is only too evident that the life of a man who has given information about agrarian murder is one which men, and especially bad men, would do a great deal to escape from. The hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) himself has given a very curious illustration of what the motives may be that would weigh with men of that sort by a Question which he himself put last Session in the House of Commons. I will read the Question, although I presume that the hon. Member knows it by heart. The hon. Member asked—

"Whether it is a fact that Cole, the informer, examined in the recent Barbavilla conspiracy case, has been pardoned; has the Government in this case departed from the usual practice of requiring an informer to leave the country; have the Executive received a Memorial from the Catholic clergymen of the district in which Cole resided, stating their opinion that it would be dangerous to the public peace that he should come to reside in that locality; whether it is the fact that he has come to reside there; and, will he state whether the district or the county is to be charged for the extra police kept for his protection?"—[3 Hansard, [290] 1732.]

Here we have the clergy of a district making a statement which, I presume, was understood by the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington), that the life of this miserable man, who had given evidence as an accomplice in an agrarian murder, was in such fearful danger that it was necessary to protect him by a police force stationed in the vicinity; and hon. Members tell us that these men would be in more danger now that they have turned back on their former evidence. The House will be slow to believe that Cole and Casey imagined that they would be in more danger than when they had to be protected by a large force from the anger of their neighbours. The life of such men is, indeed, a miserable one—God knows, in the case of the two men I have described, and certainly in the case of Cole—a life of deserved misery. But it is so miserable a life that a man would do almost anything to escape from it, even though we were not to attribute as the motive which induced Casey to go to Mr. Stokes the profit he might get by becoming informer. I have now, I believe, gone through this case completely. I think the points are very much fewer than hon. Members who have been listening to the debate to-night may have supposed. The case has been brought forward with singular ability; but against the deductions which have been drawn from the facts by hon. Members opposite I feel bound to make the very strongest protest. The hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) tells us that murder is now legalized throughout Ireland; and the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), using words which, perhaps, shocked me, who have read the writings and witnessed the caricatures which have been prevalent for so many months, less even than they may have shocked other hon. Members, told me that my pillow would be haunted by the ghost of Myles Joyce. I have seen Earl Spencer and myself portrayed in the shop windows as rejoicing in the death and murder of innocent men on the scaffold, looking on at unfortunate men suspended by the neck from the gallows. I cannot but turn for a certain amount of consolation to a paper which lies before me at this moment. That paper is to this effect. Since the day when the last undoubted execution for agrarian crime was carried into effect, up to the time when Francis Hynes suffered in the Government of Earl Spencer, there were 61 agrarian murders undetected and unpunished. That is the case of the Irish Government when they are asked if they are indifferent to the lives of the peasantry of Ireland. Who were these men whose lives are at this moment in question but the peasantry? What earthly motive could we have in hanging one peasant more than another for the murder of another peasant? Well, up to that time there were 61 undetected agrarian murders, and up to the end of the year 1882 there were something like 80 murders of that sort. They began then to be detected, and in the year 1883 there were only two such murders, while in the first nine months of the year 1884 there has not been a single murder entered upon the list as an agrarian murder. That consideration is a consolation to me for anything that may be said against the action of the Irish Government. I deeply regret if, in our action, any mistakes have been made.

MR. HEALY: Kilmartin.

MR. TREVELYAN: If there was a mistake in the case of Kilmartin—

Several Irish MEMBERS: There was. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. HEALY: Why did you let him out?

MR. SPEAKER: I must request hon. Members not to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman. I have had, before this evening, to call attention to these repeated interruptions, which are unjustifiable on the part of any hon. Member, and I hope they will not be continued.

MR. TREVELYAN: I am glad to have an opportunity of saying a word about the Kilmartin case. If His Excellency erred at all in that case, he erred on the right side. In the last paragraph of his letter it is stated—

“His Excellency has determined to release Kilmartin. He does so without impeaching the correctness of the original conviction, or the bona fides of Hernon; but, subsequent information having created some doubt as to the identification of Kilmartin, His Excellency feels himself enabled to exercise the Prerogative of mercy on Kilmartin's behalf.”

Hon. Members will see that there were two cardinal differences between the statements. The very important subsequent information which was received would, if it could have been produced at the trial, have ended in the acquittal of Kilmartin. Unfortunately, that information was not forthcoming. Under the circumstances I have referred to, as Earl Spencer stated two years ago, he had no choice except to allow the law to be carried out. And I cannot think he would be now justified in recommending Her Majesty's Government to grant the inquiry asked for by the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington), which could only end in this random statement of Casey's being put forward, and perhaps another statement sworn to at variance with that, together with a statement of innocence by the men who are in penal servitude. If hon. Members think that such an inquiry would not shake justice to its foundations, I am bound to say that I must disagree with them. It would undoubtedly have that effect, and, therefore, the Irish Government are of opinion that the inquiry should not be granted, in which opinion they are supported by the whole body of their officers.

Motion made, and Question, “That the Debate be now adjourned,”—(Mr. Parnell,)—put, and agreed to.

MOTION FOR LEAVE.

MR. GLADSTONE: Mr. Speaker—Sir, I am not surprised at the unoccupied condition of the opposite Bench, which, I think, is quite warranted by the nature of the announcement I made to the House that I had no intention on the present occasion of troubling it with a speech. The reason why that announcement was made will, I believe, be perfectly plain to those who heard it. Last Session I had the opportunity, on various stages of the Bill, but especially on its introduction, of stating at great length the considerations which had led Her Majesty's Government to make the proposals which it contained. But all the arguments then used, and all the facts then adduced, are applicable with increased force to the present occasion; and I think I should be abusing the patience of the House if I were to attempt again to present them even in the most condensed form. I even hope that the debates upon this Bill may not extend to any very great length. At the same time, I am perfectly sensible that, in asking the House for leave to introduce the Bill, the summary manner in which I hope it will be disposed of on the present occasion cannot be taken as any measure of the discussion that may hereafter arise. The introduction of a Bill, when its nature is well understood by the House, is very commonly permitted to take place without discussion, which is reserved to later stages. With regard to those later stages, I have already announced to the House the intention of the Government to lose no time. They believe it to be their duty to the House and the country to press the Bill through its several stages with due regard to the convenience of hon. Members and the sufficiency of opportunities for discussion. It would not be proper for me, although I hope it will be admitted that the present hour is one perfectly appropriate to the purpose for which I rise, to bring this Bill for a second time under the consideration of the House, except at a time entirely convenient to the House. I am given to understand that the discussions connected with the Address are likely to occupy both Monday and Tuesday next; and it has been stated, I believe, by Gentlemen on the opposite side that it would be for the convenience of hon. Members if it were understood that the debate on the second reading would not be taken until Thursday. Sir, it is, I own, with regret that I lose even Wednesday, when I consider that the loss of that day adds to the length of this unusual, and, of course, to all, inconvenient Session. At the same time, I should be very unwilling to commence our operations by anything like a churlish course of procedure. I am therefore prepared to agree to that proposal, trusting, and I will say believing, that there will not be in any quarter of the House a disposition to give other than the fairest treatment to the measure now to be submitted. Sir, having said these few words, I have only to conclude with the Motion of which I have given Notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to the Representation of the People of the United Kingdom."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR) said, he did not wish to trouble the House with any remarks on this measure at that time, as he should have opportunities of speaking on the Bill on its later stages. But he was in this position—that he held an office out of the House, which made him feel that he ought not to avail himself of the opportunities of addressing meetings on this great question which many of his hon. Friends enjoyed. He wished to state that when Mr. Speaker put the Question he should say "No" to it. At the time when the Question of the third reading of the Representation of the People Bill was put last Session, which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister stated was agreed to nemine contradicente, he was hastening down to the House determined, if no one else did, to say "No" to the Question. The Prime Minister had stated that the negative of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) was given inaudibly; but he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would do him the justice of believing that had he been present he would have said "No" in a voice loud enough to have reached the Chair. He wished, as a humble individual, to put it on record that this Bill was not brought in with his approval.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Sir, I beg to give Notice that, on the Motion being made for the second reading of the Bill, I shall move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, any measure purporting to provide for the better Representation of the People in Parliament must be accompanied by provisions for a proper arrangement of electoral areas."

MR. RAIKES said, he quite agreed that this was not an occasion for entering into debate on the Motion which the Prime Minister had made; but he must take exception to what the right hon. Gentleman also said—namely, that it was not an unusual or inconvenient time for introducing a measure of this kind. It appeared to him that, in a Session specially convoked for discussing this measure, it would have been more in accordance with the importance of the subject if the Motion had been made when the House commenced Business. He ventured to make his humble protest against the course taken by the Government in bringing it forward at 20 minutes past 12 o'clock. He would also express regret that the Prime Minister had not taken that opportunity of throwing any light upon certain remarkable disclosures which, within the last few days, had found their way into the public Press in connection with the measure of Redistribution. It was to have been hoped that the House would have had that night from Her Majesty's Government some further outline of their intentions with regard to that important question; and he, at all events, could only read in the silence of the right hon. Gentleman an additional confirmation of that attitude of non possumus which he had taken up with regard to this question in declining to satisfy the legitimate curiosity of the people.

MR. HEALY said, he trusted that the Government would give more opportunity than last year, during the passage of the Bill, for the consideration of certain Amendments which hon. Members on those Benches had to move in reference to votes for the tenure of land. If it was the intention to send the Bill to the House of Lords in the same way as it was sent last Session, he was convinced that it would lead to a considerable loss of time.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister whether this was the Bill as introduced last Session, or as it left the House?

MR. GLADSTONE was understood to signify that it was the Bill as it left the House.

Motion agreed to.

BILL.

On Motion of Mr. ARTHUR ELLIOT, Bill to extend the Hours of Polling at Parliamentary Elections in Counties, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ARTHUR ELLIOT, Mr. GREY, Mr. STAFFORD HOWARD, and Mr. COCHRAN-PATRICK.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 19.]

House adjourned at a quarter before One o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 27th October, 1884.

MINUTES.]—NEW WRIT ISSUED—For South Warwickshire, v. the Hon. Gilbert Henry Chandos Leigh, deceased.

QUESTIONS.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND)
ACT, 1882.—MR. JOSEPH R. COX.

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether he has made the inquiries he promised last Session with regard to the following circular:—

"Joseph R. Cox. Midland Division, Crime Department, Mullingar, 24th June 1884. Mr. Jenkinson wishes to have the movements of the above-named watched, noted everywhere. Annexed is his description. By Order (signed), M. Jacques, D.I.C.S. Joseph R. Cox, Secretary to the Lord Mayor, 97, Stephen's Green, Dublin, five feet ten inches, thirty-three years, rather stout, sandy hair, regular nose and mouth, fair complexion, round visage, small whiskers under ears; native of Kilmore, county Roscommon, wears glasses, dresses well, wears a silk hat; was arrested under Peace Preservation Act. He was an organiser of the late Land League. His principal associates are leading Nationalists;"

and, what the results of his inquiries have been?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): No circular was issued or intended by Mr. Jenkinson. The communication mentioned in the Question was issued under some misapprehension from the office of the Divisional Magistrate, Mullingar, to County Inspectors there. It was in all respects confidential.

MR. HEALY asked, would the hon. and learned Gentleman state whether Mr. Jenkinson had given the direction? He was not asked whether his name was in the circular or not. He was asked whether the circular in question was an authentic one or not?

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY said, that in consequence of the unsatisfactory answer of the Solicitor General for Ireland, he would call attention to the matter at the earliest opportunity.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—“MR. GEORGE BOLTON v. ‘UNITED IRELAND.’”

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Is it the fact that Mr. George Bolton was granted the use of the official file of United Ireland, kept by or under the control of the police authorities in Dublin Castle, while Bolton's action against the proprietors of that paper was pending; if so, who is responsible; and, why was the permission revoked?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): Mr. Bolton was allowed on one occasion to examine the back numbers of United Ireland, filed in the office of the Dublin Metropolitan Police; but the Commissioner, understanding that the object of Mr. Bolton might be or was to use the information for the purpose of a private action, informed Mr. Bolton he could not have the use of any official copy for such purpose. The whole circumstance did not occupy more than half-an-hour.

MR. O'BRIEN: Can the hon. and learned Gentleman state whether Mr. Bolton had access to the official file after that?

ARREARS OF RENT (IRELAND) ACT, 1882—DR. DAVIES, J.P.

MR. BIGGAR asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether he has ordered a criminal prosecution of Dr. Davies, J.P., on a charge of perjury and fraud alleged to have been committed under “The Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1882;” and, if not, does he intend to order such prosecution?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): This case has been carefully considered by the Attorney General; and he has come to the conclusion that Dr. Davies and his tenant, who was in all respects equally culpable with Dr. Davies, may have thought they were legally justified in doing what they did, and that a prosecution would not be advisable. Dr. Davies has since become a bankrupt, and has been removed by the Lord Chancellor from the Commission of the Peace.

NAVY—SHIPBUILDING—REPORT OF THE DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the Board have taken any steps with respect to the Report of the Committee, presided over by Lord Ravensworth, on the Building of Ships in Dockyards or Private Establishments; and, whether he can state to the House what course the Government intend to pursue in this matter?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: The Report of the Committee on the building and repair of Her Majesty's ships will be in the hands of hon. Members immediately. A Departmental Committee was appointed to advise as to the practical steps to be taken, and their Report has only been received this day. It must require careful consideration; and I can only say in the meanwhile, on behalf of the Admiralty, that we are grateful to Lord Ravensworth and his Colleagues for their labours and their suggestions.

NAVY—WARRANT OFFICERS.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the Board propose to take any further steps to comply with the application of the Warrant Officers of the Navy for the amelioration of their present position?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: Considerable concessions have been made of late in the case of the warrant officers of the Navy. All such officers serving in harbour ships with appointments from the Admiralty are now granted pay at seagoing instead of harbour rates. Numerous additional Greenwich pensions have been provided. The grant of compassionate allowances to the children of warrant officers whose deaths are attributable to the Service is under consideration.

BUILDING SOCIETIES—FAILURES—A GOVERNMENT AUDIT.

MR. STEWART MACLIVER asked the President of the Board of Trade, If his attention has been called to several failures of Building Societies, after an eminent London actuary had certified to their solvency; and, whether he will consider whether a Government audit might be applied in order to protect the public from such disasters?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I think this Question would have been better put to the Home Secretary, because the Registrar of Friendly Societies is under the Department of the Home Office; but if he wishes for my personal opinion, I am bound to say that, as at present advised, I do not think it desirable to extend Government interference further than at present. So far as I know at present, the Government does not interfere to protect investments, and I doubt whether it would be wise to incur the responsibility in regard to these societies.

ROYAL NAVAL ARTILLERY VOLUNTEERS.

MR. STEWART MACLIVER asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, If a decision has yet been arrived at respecting the applications for Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers to be enrolled at Plymouth and other places?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: The decision with reference to applications for the enrolment of Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers has been postponed until a general scheme of defence has been matured, based upon the Report of the Committee on the Defence of the Commercial Harbours. The Admiralty are not at present prepared to entertain the question of increasing the Force.

INDIA—THE QUETTA-CANDAHAR RAILWAY.

MR. AGNEW asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he can state the facts respecting the taking up of rails on the Quetta Railway, referred to by the Right honourable Member for South West Lancashire and the honourable Member for Mid-Lincoln, in the following extracts:—

“When the Conservatives were in office they were ever on that look-out, and they saw an opportunity for a great market for British goods, if they could only carry Railway communication further into the north of India. For commercial as well as for strategical purposes they laid down a Railway in that part of the country; and the Conservatives believed that if that Railway had been allowed to remain and had been extended, as they had provided it should be, there would have been now a large market for our produce in that part of the world, which would have tended very much to our benefit. The Government had now been in office four years, and had been obliged, to use a common phrase, to eat humble pie; and now they had begun to lay down the very rails which they had torn up, and of which they might have had the benefit years ago.”—(Manchester Courier, 20th October 1884.)

“In reply Mr. Stanhope wrote: ‘The Quetta Line was completed from the Indus to Sibi. This part was never touched, and is still working. Preparations were made for carrying it on to Quetta and Kandahar. The surveys were made, the earthwork was done, and some few miles of Railway were undoubtedly laid. The present Government abandoned all the line beyond Sibi, took up such of the rails as were laid and were on the spot, and conveyed them elsewhere.’”—(Bolton Chronicle, 18th October 1884.)

“He wrote to Sir R. A. Cross. He held in his hands that gentleman’s reply, dated 9th October 1884, in which were the following words: ‘You are right about the Quetta Line, which was laid down and pulled up.’”—(Bolton Chronicle, 18th October 1884.)

MR. J. K. CROSS: Before answering this Question, it would only be common courtesy to ask my right hon. Friend whether he admits the accuracy of the quotation, for certainly none will be more astonished at the report than the Colleagues of the right hon. Gentleman?

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: As to the first extract, I believe it is correct. I know nothing about the others.

MR. J. K. CROSS: I am quite aware that the British public has for some time been possessed of the delusion that a wicked Liberal Government did take up a railway in India which a good Conservative Government had laid down. The facts of the case are correctly stated in the extract from the letter of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire, except in the following important particulars:—The surveys which he described as made were not completed even to Quetta. As to the earthworks, which he describes as being to a considerable extent done, some were partially constructed; but in most cases they were not even begun. And the rails which were laid from Sibi to the foot of the Bolan Pass, and also to the foot of the Nari Gorge, some of which my hon. Friend says were taken up, are still there and still in use. My right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Lancashire seems to be under the impression that the railway was completed to Quetta and destroyed by the present Government. But no permanent way had been placed upon the earthworks north of the Nari Gorge; there was, therefore, no opportunity of pulling up the rails, as they had not been laid down.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: I should like to ask the hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been called to the despatch of Mr. Rivers Thompson, which appeared in the Afghan Papers of 1881, from which I will read an extract, and in which he protests against the action of the Government. He says—

"But perhaps the most grievous and humiliating part of the order in this connection is that which affects not only the stoppage of the railway works now under construction, but the dismantling of the rails and the destruction of the earthworks already completed a considerable distance towards Quetta. This wilful and deliberate surrender of advantages gained after a vast expenditure of time and thought and money, and which would subserve peaceful administration much more than it would supply military requirements, is absolutely beyond the comprehension of any Native in the country."

MR. J. K. CROSS: If the right hon. Gentleman will give the date of the Paper I shall be glad to inquire into the matter. I find that there is no very definite information as to the pulling up of the rails at the India Office. I have, however, referred to Major General Trevor, Director General of Railways under the late Government, who is now in England, as to what are the facts of the case. Major General Trevor called upon me on Saturday morning last, and gave me the information as I have placed it before the House. He will be very glad to answer any question which any hon. Member may put to him; and as he was Director General of Railways in India up to the end of March, 1881, I should think that his evidence may be taken as being quite satisfactory on this point.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: I will give the hon. Member the information he wants. The Minute of Mr. Rivers Thompson is to be found in Afghan Paper No. 3, 1881; and he will find there also another Minute to the same effect by Mr. Gibbs deploring the giving up of the railway.

MR. E. STANHOPE: Whilst having the greatest possible respect for Colonel Trevor, I should like to ask whether the Government will lay upon the Table the Report of some official of the Indian Government who saw the works, and who was connected with the works at the time the present Government came into power?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The greater part of those works were carried on after the present Government came into Office, and there was no question of giving them up until after the Battle of Maiwand, when the troops which were protecting the works were withdrawn. I shall be glad to lay any Papers on the subject on the Table.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Is it not a fact that if the policy of the late Government on the Indian Frontier had not been reversed the railway to Candahar would have been completed two years ago?

MR. J. K. CROSS: I am afraid I cannot answer any Question as to the policy of the late Government.

AFRICA (SOUTH)—BECHUANALAND— MURDER OF MR. BETHELL.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the brutal murder of Mr. Christopher Bethell, Acting Chief of Frontier Police, by the Boers, near the border of Bechuanaland, on July 31st; and, whether Her Majesty's Government have demanded reparation for the murder of this gallant British officer, and the surrender of his murderers to justice?

MR. GUY DAWNAY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Colonial Office has received any details of the murder of Mr. C. Bethell in Bechuanaland; whether Mr. Bethell had been appointed by Mr. Mackenzie, Commandant of the Frontier Mounted Police, and was acting in that capacity at the time he was murdered in cold blood by Boers; and, whether Her Majesty's Government have taken any, and if so what, steps in the matter?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Yes, Sir. We have received a despatch from Mr. Wright, the Resident Commissioner, giving an account of the sad death of Mr. Bethell, and it will appear among the Papers which will be laid on the Table of the House in a few days. It appears that the murder was a very brutal act, that Mr. Bethell was shot by two Boers as he lay wounded on the field of combat. But whatever the legal aspect of the case may be, which is complicated by the fact that the murder took place neither on Transvaal territory nor on British territory, still the Government thought it was a case of which they should take serious notice. Therefore, we have telegraphed to Sir Hercules Robinson to the effect that, as Mr. Wright named one of the Boers who shot Mr. Bethell, and says that the other name was no secret, every effort should be made to bring the murderers to justice, and asking Sir Hercules Robinson what course he would advise.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I should like to ask a Question arising out of this answer of the hon. Gentleman. I observed not long ago a statement which appeared to have foundation—namely, that Mr. Wright, to whose despatch he referred, went to the Boers and was detained by them as a prisoner.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Mr. Wright was induced to come into the hands of the Boers by a flag of truce, and then he was told that he was retained for his own safety. He is no longer in the hands of the Boers; he is free, and therefore no steps have been taken.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND: What was the date of the Government's instructions to Sir Hercules Robinson? Will those instructions appear in the Papers, and when are they likely to be presented?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: The date of the telegram to Sir Hercules Robinson is to-day. It is only three or four days ago that we received the despatch from Mr. Wright, giving an account of the death of Mr. Bethell. As to the Papers, one portion of them will be delivered to-morrow, and the second portion will be delivered in the course of the week.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I wish to ask the hon. Gentleman whether Mr. Wright's despatch is the only one that has been received?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Yes, Sir; I believe I am correct in saying that Mr. Wright's is the only official despatch we have received.

MR. GUY DAWNAY: Will the hon. Gentleman answer the second part of my Question—namely, whether Mr. Bethell had been appointed by Mr. Mackenzie Commandant of the Frontier Mounted Police, and was acting in that capacity at the time he was murdered in cold blood by the Boers?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Yes, Sir; he was appointed by Mr. Mackenzie.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER: As representing the family of Mr. Bethell, I beg to give Notice that it is my intention to go more fully into the subject of

Mr. Bethell's murder before the close of the debate on the Address.

MR. CREYKE: Considering it is now three months since the murder took place, and considering that it was perfectly well known in this country for nearly the whole of that time, it is strange that the Government has only thought it necessary to telegraph to-day on the subject.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: We sent out to ask for official information with reference to what we had seen in the newspapers. We only received that official information, as I have just now stated, and speaking from memory, four days ago, and we have telegraphed to-day.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: May I ask whether it is the intention of the Government to send Sir Charles Warren to Bechuanaland without any military force from England; and, if so, what precaution has been taken to insure his personal safety; and, whether Sir Charles Warren will be placed under the orders of Sir Hercules Robinson, or whether he will hold an independent position similar to that of General Gordon?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: There is only one part of that Question I can answer without Notice, and that is the first part. Sir Charles Warren will not be sent out to that country without any military force to support him.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY: What is the date of the Government despatch to which Mr. Wright's Report was an answer?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: I really cannot answer these Questions as to date without Notice. The average time required would be five or six weeks to go, and five or six weeks to come back.

NEW ZEALAND—TREATY OF WAITANGI—THE MAORI CHIEFS.

MR. GORST asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, What steps have been taken by Her Majesty's Government to verify the statements made in the Memorial of the Maori Chiefs recently in this Country, as to alleged violations of the Treaty of Waitangi; whether any communications have been made to or received from the Colonial Government of New Zealand on the subject; and, whether such communications can be laid upon the Table?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: In reply to my hon. and learned Friend, I have to say that the Memorial of the Maori Chiefs was sent off to the Governor of New Zealand in August last, and the observations of the Colonial Government were invited upon it. No answer has yet or could yet have been received. As soon as the expected reply arrives, Papers on the subject will be laid on the Table.

EGYPT—EXPENDITURE.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will either state to the House, or present in a Return to the House, the amount of all moneys expended (inclusive of the value of stores, military or otherwise) in or on Egypt, which have been paid, or which are to be paid, by this Country, from January 1st 1878, until the recent arrival of Lord Wolseley in Egypt?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): My hon. Friend's Question presents some difficulty, and it would be necessary to confer with several Departments. If he will put it again next week, I hope to give him an answer.

HONG KONG—ENFORCED LABOUR.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If information has been received of a riot at Hong Kong, consequent upon the compulsory employment of Chinese labour to coal French ships employed in hostilities with China; and, whether directions will be sent to the authorities at Hong Kong and Singapore to refrain from enforcing any contract to labour which may have been entered into by our Chinese fellow-subjects, who from patriotic reasons may reasonably object to such employment?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: We received from the Governor of Hong Kong, on the 6th of October, a telegram in which he informed us that there had been a strike of boatmen and labourers—that 100 soldiers had been quartered for four days in the Tung Wah Hospital to support the police, but that they were not required to act; that one Chinese had been killed and five Sikh constables wounded. We asked by telegram whether the Chinese labourers had been compelled to work on board French ships. In reply we were informed that several persons had been fined for refusing to work for the Messageries Maritimes; but that no work had been performed for other French ships. We telegraphed to ask the Governor under what law these labourers were fined; but no reply has yet been received. I must therefore ask the hon. Baronet to wait a few days for the answer to the second Question. I may add that on the 3rd of September the Governor notified to the French Admiral Lespes that the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act must be carried out; and Admiral Lespes, in reply, gave an assurance that they would be fully respected by French ships.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked whether, when hostilities were being carried on between two other Powers, without a declaration of war, if this country supplied munitions for such hostilities to one of the belligerents, we might not be held responsible for such a proceeding?

COLONIAL DEFENCES—REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION OF 1882.

MR. M'COAN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If and when the unpublished Report of the Royal Commission on the Defence of British Possessions and Commerce Abroad, which was presented in July 1882, and on which the Inspector of Fortifications has based his Memorandum, will be laid before Parliament?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: I can only refer the hon. Member to an answer which I gave on the 6th of April, 1883, to a similar Question, when I stated that the Report on the Colonial Defences was strictly confidential, and could not be laid on the Table of the House.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—TEACHERS IN BOARD SCHOOLS.

MR. ILLINGWORTH asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether he is aware that the following advertisement appeared in The School Board Chronicle of the 27th September last:—

“North Mundham, Hunstan, and Merston U. D. School Board. Wanted an Assistant Mistress. Churchwoman. Salary £35 per annum. Apply, with testimonials, to Oliver

Lloyd, Clerk to the Board, West Street, Chichester ;”

and, whether he will take any steps to prevent the disqualification of Nonconformists as teachers in Board Schools by the imposition of ecclesiastical tests ?

MR. MUNDELLA : My attention had not been called to the advertisement in question until my hon. Friend placed his Notice on the Paper. I find that counsel's opinion was taken on this point in 1876, and that he advised that the Act of 1870 gave the Department no power to interfere. Such an advertisement appears to me to savour of intolerance, and is entirely foreign to the spirit and intention of the Act. I am, however, glad to say that it is the only case of the kind brought before me during the last four years, and I hope it is one which will not recur. I think hon. Members will see how unfair and inconvenient it would be for School Boards with alternating majorities of Churchmen and Nonconformists to restrict their choice of teachers to those of their own religious faith, and to introduce considerations which are alien to the purposes of the Education Act.

THE EXPEDITIONARY FORCE (EGYPT) —ARMY CHAPLAINS.

MR. BUCHANAN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether there is a Presbyterian chaplain attached to the Black Watch at present in Upper Egypt ; and, if not, whether, considering the large number of Scottish soldiers in that and the other regiments under Lord Wolseley's command, he will issue instructions that a Presbyterian chaplain be sent without delay to join the expeditionary force ?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON : I am aware of the great interest which is taken in this subject in Scotland, and I have communicated with Lord Wolseley upon it. I have not, however, received any reply to the letter. So far as the War Office is concerned, all the Presbyterian chaplains who were considered necessary by the General Officer commanding the troops in Egypt have been sent. I have also authorized the employment of another Presbyterian clergyman, who is available at Alexandria, which would set free an additional chaplain to proceed with the Expedition if his services are required.

INDIA—BOMBAY CIVIL SERVICE.

MR. GIBSON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Is it the fact that 54, or more than one-third of the entire Bombay Civil Service, occupy the three years 1867-70 ; and, if so, what steps does he intend to take to get rid of the superfluous men or their discontented juniors ?

MR. J. K. CROSS : No, Sir ; it is not the fact that 54, or more than one-third of the entire Bombay Civil Service, occupy the three years 1867-70. There are 160 men—including five statutory civilians—in the Bombay Civil Service. Of these, 48 were appointed in the four years, 1867-70, inclusive. A Memorial was received last year from a civilian, appointed in 1869, complaining of slowness of promotion, and praying that he might be allowed to retire on a special pension. In forwarding this Memorial, the Bombay Government said that, “ while conscious that at present there was an unfortunate block in one part of the Service,” they did not consider it expedient to induce special retirements by the grant of proportionate pensions. The Secretary of State refused the application, seeing no reason for dealing with it in an exceptional manner.

BOARD OF TRADE (RAILWAYS)—POLITICAL DEMONSTRATIONS AT RAILWAY STATIONS.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, in view of the statement made by the First Lord of the Treasury as to the condition of Preston Railway Station when the First Lord of the Treasury was recently passing through that town, he will communicate with the Railway authorities as to the advisability of preventing in the future political demonstrations at Railway stations ?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN : The Board of Trade have no authority or control whatever over the arrangements which may be made for preserving order at railway stations. They have had no complaints addressed to them, and they have no reason to believe that the Railway Companies are either unable or unwilling to protect the public from danger ; and, under these circumstances, I do not think it would be right to propose legislation giving further authority to the Board of Trade.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman make inquiries into the case of the Glasgow Railway Station, where there was undoubted danger from the great crowd? Will he also allow me to place him in possession of several letters which I have received from members of the travelling public complaining of the inconvenience and danger they were subjected to at Preston?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: If the noble Lord has any evidence and will place it at my disposal, I will gladly take it into consideration.

LABOURERS (IRELAND)—REAPPOINTMENT OF THE COMMITTEE.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will take steps for the immediate re-appointment of the Committee on the operation of "The Labourers (Ireland) Act, 1884?"

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, that the Committee last year, in reporting the evidence it had taken, recommended its own re-appointment. The re-appointment of the Committee did not rest with the Chief Secretary; but the desire expressed on the subject would be communicated to the Prime Minister in order to ascertain whether Committee Business would be taken this Session.

POST OFFICE—MAIL SERVICE IN THE WEST OF IRELAND.

COLONEL NOLAN asked the Postmaster General, If, considering the very unsatisfactory state of the Mail Service to the West of Ireland, he could arrange to run a train leaving Dublin at 8 a.m., reaching Galway in three hours and a-half, and stopping at Mullingar, Athlone, Ballinasloe, and Athenry only?

MR. FAWCETT: I can assure the hon. Member and others who are interested in the question of accelerating the mails to Galway and Sligo and the West of Ireland generally, that it has not been lost sight of by the Department. Negotiations are now proceeding, and directly I am in a position to come to a decision I will make it known to the hon. Members who are interested in the locality.

POST OFFICE—POST CARDS—PURCHASE OF MATERIAL FROM ABROAD.

MR. GIBSON, who had given Notice of the following Question:—

"To ask the Postmaster General, if it is a fact that the Post Office Department has recently given a large contract for the supply of English post cards in Germany?"

intimated that in consequence of the Postmaster General's letter, which had appeared in the morning papers, he would not put the Question.

MR. COLERIDGE KENNARD, who had on the Paper the following Question:—

"To ask the Postmaster General, whether he will inform the House as to the name of the German firm with whom Her Majesty's Government have contracted for the supply of the postal cards hitherto manufactured by British traders; and if he will name the various firms who competed for the Governmental order?"

asked permission to substitute a Question to the effect—Were they to conclude from the Postmaster General's letter that the opinion of the Government was that British workmen were not damaged, but positively benefited, by the purchase of commodities abroad?

MR. SPEAKER: That is a Question entirely of an argumentative character, and is, therefore, irregular.

TRADE AND COMMERCE—DISTRESS IN THE SHIPBUILDING TRADE.

MR. GOURLEY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he is aware that thousands of workmen connected with the Shipping industry have for several months been without employment on the Wear, Tyne, Clyde, and other shipbuilding ports, and that large numbers with their families are now in a condition of semi-starvation; whether, as in the case of Irish distress and Indian famines, he will endeavour to devise some system of Imperial relief; if he is aware that in this year's Navy Estimates authority was taken to build additional ships of the Mersay class which has not yet been begun; and, whether he will endeavour to arrange with the Treasury and Admiralty that ships of the Mersay and other designs may be built on the Wear and other rivers, allowing the builders a reasonable commission as remuneration over and above the actual cost?

MR. T. RICHARDSON inquired whether the Prime Minister was aware that distress in the same trade existed at Hartlepool and on the Tees?

MR. MAC IVER asked if the right hon. Gentleman was also aware that there were a great many people out of employment at Liverpool and Birkenhead, through no fault of their own, and that no less than 5,000 summonses for non-payment of rates had been taken out at Liverpool alone; whether the right hon. Gentleman would suggest some measure for the relief of the distress, and give precedence to the consideration of that subject over further debate on the Franchise Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I am aware, as the public are aware, of the great distress which exists to a very considerable extent in the shipping trades at the various points to which reference has been made, and in regard to Birkenhead particularly, because, having been on the spot where it prevails at a very recent date, I have had an opportunity of knowing, from personal investigation, that it is severe. But as to the Question—and as to the corresponding Question put by the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver), I have to say that I do not consider that the precedents of Irish distress and Indian famines are applicable to periods of depression in the trades of the United Kingdom. And I must say that I cannot help regretting that Members of Parliament should feel themselves compelled by their sense of duty to suggest in regard to their different neighbourhoods that when they are in distress from any want of employment, it is the duty of the Government to provide a means of supplying that employment. Every Question put in this House comes with a certain authority, and consequently we have to regard the expectations which are raised, and to consider whether the addressing of such Questions to Ministers is beneficial to the community or not. I think they are not; and I am bound to say, as to the case of Sunderland, I have had communications suggesting that to raise any questions of this kind in regard to Sunderland would, at the present time, be particularly inexpedient. With respect to the other part of the Question of my hon. Friend, as to building ships on the Wear, the Tyne, the Clyde, and other ports, that is a matter on which it would be quite contrary to the principle on which the duties of the different Departments are distributed were the Treasury to interfere. If it is thought that ships can be built there advantageously, I have no doubt that my hon. Friend is well qualified to carry on communications with the Admiralty on the subject. But for the Treasury to undertake to direct the Admiralty to build its ships in this place or in that place would be practically mischievous; it would be inverting the relative positions of the Departments, and would introduce great confusion into the conduct of Public Business.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— RELIEF OF GENERAL GORDON.

MR. ONSLOW asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in the happy event of the relief of General Gordon by Lord Wolseley, the former officer, as Governor General of the Soudan, will be in supreme authority, or whether Lord Wolseley, as Commander in Chief in the Soudan, is to be allowed to dictate orders to General Gordon what he is to do or not to do? The hon. Member also asked whether it was still the opinion of the Government that their whole hope of the solution of the question of the relief of the Soudan garrisons depended on the fate of General Gordon?

MR. GLADSTONE: The addition which the hon. Member has made to his Question is really a matter that can only be answered in detail in discussion, and is not a matter for a Question and an answer Aye or No. As to the hope which he suggests that General Gordon is likely to be relieved by Lord Wolseley, the hope of that happy event the Government entirely shares with the hon. Gentleman. And if that should be the case, and if Lord Wolseley should be brought into contact with General Gordon—at present he has not been so brought—the Government will be responsible for providing that all the instructions which may be necessary and useful to regulate the relations of those distinguished persons shall be applicable to the case. The Question is of a hypothetical character, and at present it would be premature to enter upon it. It may, however, be recollected that Lord Wolseley is the General Officer commanding Her Majesty's Forces in Egypt, and in that capacity is General Gordon's military superior, so that, as a matter of course, certain relations between General Gordon and Lord Wolseley would arise by the Rules of the Service.

MR. ONSLOW: General Gordon was not only appointed Commander-in-Chief, but was appointed by the Khedive as Governor General of the Soudan. What I want to know is whether Lord Wolseley will supersede him?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think that the way in which this question arises shows how very premature it is to enter upon the consideration of circumstances which have not arisen. We shall be responsible for the due regulation of these matters. To the direct portion of the Question I have already replied, and I am perfectly aware that the Khedive has appointed General Gordon to that office in the Soudan; but I do not apprehend that that appointment by the Khedive can have any operation or effect whatever upon the Rules which regulate Her Majesty's Government.

MR. BOURKE: Can Her Majesty's Government give the House any information as to the fate of Colonel Stewart?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I very much regret to state that the Government received yesterday a telegram through Lord Wolseley, which is almost similar in purport to that which appears in the public newspapers. I am afraid there can be little doubt that Colonel Stewart was among the party which was wrecked in the steamer on the Nile, and which, apparently, with two exceptions, has been massacred. I am sure that the House, on hearing this communication, will share with Her Majesty's Government in the regret with which we received this information, as well as in the great admiration which Her Majesty's Government feel at the gallant conduct of Colonel Stewart in sharing the dangers of General Gordon's mission, and also, as far as intelligence leads us to believe, their admiration for the manner in which he has discharged the duties in connection with that mission.

MR. M'COAN asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the actual Report of Lord Northbrook on his mission to Egypt, or only "the result of its consideration" by the Cabinet, will be communicated to Parliament?

MR. GLADSTONE: With regard to Lord Northbrook's Report, it would be premature to express any opinion. It is a rule, and a salutary rule, that the Government does not state its intention to produce Papers of this kind until it has seen them.

PARLIAMENT — ORDER—UNCOVERING OF MEMBERS TO ROYAL MESSAGES.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): I request permission, Mr. Speaker, to ask you a Question on a point of Order, in which a good many others besides myself are interested. When you, Sir, commenced, on Thursday last, to read Her Majesty's Gracious Speech, I happened to have my hat on, and I did not remove it, but remained covered. The suggestion has been made that I did not act properly in that respect, or in accordance with the Rules of the House, and if so, of course, I should at once apologize to you and to the House for having violated any of its Rules and customs. But since I have been a Member of Parliament I have always understood that the Rule is, that when a Member appears at the Bar and informs the Speaker that he has a Message from Her Majesty to this House, signed by herself, he is desired to bring it up, and the Message is brought up to the Chair and read by the Speaker, all Members being uncovered; and their being uncovered is recorded in the Votes and on the Journals. But those are the only occasions on which Members are expected to be uncovered. In all other cases of Royal Messages we are not, I understand, expected to remove our hats. If I am right, I hope, Sir, that you will relieve the feelings of some hon. Gentlemen by so informing the House; if not, I shall, as I have said, at once apologize to it and to you?

MR. SPEAKER: In reply to the right hon. Gentleman, I have to say that he has correctly drawn the distinction between Messages direct from the Crown under the Sign Manual and read from the Chair, and Messages in answer to Addresses from this House. With reference to the Speech from the Throne, what is read by the Speaker from this

Chair is only a copy of the Speech which is delivered in "another place" before both Houses of Parliament. It is, therefore, not regarded as directly emanating from the Sovereign, and neither by the Rule of the House, nor by the custom of the House, is it obligatory for any hon. Member to uncover.

MOTION.

—o— PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE QUEEN'S SPEECH—POST- PONEMENT OF ORDERS OF THE DAY.—RESOLUTION.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That any proceedings on the Address have precedence To-morrow and Wednesday over the Notices of Motions and Orders of the Day."

PUBLIC MEETINGS — THE RIOT AT ASTON HALL, BIRMINGHAM.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: It would be for the convenience of the House to have some information as to the order in which the various subjects raised on the Queen's Speech are to be taken. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, on Friday night, informed the House that he would take an early opportunity of making a statement in explanation of the riots at Aston. [Cries of "No!"] Well, I have the words by me, and I believe I have accurately described what the President of the Board of Trade said. It is quite clear that if an early statement is to be made, it must be made on the Queen's Speech, because, after the Queen's Speech is disposed of, all the time of the House will be occupied with the Franchise Bill, and, therefore, if it is not pressing the President of the Board of Trade too much, I should like to know on which of the three days left to us he proposes to make his promised statement?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The noble Lord opposite (Lord George Hamilton) has misunderstood what I said; but that is not his fault, because I observe that I was incorrectly reported in one of the newspapers. In the other papers I was correctly reported. What I really said was, that I should be happy to defend myself and my constituents against any attacks which might be made upon me and them whenever the occasion should arise. I am waiting for the occasion.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The statement I referred to I believe to be accurate; but, of course, if the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade denies it, I can say nothing further. As reported in the paper which claims to have the largest circulation in London, the statement of the right hon. Gentleman was—

"I must say that while the proceedings at Birmingham have been to some extent a matter for discussion, I shall be prepared to take an early opportunity of stating to the House what I have heard with reference to them from my constituents, some of whom were eye-witnesses of the proceedings."

MR. CHAPLIN: I wish to remind the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade of a fact which he seems to have forgotten—namely, that an attack was made upon him only the other night by the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff). The right hon. Gentleman turned off that attack by calling my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth a "jackal." I should like to know what guarantee we have, when the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman is next attacked, that he may not probably call the hon. Member attacking him a hyæna? Probably he will evade the point, and we shall never have his promised explanation at all. [Cries of "Order!"] I am perfectly in Order. Hon. Members who cry out "Order!" appear to me to be singularly ignorant of the procedure of this House. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade has distinctly stated that, when challenged, he would be prepared to defend his own conduct and that of his constituents who have been accused of behaving so outrageously. Well, he has been challenged. He has evaded one challenge, and we have no guarantee that he will not evade another. I shall consider the right hon. Gentleman to be distinctly departing from his pledge unless, without further delay, he makes the defence to which he has pledged himself.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I do not know whether the speech to which we have just listened is a Question; but if it be a Question, it is a very fair one, and I will endeavour to answer it. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Chaplin) and the House will see that in reference to this matter I am probably the only person who will be attacked, and the only person who can offer any defence. I think, therefore, that it is only fair that I should wait for an attack or an accusation by somebody who has some personal knowledge of the events in question. When the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) attacked me the other day, in rather wild and burlesque language, I recollected that he, at all events, was not present at Aston.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: He was present. He was at the meeting.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I was not aware that the hon. Member was present at Aston, and I thought that it was only fair and respectful to the House that I should wait for the charges and accusations which had been made against me, outside the House, by the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), and which I thought he would have the courage to repeat in the House. Whenever the noble Lord rises in his place and repeats those charges, I shall be perfectly prepared to meet them.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: Notwithstanding the speech which the right hon. Gentleman has made, with his usual insolence—[Cries of "Order!" and "Withdraw!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. Gentleman will withdraw that expression.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I withdraw the word "insolence" at once, and I will say the speech which the right hon. Gentleman has made with his usual courtesy. I was present during the whole of the proceedings at Aston Park. I witnessed the riots, which were incited by the right hon. Gentleman himself—incited by the Body of which he is the ruling spirit, with the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings), and which the right hon. Gentleman afterwards, with the hon. Member for Ipswich, commended publicly at different meetings. I made this charge against the right hon. Gentleman on my own responsibility, having witnessed the riots, and, therefore, the excuse he makes to-day is one hardly worthy of attention.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Allow me to make a personal explanation. The right hon. Gentleman has charged me with want of courage in not stating in the House the charge which I made outside the House. Undoubtedly, I stated at Birmingham that the right hon. Gentleman was the real author of the riots. No denial having been made to that charge—[Cries of "Oh!"—none whatever; the statement was made perfectly publicly; it was reported in almost every newspaper—and no denial having been made to that charge by the right hon. Gentleman, I considered that he accepted the responsibility. But another reason why I did not wish to initiate the discussion on this subject myself was very much the same reason as that which the right hon. Gentleman has given—namely, because I am the only person who can defend my own view of the matter, just as the right hon. Gentleman appears to be the only person who can defend his view. But if the right hon. Gentleman is afraid of giving me the advantage of a reply, and if he declines to answer any charges made by any other hon. Member except myself, if I am in Order, I will guarantee to the House that I will take the earliest opportunity I can to draw the badger.

MR. NEWDEGATE: As Member for the County of Warwick, I think I can throw some light upon this subject.

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member (Mr. Newdegate) that this is not a time to discuss the matter. We are now considering the proceedings on the Address, and that is not a time for discussing the alleged riots at Birmingham.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I bow, Sir, to your ruling. I wished merely to say that I am informed that the right hon. Gentleman was not present at Birmingham, and that Mr. Schnadhorst was not present; but that the rioters came from South Staffordshire, and were led by Mr. Tangye.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN rose amid cries of "Order!"

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman can speak, with the permission of the House.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The noble Lord has just brought a very strong charge against me as a Minister of the Crown, and I may say that, while I shall be prepared to enter into details on the proper occasion, for the present I content myself with absolutely denying that charge.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL—SCHEMES OF VOTING.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK: I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether he will devote a separate day for the discussion of the mode of voting to be adopted under the Franchise Bill? It is quite obvious that it would be more convenient to have a discussion on that subject before we have the Bill than afterwards; it would much facilitate the Business of the Government if we could dispose of it first.

MR. GLADSTONE: The time has not yet arisen for the discussion of this subject. The House has the Business of the Address to proceed with, and then, as a sequence, the Franchise Bill. These matters are sufficient for the present. I do not think, therefore, that the House would approve of such discussion upon the matter referred to. When further progress has been made there would come a further question; but I own that I am by no means convinced that it would be most convenient to discuss separately the mode of voting.

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR): I venture to express a hope that before the debate on the Address closes we shall have an opportunity of hearing from the Representative of the Colonies some further explanation as to the state of things in South Africa.

MR. W. J. CORBET said, he had obtained first place on Wednesday next for the Land Law (Ireland) Amendment Bill, which was regarded as an important Bill by the Members of his Party. If Wednesday should be taken for the debate on the Address, he hoped the Prime Minister would give some other opportunity for the discussion of the Bill.

MR. HEALY wished to know whether it was proposed to hang up the debate on the Address on Thursday, and go on with the Franchise Bill? If the Land Bill should suffer on Wednesday, it would be too much to ask them to give the Government Thursday for the Franchise Bill. After the Irish Members had finished with the Address, perhaps some Gentleman above the Gangway might like to tackle it.

MR. GLADSTONE: There is no intention of suspending the proceedings on the Address.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That any proceedings on the Address have precedence To-morrow and Wednesday over the Notices of Motions and Orders of the Day.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.] [THIRD NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [23rd October,] "That, &c."—[See page. 69.]

And which Amendment was,

To insert in the ninth paragraph, after the word "us," the words "and humbly to assure Her Majesty that it is the opinion of a vast number of the Irish people that the present method of administering the Law in Ireland, more especially under the Crimes Act, has worked manifold injustice, and, in the case of the prisoners tried for the Maamtrasna murder, has led to the execution of an innocent man and to the conviction of four other persons equally innocent, and this House humbly assures Her Majesty that it would ensure much greater confidence in the administration of the Law in Ireland if a full and public inquiry were granted into the execution of Myles Joyce and the continued incarceration of Patrick Joyce, Thomas Joyce, Martin Joyce, and John Casey."—(Mr. Harrington.)

Debate resumed.

AMENDMENT (MR. HARRINGTON)— THE MAAMTRASNA MURDERS— CONVICTION OF MYLES JOYCE AND OTHERS.

MR. PARNELL: I think, Sir, it would be proper for me, in the commencement of what I have to say upon the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington), to draw the attention of the House to what that Amendment really asks. One would suppose, from the line of defence which has been taken by the two Government speakers, that we were asking the House here, with all the difficulties attending a Parliamentary investigation into judicial proceedings, for a particular inquiry in order to do away with and annul the verdict under which three men were executed, and under which five men are now suffering penal servitude for life. Neither we nor the Amendment ask for that. We simply ask for an inquiry; and in making out our case for that inquiry, we have brought forward evidence which is evidently too strong for the Government defenders, since they say, or practically admit, or lead us to suppose, that if this inquiry be granted the reversal of that verdict will necessarily follow. Apart from the strength of our case, or the nature of the evidence that we should be prepared to bring before the tribunal or body which we ask this House to appoint for the investigation of this important matter, we claim that if any reliance is to be placed for the future upon the pledged credit of a responsible Minister of the Crown—if, in our debates, we can take the words of a Minister of the Crown to mean what they were evidently intended to mean when uttered, that the Government are bound by all the considerations of honour and of regard for their word, to give that inquiry, or some inquiry of the kind, which we now ask from this House. It is true that the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington), upon the two separate occasions when his promises were made in the late hours of almost the last day of last Session, did guard himself by an "if." He protected himself from pledging himself definitely to any particular inquiry; but he did promise us most definitely some inquiry into this matter, if the allegations which were made by my hon. Friends in the debate which produced his two speeches turned out to be correct. On the first occasion when the subject was raised, on the Motion for going into Committee on the Appropriation Bill, the noble Marquess wound up his statement to the House by this declaration—

"If the statements appear to be vouched for in the manner I have described, inquiry will be made."—(3 Hansard, [292] 677.)

The only condition was that the statements should be vouched for in the manner the noble Marquess had described, and the manner in which those statements were to be vouched for was that His Grace the Archbishop of Tuam should vouch for the statement of facts as detailed on that evening by my hon. Friends in debate. On the second occasion when my hon. Friends, desirous of having some clearer statement or pledge from the noble Marquess, recurred to the matter on the same evening when the House had gone into Committee, the noble Marquess said—

Mr. Parnell

"He refrained from absolutely promising that an inquiry should be instituted, for it was premature to say what would be the statement vouched for by the Archbishop of Tuam or any other person who might make representations to the Government. All he had ventured to say on the case as presented to him—all he could say was, he would promise that the Irish Government should take any representation made to them into consideration, and if the facts appeared to be as they had been alleged to be that night, then an inquiry should be made."—(Ibid. 589.)

The only condition attached to granting some inquiry was, that the facts should be found on inquiry to be as stated by my hon. Friend (Mr. Harrington). These facts had reference to statements made before the Archbishop by one of the informers, and of the confession by this informer, that all he swore on the trial was false, perjured, and dictated by a desire to save his life; and it is impossible for us to believe that the noble Marquess, when making that statement, did not absolutely intend that if it was found that the facts as stated by my hon. Friend were correct, a full, fair, and impartial inquiry would have been granted into this most grave and important question. I believe the issues involved in the matter are more important than any matter ever brought by my hon. Friends before the House; and I feel convinced that the conviction is gaining in strength day by day that some of the Irish Government officials have very good reasons why they consider that this inquiry should not be granted. They know that if the dying depositions of the two guilty men who were executed in Galway Goal two years ago—depositions which admitted their own guilt, and bore the strongest testimony to the innocence of Myles Joyce and of four out of the five who were convicted, and who are now suffering penal servitude—they know that if these depositions were produced, that the House would be unable to resist the granting of this Motion. Why have these depositions been withheld? The right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant is very anxious that these depositions should not be produced, and, in fact, he is so anxious that he absolutely stooped to misrepresent the statement of the Prime Minister to this House. He sought, in his speech, to pin the Prime Minister to a statement which that right hon. Gentleman never made. He said that the Prime Minister had refused to grant the depositions. The Prime Minister never did so. He was appealed to in an off-hand manner by one of my hon. Friends (Mr. Callan); and he said, in reply, that it was not usual in such cases "to grant them." But he never absolutely refused to grant them; he never did what he was represented to have done by the late Chief Secretary for Ireland—refused to grant them; and until he does absolutely refuse, I will refuse to believe that he will do so. We have a very strong case; that is admitted; and I believe that if it had not been for the apprehension that so great and so good a man as Earl Spencer—if it were not for the apprehension that so great and good a man as Earl Spencer had made a mistake—and a fatal mistake as regarded the life of one of his fellow-creatures—we should have had the production of these depositions. Failing in that, we have had an inquiry into the case of Kilmartin—an inquiry first of all refused to us by the late Chief Secretary for Ireland, and which was afterwards granted to us in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman by the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, with the result that Kilmartin, who had been sentenced to penal servitude, was released and restored to his family. Now, Sir, I believe we should have had this inquiry, and I must protest against the tone of the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland. He almost let the cat out of the bag in an eloquent and powerful passage in his speech, when he gave the House to understand—for no other inference could be derived from that passage—that if the Lord Lieutenant had made a mistake—and the mistakes in question involved the life of one person and the liberties of others—that if the Lord Lieutenant had made such grave mistakes, he (Mr. Trevelyan) would feel "consolation"—that was his expression—for these mistakes, by the fact that crime and outrage in Ireland had been put an end to, and that the majesty of the law had been vindicated. That is our whole contention—that there are officials in Ireland who consider it is their highest duty to use every means and all means, legitimate and otherwise, to put down crime and outrage, uphold the "majesty of the law," and restore "law and order."

I say that, if that is the position of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, no more fatal mistake was ever made by any Predecessor of his, than to suppose that they can ever obtain the respect of the Irish people for law and order, until they thoroughly purify and purge their tribunals from the suspicion of partiality and injustice, which cases like this must throw upon them. Until then it is impossible to suppose that the Irish people can have that confidence in law and order, and can have that desire to uphold law and order in Ireland without which you will never be able to govern—certainly never even with such a Coercion Act as now stains the Statute Book. Now, I wish to say that our case rests not, as represented by the late Chief Secretary for Ireland, solely on the testimony of an informer and a murderer, who admitted formerly on the trial that he was a murderer, and now admits again that he is a murderer, and who desires to unsay what he has said. Our case rests not upon this, but upon a vast variety of other facts. It is pure irony of the right hon. Gentleman to say, and it is misleading the House for him to say, that our case rests on the evidence of Casey, the informer. I say, throw away the informer Casey. Put his evidence out of the case altogether; disregard it, as the Lord Lieutenant now wishes to do; put him on one side, and I say we have as strong and unanswerable a case as if we had no Casey at all. We have the evidence of the three "independent witnesses" themselves—its improbable character; its inconsistency with itself and with the evidence of the other informers; the impossibility of the alleged case of identification on the dark night of the murder; the physical impossibility of the story being true. These were amongst the grounds on which they based their cases. The fact is that, in several instances in which those independent witnesses swore that they were in a certain position from which they could identify persons at a considerable distance on a dark night, it was physically impossible for them to do so even in broad daylight, any more than it would be possible for anyone sitting on that side of the House to see a Member in the Division Lobby through the wall. If I say, standing here, that I could see through the wall opposite, no person here would believe me. This trial was held a distance from the locale of the murder. Some 10 days were given for counsel for the accused to prepare the defence. The journey to the place involved a whole day's railway travelling, and portions of the night by horse conveyance, and the same time back. Only 20 guineas were allowed to the counsel, described by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland as one of the most celebrated in Ireland—only 20 guineas were allowed to enable him to travel all that journey and make his investigations in an Irish-speaking district, where the only interpreters were the police, who could not be used for the purpose. Twenty guineas would have been little enough to give a surveyor for making the plans and drawings that were necessary, and one of my charges against the Irish officials is that they deliberately neglected to have the proper plans prepared. No detailed plans were made of the house and the positions which the witnesses swore that they occupied on the night in question. It was, therefore, impossible for the counsel to test the accuracy of the witnesses on those important points. The defence, in fact, was so crippled, that it was impossible for the counsel representing the accused to do their duty by their clients. It was made impossible for the defence to obtain by cross-examination the necessary information with which to rebut the testimony of the informers. Therefore, although four of the men happened to be guilty, the whole trial was a farce and a prostitution of justice, and the conviction was obtained upon perjury of a most infamous character committed by the witnesses, one of whom—the approver—swore that he was standing in the same place where the three “independent” witnesses swore they were at the time the alleged identification took place. An adjournment for re-examination of the district after the approvers' evidence—which was absolutely new—was refused, nor was leave given to go into a rebutting case. Now, I think I had better explain to the House, as there is considerable confusion as to names, by giving an outline of it, what the Crown case was against the 10 persons charged, and what our case now is by the light of subsequent revelations. The Government case was that the murder was committed by 10 men. Three of these men have been hanged, and the guilt of two out of these three we admit; five of the 10 were sentenced to penal servitude for life, and two of the 10 turned approvers. We also admit the guilt of one of the five who were sent to penal servitude; but we strenuously assert, and can prove on inquiry, the absolute innocence of the remaining four. We also admit the guilt of one of the two approvers; but say that the second, in our opinion, is innocent, and that he was compelled by fear of death to swear to that which was absolutely false. No adequate motive for the commission of the crime was assigned at the trial by the Crown against any of these 10 men. It was partly suggested that the murder was the outcome of a general conspiracy in Ireland, and the result of an order issued from some secret tribunal at a distance, and, for the purpose, the names of two men—Kelly and Nee—were brought into the case by one of the witnesses, who turned approver; but as this addition would have made the supposed number of those who committed the deed 12 instead of 10, and as the other witnesses had sworn that the number was 10, the attempt to impute the motive suggested by the evidence of the approver was not persisted in by the Crown. Therefore, afterwards, all the witnesses, independent and otherwise, swore to 10. Now, on the other hand, we have it in our power to present the strongest motives for the commission of the crime by the persons we can prove guilty. Our case is that seven, and not 10, committed this murder; that of these seven, two have been rightly executed, and are undoubtedly guilty, and that one is in penal servitude who is also guilty, and who admits his guilt, and, strange to say, protests the innocence of the other men. We, however, protest that the other men whom the jury have found guilty are innocent. The Irish Members also hold that one of the two approvers is among the guilty, that two of the guilty men are at large at this moment in the locality where the murder was committed—one of them being the ringleader and paymaster of the local Ribbon Society to which they belonged—and that another of the miscreants is now in England. According to our case, a motive can easily be assigned for the crime. We can prove that the murdered man was the treasurer of a Ribbon Society, that he had been accused of making away with some of the funds—an accusation which is always sufficient to insure the murder of the person accused—and that, on more than one occasion, he had attempted to shoot the leader and paymaster of the gang who murdered him. We can also prove that the murdered man was a notoriously bad character, a Ribbon man, and a sheep stealer, and that he was murdered in accordance with the decree of a local Ribbon Society, as a punishment for offences against the Society and against his neighbours. It must also be borne in mind that the independent witnesses who have given testimony against the 10 men who were tried had lived on the worst of terms with the majority of the men whom they accused, and had been involved in litigation with them in consequence of boundary disputes. On one occasion Anthony Joyce, the chief of the independent witnesses, had a fight with Myles Joyce, in which he was worsted. He then had recourse to law, and Myles Joyce was sentenced to be imprisoned for two or three months. In fact, the independent witnesses at the trial formed one faction, and the accused persons another, and the result was that, when the murder was announced, the three independent witnesses held a family council, and agreed among themselves as to who were likely to have desired the death of the murdered man. By guess work they were able to indicate three or four of the assassins, and by implicating the remainder of the prisoners they not only obtained a large reward, but avenged themselves against such of their neighbours as were obnoxious to them. It is a terrible thing to think that murder so atrocious could be deliberately planned for such an object; but, unfortunately, it is but too true that in these wild districts of the country the smallest pretexts are sometimes sufficient for the commission of such crime. I invite the House to put out of consideration altogether for the moment the evidence of the two informers. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland said, in his defence of the Government the other night, that the depositions that were made in the case were all produced. Now, it is a part of the case of the Irish Members, that the depositions of the two young Joyces, the survivors of the massacre, and which would have discredited the evidence of the independent witnesses, were deliberately withheld by the Crown, by Mr. Bolton, who was the solicitor in charge of the Crown proceedings, from the cognizance of the counsel for the defence. That, we contend, was a disadvantage additional to all the other disadvantages with which counsel had to contend. The hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland, first of all, denied point blank that any depositions had been withheld. Then he mended that a little, and said there were no depositions withheld, and that all that had been withheld had been declarations and informations. He said all the depositions were given. However, having a little more time owing to some interruptions on the part of my hon. Friends—interruptions which I very much deprecate, because I think it would have been much better if they had allowed the hon. and learned Gentleman to flounder on, I will not say with his untruthful, but, at any rate, his unfounded statements—he was allowed to collect his thoughts, and, after having done so, he said that all the depositions given at the inquest were supplied to the defenders of the prisoners. But, Sir, these learned gentlemen did not want the depositions given at the inquest, because they had them already. They were matters of notoriety, and had been published in the newspapers; but what these gentlemen had not received, and what should have been given to them, were the two dying depositions that it was impossible for them to get. These were withheld, and that we have on the admission of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland. The hon. and learned Gentleman was compelled to renounce his miserable quibbling about the difference between depositions and declarations. He was compelled to admit that the depositions had been withheld, and to enter into his ridiculous explanation of the reasons why they were withheld. Sir, the depositions which I refer to—the depositions of the two boys who were both supposed to be dying, although one afterwards recovered—were duly taken by the stipendiary magistrate having charge of the case. They were duly attested by the magistrate, and they, from the circumstances in which he took them, and the internal evidence in them, show that they were drafted and taken to be used as evidence for the Crown, and that no idea had presented itself to the mind of the magistrate that the two boys were not in a fit position to make depositions. As a matter of fact, one of them was, because he recovered, and having recovered, and having received a good education from the good Christian Brothers at Artane Industrial Schools, contrasting somewhat with the education he had received whilst in the custody of George Bolton, he is able and willing, now he is recovered, to corroborate the testimony he then gave. These depositions had reference to the blackened faces of the assassins. The independent witnesses had sworn as the result of their constant observation of the 10 alleged assassins—that constant observation extending throughout three miles, during which, the witnesses stated, they were close to the assassins—positively to the features of the men, and also that they wore dark clothes. Well, in the suppressed depositions of the two boys, who were themselves amongst the victims of the attack, and it must be remembered that these boys had an opportunity of seeing closely by the light of torches the features of the murderers, it was set forth that the men had blackened faces, and that they wore white jackets. The boys stated this repeatedly, and, first of all, informed the policeman of it—the constable who came to ask about the murder the morning it was discovered. They said the men had their faces blackened, and wore white jackets. Well, such a remarkable discrepancy as that which existed between the evidence of the principal witnesses would, if it had been known to the counsel for the defence at the time of the trial, have been taken hold of, and strongly represented to the jury. But he was absolutely ignorant of these facts. The two depositions were suppressed. This was not evidence given by informers a long time after the massacre, but evidence given by two of the persons attacked a day or two after the occurrence. The depositions were studiously kept from the jury, but not from the Judge, because if he had chosen to look through the brief of the learned counsel for the prosecution—the brief which has fallen into our hands—he might have found these two depositions, and he might also have noticed the remark—"Patrick Joyce has recovered, but his evidence is worthless." Well, these vital documents were withheld from the prisoners' counsel. Why? I really think we should have a more satisfactory attempt at an explanation for the withholding of such documents than we have yet received. The right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland left the point to be dealt with by his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland; but I venture to say that no one who heard the hon. and learned Gentleman's defence can feel satisfied in his conscience that that defence was satisfactory. But the Irish Members charge other suppressions against the Crown. They charge the Crown with the suppression of the declarations made by Philbin. The first statements made to Mr. Bolton were not furnished to the counsel for the prisoners. The Government, in their defence, rely upon the technical point that these statements were not depositions, but declarations. If the evidence had been the evidence of an approver who was in prison, counsel for the defence would have obtained knowledge of it in the ordinary way, because he would have been present, and would have made application for it. In that case, the depositions could not have been withheld; but, owing to the fact that some of the proceedings took place in the secrecy of the gaol, the Crown thought they might venture upon their suppression. I ask every fair-minded Englishman, whether, trying those ignorant peasants with all the disadvantages that necessarily attend their defence, should evidence of this kind be withheld from the ordinary investigations which the counsel for the defence would, under other circumstances, have made? Sir, I venture to say that the answer will be "No." The answer will be that the Crown officials charged with the prosecution acted unfairly in this matter, and in such a way as to defeat the ends of justice, by withholding these depositions, and that according to the dictates of honour, honesty, and of a desire to secure a fair trial, which must even be present occasionally in the bosom of a Crown Solicitor in Ireland, they must stand condemned in this matter. I do not wish to trouble the House by going into the details again. My hon. Friends have done that for me very fully;

but no attempt has been really made by the Government to meet our case. I could go on for another hour if the House would derive any satisfaction from my doing so; but in default of a reply from the Government, I do not think it is necessary to do so. If the House is satisfied with the trial and punishment of these men, nothing that I could say would be of any use; but if, on the other hand, the House is not satisfied, and thinks there has been a defect in these proceedings, that these men were tried under circumstances of great public excitement, when a large section of the public were clamouring for blood, and when the Irish Executive were thirsting eagerly for convictions, and if the House considers that an investigation of the case is desirable—and there has been ample means placed in its hand for making up its mind in the pamphlet which has been circulated by the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington)—if the House thinks this, and that there is a considerable discrepancy in the evidence of the witnesses, and that the statements of the approvers in the light of the evidence of independent witnesses is unreliable on many important points—if, on reflection, it is thought that the suppression of the two depositions made by the dying lad and his brother were vitally important to the defence, and that the Crown Prosecutors were culpable in not producing them—then I say the House will vote for the Amendment of my hon. Friend. It may be said by the late Chief Secretary for Ireland—it has been said—that the foundations of law and justice in Ireland would be shaken if this inquiry were granted. Well, Sir, I deny it. I believe that if the Irish Executive could show that it was strong enough to grant this inquiry, the result, whatever it might be, would, from the point of view of the Executive itself, be beneficial, because you cannot smother this matter. It is there. It is of such a nature that it will receive attention when it is brought up again and again; and if an unwilling Executive in Ireland, fearful for the stability of its own position, knowing well that there has been injustice done, refuses inquiry to-day, and if the Government supports it in that refusal under a threat of resignation from Lord Spencer, at any rate the day must come when such an inquiry will be instituted, and when the whole truth and nothing but the truth will be known in reference to the Maamtrasna massacre.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that although he was not directly connected with the administration of justice in Ireland, yet the Office which he held was directly concerned with investigations of the same character as the one now at issue; and he should ask the indulgence of the House to say a few words on the subject of that painful debate. He spoke with some responsibility in this matter, because Lord Spencer desired, with regard to the case, that everything should be done in Ireland exactly upon the same principles and precisely in the same manner as a similar case would be dealt with in England. Before he gave his final decision on this subject, and before he sent his answer to the Archbishop of Tuam, Lord Spencer requested him carefully to investigate the case. Of course, he did so with all the care he could. He did it under the same sense of responsibility as he should have done if called upon to decide a case in England or Scotland. He had no hesitation whatever in telling Lord Spencer that he considered there was no justification whatever for interfering with the sentence of the law. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen might laugh, but it was a responsible position to hold, and he felt it his duty to accept his share of that responsibility. He would ask the House to consider what was the exact duty of the Executive Government with reference to criminal cases, and especially criminal cases involving life. It was an entire mistake to suppose that the duty of the Executive Government was to review and retry a case. That was not their business. The responsibility for the verdict and the sentence belong to the judicial body—the jury and the Judge. The responsibility of the Lord Lieutenant in Ireland and the Home Secretary in the rest of the United Kingdom was to advise the Crown as to the exercise of the Prerogative of mercy, and to do that by considering carefully, anxiously, and fairly any circumstances which had afterwards supervened which might properly be considered to influence the case and the execution of the sentence passed. It was a very anxious duty for any man. Everybody would feel that. He did not think anybody who had not borne that responsibility could appreciate the whole extent of it. He did not believe that any man who ever had that responsibility had been wanting in a desire to give full and perhaps more than full weight to those considerations which inclined towards mercy. They were not there to retry the case. But what was the original case, and what were the subsequent allegations upon which it was suggested that the sentence should be varied? When this horrible murder took place there came forward three men—Anthony Joyce and two others. He said that he saw these men in the dead of the night, and fearing they were on some secret errand he watched them. This evidence was confirmed by a young woman. [Mr. HARRINGTON: His daughter.] That did not invalidate her evidence. These three men, against whom nothing was alleged, followed these men to the very scene of the murder. That was strong evidence. Then came forward Philbin. Now, in many of these cases they had to get the evidence of approvers corroborated by other evidence, but that was not the case here. The approvers corroborated independent evidence given by the principal witnesses. After Philbin came the approver Thomas Casey, and he also corroborated the principal witnesses. The extraordinary result of the trials was that out of 10 men accused, nine in one form or another, at one time or other, had acknowledged their guilt; and if they were guilty, the tenth could not have been innocent, because the whole story involved his guilt. Was there ever a case in which the evidence was so absolutely overwhelming? It was said that this was a packed jury. The pamphlet which had been issued said—“The jury were packed after the manner of all political and agrarian trials in Ireland.” And an hon. Member, reading from the brief, charged the counsel with having marked the names of jurors in order to pack the juries. On the face of it, to say that juries were packed because they found verdicts of murder on such evidence, was to make an unfounded charge; no jury, with such evidence before it, could have done, or ought to have done, anything else but convict. Then, what was the meaning of the charge of packing juries? He did not wish to argue against anything that was admitted; and he implied that it was admitted that there were fair juries. [Mr. PARNELL: Two of them.] But you could not draw any distinction, because the three had the same evidence before them; and thus three juries, independently one of another, found a verdict of guilty. He supposed there was no charge against Lord Spencer or the Executive Government for acting upon verdicts found and sentences passed upon such evidence. So the matter stood till last August. [An hon. MEMBER: No; the dying declarations.] He would speak of them afterwards; but as regarded the evidence, so matters stood.

Mr. HARRINGTON: In April, 1883, immediately after my release from Galway Gaol, I called the attention of the Chief Secretary for Ireland and the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite the Solicitor General for Ireland to the facts of this case.

Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: Yes; but there was a difference between a Member doing that and the production of any evidence on which the Executive Government could act in displacing such verdicts and sentences. It was not quite correct to say that there the matter stood, because in the 18 months or thereabouts, between the time when Thomas Casey gave his evidence and last August, he twice repeated the same story upon separate occasions, not under pressure from Mr. Bolton or under fear for his life, which was safe; and upon these two occasions the same informer repeated the evidence. [“No, no!”] The case could not be met by contradiction of this sort; the documents existed; and it was perfectly well known that in the compensation case—[“No, no!”] Hon. Members must please not deal with him in that way; they would have plenty of opportunity for correcting him; he would state matters as fairly as he could, according to the information he had. Thomas Casey stated first of all that Philbin was there; upon another occasion that Miles Joyce was present, although he did not enter the house. Then, last August, Thomas Casey, the informer, came forward to retract all that he had said at the trial, and all that he had said subsequently, and to put forward the story which the hon. Member for Cork had stated so clearly, admitting that he was a murderer, that he was concerned in the murder, only saying that it was done by a different gang from the gang he had previously sworn to. This was the first new evidence that was before Lord Spencer. There was nothing new in the declaration of the son of the murdered man. The first new fact was the declaration on the part of the Casey, the informer. To explain his now having a different story, he said that he had formerly been coerced by Mr. Bolton, the Crown Solicitor, and Mr. Brady, the Resident Magistrate. It was said that this ought to be inquired into; but how could it be inquired into? It rested entirely upon the statement of Thomas Casey on one side, and on the other of Mr. Bolton and of Mr. Brady, and also of the Governor of the gaol, who was said to have been present on some of these occasions. The question was—would you believe Thomas Casey, the twice-perjured murderer, or would you believe Mr. Bolton and Mr. Brady? ["Hear, hear!"] The House would form its own opinion; Irish Members preferred to believe Thomas Casey. They had brought charges against Mr. Bolton; those charges had been submitted to juries, and they had not been sustained. He saw no reason whatever for disbelieving Mr. Bolton, Mr. Brady, and the Governor of the gaol when they said that the statements of Thomas Casey were false. For one, he did not believe Thomas Casey. And what was his story? Casey now said that Anthony and John Joyce were not there at all—it was proved by the daughter that they went out that night—that they never saw anybody at all, and that they had invented the whole story to which he had previously sworn. Casey admitted that Philbin had hit upon four of the right men; he had heard the explanation of the singular circumstance by which making a false charge altogether he had hit upon four of the men. The case was that Philbin, the informer, who first proffered himself under no pressure whatever to give evidence, was never there at all, and that he had no cognizance of the transaction of any kind; and yet one of the men executed, who admitted his own guilt, put the question the moment he was apprehended whether Philbin had been arrested. What an extraordinary circumstance that he should ask about a man who was not there. Was it possible for any purpose whatever that the Lord Lieutenant of the Secretary of State could set aside the verdict of a jury and the sentence of a Judge upon evidence such as this? Consider what Thomas Casey was. He became now a new informer; he was an informer before against one set of men; he was an informer now against another set of men. As a new informer, was there any corroboration of his statement? If his evidence was worth considering for one moment it ought to be such that you could found upon it an indictment against guilty men whom the hon. Member for Cork said were now at large. Who would believe Casey. Who would find a verdict upon such evidence? What Public Prosecutor dare present an indictment upon such evidence? Conceive it done, and Casey put forward; he would be confronted with his own oath proving that he had foresworn himself against others. He would be contradicted by the evidence of Philbin, the other informer, who swore to the men first charged, and by the confessions of the five men who had pleaded guilty. It was absolutely impossible for a Public Prosecutor to undertake to charge men upon such evidence. And yet Lord Spencer was condemned because he had not accepted this evidence of that perjured murderer. Lord Spencer was bound to decide that such evidence as that was of no account. Then there was the question of the depositions, which had been made a very serious charge against the administration of justice in Ireland—not a charge against Mr. Bolton—hon. Members opposite were aiming at much higher game than that. The charge was that these depositions were taken away and hidden; but it was a strange way of hiding them to put them in a brief. They were submitted to the Crown counsel. It was not for Mr. Bolton to decide whether they should be used or not, but for the Crown counsel to exercise his discretion. But it was said that they were unknown to the counsel for the defence. It was alleged that the children's statement about the blackened faces was kept back, and that if it had been known to the counsel for the defence it would have been brought before the jury. Now, the fact was that the whole of these facts were perfectly well known to the counsel for the defence and to everybody in Ireland. It was notorious that these boys had made this statement, and in proof of that assertion he would refer to The Freeman's Journal of August 21, in the first account of what had taken place. It was therein stated that, according to the evidence, the faces of the men were black. Then there was the evidence of John Collins at the Coroner's inquest, which was also held in the month of August. That statement in The Freeman's Journal, and the evidence of John Collins, embraced in substance, if not in words, all that was conveyed in the depositions of the two boys. The same facts were brought out on the trial by the Attorney General. He had thus conclusively shown that it was perfectly well known that both these boys had stated that the faces of these men were black, and it was perfectly competent for the prisoners' counsel to deal with the matter if they had thought fit. Now, what did the counsel for the Crown do? They came to the conclusion—having regard to that evidence and to the condition of these children, who said they could not identify the persons, and having regard to what was evident upon the face of the depositions, that these children were not witnesses to be vouched in the case—that they could not undertake the responsibility of vouching them as witnesses for the prosecution. But they offered them to the defence as witnesses for the defence. ["No, no!" "One was dead!"] But the one who was living was produced in Court, and the counsel for the defence, with full knowledge of what he had stated, could have questioned him if he had thought proper.

MR. GORST said, he was quite sure the right hon. Gentleman would not intentionally mislead; but he wished to remind him that the child could not have been sworn, because he had not sufficient religious belief.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the child could have been sworn if the counsel for the defence had brought him forward.

MR. PARNELL asked the right hon. Gentleman whether the fact that these depositions had been made was really brought to the knowledge of the counsel for the defence?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The hon. Member had taken a perfectly fair distinction, but the statement at the Coroner's inquest was perfectly well known; there was no suppression of the fact that these boys had made the statement which was perfectly notorious to the whole world. The hon. Member for Cork City was under the erroneous impression that the fact had been deliberately withheld. The facts contained in these depositions were entirely immaterial to the case in the opinion, not only of the counsel for the Crown, but also in the opinion of the counsel for the defence. There was scarcely any criminal conviction in which there was no room for doubt; but the question for the person who had the responsibility of deciding was, whether the doubt was such as to overweigh and overwhelm the weight of evidence for the prosecution. He ventured to say that no reasonable man in this case could have come to a different conclusion from that which was arrived at. Next, he came to the confession of the men who were executed. He had been asked by an hon. Member the other day what had been done in the case of Peace. He had just looked into that case at the Home Office, and he found that no precedent was to be found in that case for what the Government was asked to do. His Predecessor had refused in that case to produce the confession. A similar refusal was made also in Wainwright's case. There was a very great difference between the confession of a man in respect to himself and a confession which he might choose to make about other people. In a dying confession of this kind a man became an informer; he might accuse one set of people and acquit another set of people as he chose; and if we were to accredit a document of that kind, which could not be examined and tested, we should introduce the most dangerous element it was possible to have into the revision of capital sentences. We should leave it to the man making the confession, who would be in reality an informer, to have the liberty and the lives of other men at his mercy; and for this reason the Executive Government always had refused, and always ought to refuse, to produce confessions of such a character. In regard to the Liddle case, at Durham, it was often stated that the man was let off simply on the confession of the prisoner who had been accused with him. This was not so, for he himself, in consequence of what he had learned, entertained so much suspicion with regard to the case that he instituted an inquiry into it quite independently of the statement of the other prisoner. That was a course which he had always followed, and which Lord Spencer had also followed. It was followed in the case of Kilmartin. The release of Liddle, though afterwards confirmed by the statement of Lowson, was not founded upon that statement.

MR. HEALY: How did Lowson's statement get out?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Such statements sometimes got out by means which were not known to the Home Office; but statements affecting other persons ought not to be published on authority. It was obvious that this should be so. What defence could any man have against a confession of this kind, made by a man who was dead, and who could not be called to account for it? The sort of importance which was attached to these dying declarations was founded upon what one would wish to believe was always the case—namely, that men in that situation told the truth. He was sorry to say he had seen a good many of these declarations which did not bear out that theory. In making such statements men of depraved minds were actuated by mixed motives. It had been alleged that the statements made by these men to their priests were necessarily true; but the circumstances in this case shook that opinion very much. Four or five of these men consulted their priest, who said that although from their statements he believed them to be innocent, yet he advised them to plead guilty.

MR. HARRINGTON said, their statement was not made in confession, and a dying confession stood upon a different ground. The prisoners refused to plead guilty. Overtures were made to them to the effect that they would not receive capital punishment if they pleaded guilty. The first prisoner, Michael Casey, was ready to plead guilty because he was really guilty; but the Crown Solicitor declined to accept the plea unless the other prisoners pleaded with him. In these circumstances, the priest advised them to plead guilty. It was to be remarked, however, that although they pleaded guilty in Court, on their return to the gaol they still protested their innocence.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was not desirous of condemning the conduct of the priest; that was not his duty; but he must call attention to what the priest did. The reverend gentleman said—

"The case was laid before me, and in the interest of the prisoners I considered it the wisest course for them to plead guilty. I was by no means clear in my own mind as to whether they were innocent. I was inclined to believe that they were, but I had no ground for such a belief except their own declaration to me."

The reverend gentleman added that he argued with himself that if they were guilty their plea of guilty would do them no harm, while, if they were innocent, the truth would be sure to come out. He would not say that the priest had not excellent motives; but he ventured, in the interests of justice and truth, to point out the infinite mischief of such a course as that. If, believing these men to be innocent, he advised them to plead guilty, was it not obvious that he sealed the fate of the men who had been convicted? Was it not also plain that he defeated the course of justice? Even if these men expected to get off, their pleading guilty would set justice off the track of the true criminals. Therefore, he must protest against such a course as being most injurious to the interests of justice. It had been said that his noble Friend the Marquess of Hartington had promised an inquiry. It was not necessary that his noble Friend should have promised an inquiry. An inquiry certainly must and would have taken place. There was no case of murder in which a man came forward with a statement of this character, whether in England or in Ireland, where inquiry would not have taken place. If this case had occurred in England, he should have instituted an inquiry at once into the statements which had been made. If there were any new facts which required investigation, he should have employed agents of his own to make inquiry into those facts. But the responsibility of the decision would have been his own. That was done in Kilmartin's case. Such an inquiry, if held at all, must be made by the person who was responsible for the decision. The Government, however, were asked to grant an independent inquiry. The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock had said that Lord Spencer, in the inquiry he had made, was deciding in his own case.

But who had authority to appoint the independent tribunal indicated by the Amendment? If a Court of Criminal Appeal were to be established, it must be established by legislation, and neither Lord Spencer, the Cabinet, the Queen, nor the House of Commons, could authorize anyone to take upon themselves duties which the Constitution had devolved upon others, and which really had to be discharged by the Judge and the jury, and by the Lord Lieutenant. He had been astonished to hear the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), that the whole subject should be referred to Lord Bramwell, who, he was certain, would decline to enter upon such a task. Whether Lord Bramwell or anyone else were appointed to conduct the inquiry asked for, the House would throw the responsibility for any acts done by the Executive of Ireland, not upon the person so appointed, but upon the proper Executive officer. The hon. Member for Monaghan had suggested that a Select Committee of that House should be appointed to inquire into the matter. It was, however, absurd to suggest that a Select Committee of that House could advise the Crown to exercise the Prerogative of mercy. What hon. Members opposite were seeking to do, and one thing which the House of Commons could do, was to censure the Executive Government of Ireland for the manner in which they had discharged their duties. That was the true Constitutional course, and that was what they were asked to do that night. They could condemn Earl Spencer, and they could condemn the officials for their conduct in these transactions; but he did not think that the House of Commons would do that. That was the proper province of the House of Commons, and that was a very clear and distinct issue. The Resolution proposed to pass a broad and sweeping censure upon the method of administering the law in Ireland. ["Hear, Hear!" from the Irish Members.] Yes; that was the issue before them. Hon. Members opposite asked for a general condemnation of the administration of the Criminal Law in Ireland under the Crimes Act. If there had been any doubt upon the point, the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock had taken care to "dot the i's." The noble Lord had said that if the Government yielded upon this question, they would gain some Irish votes on the Division. Her Majesty's Government did not intend to deal with this question, which involved life and death, with a view to gaining votes. The noble Lord opposite had made himself the endorsee of this charge against the administration of the law in Ireland. The noble Lord had said that no one would condemn the course taken by the Crown counsel in this case more than the Attorney General for England. The noble Lord, however, should have taken the statement of his witness before he called him, because he believed that the witness he called would put him out of court. Why did not the noble Lord appeal to those Attorneys General for Ireland who had been connected with the Administration of right hon. Gentlemen opposite, one of whom sitting opposite (Mr. Gibson) was one of the most distinguished Members of that House, and whose Colleague was absent from his place that night from a cause which they must all deplore? He should be content to call those right hon. and learned Gentlemen as witnesses against the noble Lord. The noble Lord had said that the Crown counsel had kept back important evidence at the trial, and that the officials charged with the administration of the law had shrunk from hardly any process in order to obtain a conviction. He was aware that that was the contention of hon. Members opposite, and of the noble Lord who acted with them. That was the charge made in the presence of men sitting upon the Bench opposite who had been responsible for the government of Ireland, and who might be responsible for it again. They knew these Crown counsel—men who had been the ornaments of the Irish Bar, and many of whom were now upon the Bench—and how they were in the habit of administering the law in Ireland, and what foundation there was for this charge which was made against the honour of the Irish Bar and against the integrity of the Irish Bench. Hon. Members opposite asked the House to believe that the witnesses were perjured, that the juries were packed, and that the Judges, the Crown counsel, the Resident Magistrates, and Lord Spencer were engaged in a common conspiracy to do to death men of whom they knew nothing. ["All but the jury and the Judge?" Well, then, the Crown counsel, the Resident Magistrates, and Lord Spencer. That was the distinct charge which had been brought by hon. Members opposite. He wished the House to know what the indictment was, in order that it might be met. He believed that the majority of that House would not hold that that charge had been established. If the House were to come to a contrary decision on the question, they would not only make Lord Spencer's position untenable, but the position of his Successor impossible. He believed that such a decision on the part of the House of Commons would be not only unjust, but would be fatal to the administration of the law in Ireland; because if, upon the evidence produced, they were to set aside the Judiciary of Ireland and the decision of the Executive of Ireland, deliberately, and, as he believed, properly arrived at, they would destroy and paralyze justice, and would revive that reign of terror and that immunity of murder which the firm and just administration of Lord Spencer had happily broken down, and had so redeemed Ireland from the stain which had made her a byword among nations.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, he wished to make a few observations as to the considerations upon which he had found himself unwillingly compelled to vote in support of the Motion before the House. There had been, during the past two years, several matters connected with the administration of the Criminal Law in Ireland which had caused every lawyer in the House a great deal of concern and anxiety. He had hitherto held his peace from a feeling of the great importance of the considerations which had been addressed to the House from the Treasury Bench—the importance of not interfering at all in the responsibility of those engaged at a difficult time in administering the law. But now they had a clear and distinct issue, and he had listened with the greatest possible attention to the three speeches from the Treasury Bench, and with especial attention to the last speech, which, in the judicial character of its observations, was in striking contrast to the extraordinary delivery of the Solicitor General for Ireland. He did not deny that the speech of the Home Secretary might alter to some extent the decision of the House, for with great chivalry the Home Secretary had come forward and placed his responsibility between the House and the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. He had known, from personal experience, what great anxiety and care the right hon. and learned Gentleman had shown during the time he had held Office in the administration of the Criminal Law, and he believed he would always be honoured by those who knew anything of the administration of the law for the anxious care he had shown in the performance of his duties; but the speech he had just delivered seemed to him to leave absolutely unanswered some of the gravest considerations connected with this case. Of course, if by supporting this Motion he were called upon to support the speech of the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington), or to express a judgment upon the facts as put before the House by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), he would, on that ground, have declined to support it. He could not support it, because he did not see a shadow of evidence that Lord Spencer had been party to any such atrocious conspiracy as had been suggested by some Members below the Gangway. He had, too, the strongest feeling that the late Chief Secretary was perfectly justified in saying that the House of Commons could never be made a Court of Appeal. He believed the House would be the worst possible Court of Appeal that could be used in criminal matters; and for that reason he declined altogether to consider whether the evidence before the jury at the time they gave their verdict was such that the verdict could properly be given. He had no doubt the jury, with the evidence before them, acted honestly, and he did not say they acted mistakenly. There were, however, circumstances connected with the trial which he did not think had been explained in either of the three speeches from the Treasury Bench, and which made it, in his judgment, absolutely imperative, if the Government were anxious to preserve public respect for the administration of justice in Ireland, there should be something more of reasonable and fair inquiry into this case than had yet taken place. He certainly regretted the tone of the speech of the Solicitor General for Ireland, though it was carefully prepared, and delivered from notes. A more violent or partisan speech in dealing with evidence it had never been his misfortune to hear; and he did regret to hear a Law Officer of the Crown deliver in vindication of the verdict of a jury a speech which he scarcely thought would have been allowed by a Judge in this country from a prosecuting counsel. While challenging, and rightly challenging, the competence of the House as a Court of Criminal Appeal, the hon. and learned Gentleman, nevertheless, went back over the evidence as a counsel for one side usually did, and asked the House to adopt and act upon his version, or rather his view of the weight of the evidence. And the late Chief Secretary for Ireland took very much the same course, denying the competency of the House as a Court of Criminal Appeal, and yet discussing the evidence before them. As to the case of Thomas Casey, the Home Secretary had put a fallacious test before the House—namely, whether it would be possible now to convict other persons than those previously convicted upon the evidence of Thomas Casey? He should say it would not; but that fact was no reason for allowing the evidence still to prevail against four men who were innocent; and he thought it ought to be tested without reference to a hypothetical prosecution, in which they were all agreed it would have no effect at all. He thought that if the statement prepared for the Lord Lieutenant were carefully examined, it would be found that there was no real conflict between Casey on the one side, and Brady and the Governor of the Gaol on the other. He agreed, however, that there was a conflict between Casey and Mr. George Bolton. Discredited as Casey had been and must be, and infamous as he was as a witness, if it were a conflict of evidence between him and Mr. George Bolton, he did not think the balance would be greatly in favour of Mr. Bolton. He was sorry to have to say it, but his view was that the very gravest misfortune that had befallen the Government in Ireland during the last two years had been the having, as one of its trusted and responsible servants in a position of great responsibility, a man of the antecedents and character they knew George Bolton to be. There was one circumstance—as it seemed to him a most serious one—which had not been greatly dealt with in the course of the debate,

and that was with regard to the circumstances under which the jury were empannelled when Myles Joyce was put upon his trial. Two men had been tried and convicted, and then it appeared that the Judge, in the presence of the jurors about to try Myles Joyce, sentenced the men, who, upon the same evidence then to be produced, had been found guilty. He read that the Judge said, in the presence of these jurymen, that the evidence had established the guilt of these men clearly and conclusively, and so as not to leave a doubt on the mind of any sane man. If the Judge used these words before a jury who were about to try another man on the same evidence, he (Mr. E. Clarke) said it was one of the most deplorable incidents that had ever occurred. And it did not stop there, for he found that immediately after these men had been sentenced, those jurors were empannelled to try Myles Joyce, and an application was made by the counsel for the defence—who had probably heard the Judge's words, and must have felt how terrible were the odds against Myles Joyce—for the postponement of the trial. But the application was opposed by the counsel for the Crown, and refused. He now came to the incident of the depositions. They were the declarations of two lads who were attacked that night, made under the belief that they were dying. One lad did die; and it now appeared to be admitted that, although the depositions were formally taken, and taken by a person who knew the importance of the form, and although they were copied into the Crown brief, they were never communicated to the counsel for the defence. The answer now made was that the contents of these depositions were unimportant, and that they were known to the prisoners' counsel. He denied both these assertions. It was clear on the evidence in the case that the persons who identified the prisoners had but slight opportunities of doing so, and they spoke of the men whom they followed being dressed in long, dark clothes. The boys, however, whose dying depositions were taken, stated that the men had blackened faces and white jackets. The Solicitor General for Ireland suggested that the clothes had been white, but must have become black. It was now stated that the facts contained in these depositions were known to counsel for the defence. That was not accurate. The fact that witnesses had at the inquest stated that the boys said the men had blackened faces was no doubt known; but, at the inquest, nothing was said about the white jackets. Counsel for the prisoners did not know that there were in existence dying declarations which they might have claimed to use. They knew that witnesses had, at the inquest, repeated certain conversations. But that was a very different thing. Depositions could be seen, and then put in; but to cross-examine a witness on what someone else had told him was most dangerous. He said deliberately, as one who spoke from no small experience of professional work, that he believed if counsel for the prisoners had known that the depositions were in existence containing these two facts about the colour of the faces and the colour of the coats, they would have taken a different line in the defence, which would, in his judgment, have been extremely likely to alter the verdict of the jury. He regretted to find that the Solicitor General for Ireland, and in a qualified way the Home Secretary, defended the course taken by the Crown counsel. He ventured to say that under no consideration on earth would the late distinguished Attorney General of the Conservative Government, to whom reference had been made, have allowed a verdict of guilty to be returned in a capital case, when he had in his brief depositions which his professional experience told him might have some weight with the jury in the defence of the prisoners. If the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James) took part in the debate, he hoped he would remember that he was not only a Member of the Government, but the leader and pattern to the English Bar; and he hoped that he would not allow a sentence to drop which might hereafter be quoted to justify in a trial for murder the exclusion from the knowledge of the jury of matters which might influence their verdict. A strong attack had been made by the late Chief Secretary for Ireland on the priest after consultation with whom those men pleaded guilty. This attack did not appear warranted by the facts. The plea of guilty was not a confession in the sense that it purported to be a statement by the men. Three men had already, one after another, been found guilty and sentenced to be hanged on the same evidence that was to be adduced against these men. The priest, therefore, thought that if they went to trial they would, one after another, be sentenced to death; but that, by pleading guilty, they would, if innocent, have an opportunity of subsequently proving their innocence. Taking all the circumstances of the case—and, though he was inclined to believe them innocent, yet the priest was not clear on the point—he did not think that the attacks made on the priest were justified. Ought there to be an inquiry? It was said that an inquiry had already taken place. But that inquiry was by no means satisfactory. It was held by persons who were, to some extent, implicated in the case, who, at all events, were desirous of maintaining the verdict. They had heard the tone of the late Chief Secretary for Ireland and of the Solicitor General; and what shifts and expedients would not smaller men resort to in order to protect themselves? It was said that the law in Ireland must be vindicated and upheld; but there were different ways of doing this. Justice aimed not merely at the infliction of punishment. Justice was as peremptory in demanding the proclamation of the innocence of a person wrongly charged, as in inflicting punishment on a guilty person. They wanted to punish crime; but they also wanted to give the people the assurance that there should be an honest and fair and careful investigation into the allegations of crime; but if the Government had dealt with the matter in such a way as to leave on the minds of the masses of the people a belief—and that belief not unsupported by reason—that there had been a miscarriage of justice—when they had to deal not with a mere historic inquiry into the innocence or guilt of men who had passed away, but with the responsibility of finding out the innocence or guilt of four men who, if no inquiry was made, might, perhaps, for years to come, be kept in penal servitude—there was an imperative duty resting on administrators to make further inquiry into the matter. He would not have spoken in this debate but for a feeling that a matter of this kind, having been brought before the House of Commons, it was one's duty to look all the facts in the face, and then vote on one's own independent judgment. He regretted to hear the line taken by the Home Secretary at the end of his speech. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had said that the administration of justice in Ireland was a matter in which the Government had the duty of examination with the view of doing the right thing. He quite agreed that it was the duty of the Government to examine; but it made a mistake, and weakened terribly its hold upon the allegiance of the people, if it allowed it for one moment to be supposed that the Judicial Bench was being used as the instrument of the Executive Government. The safeguard of the Government would be to dissociate one from the other. Let the Government say—"We have done our part to the best of our ability—we have investigated into the matter, and we have come to this conclusion;" but if, in spite of that, they found that there was a real desire that further inquiry should be made with the view of obtaining complete justice, surely it would be better for them to stand aside and let the inquiry be made.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT was understood to ask who would make the inquiry?

MR. EDWARD CLARKE: Let the Government select any person independent enough of the present Party Government. No one asked for a partizan on one side or the other; but there were plenty of men who would do the work which was done in the case of Kilmartin. He believed in Kilmartin's case a distinguished member of the Irish Bar was sent to inquire and report. Let the Government make some inquiry of that kind, and then he believed those who had brought forward this Motion would be satisfied; or, if not satisfied, it might be their animosities—[Cries of "No, no!" from the Home Rule Benches.]—he was not addressing those Gentlemen, but those who had but little sympathy with them—if those hon. Members, from Party spirit or any other motive that was unworthy of them, still pressed their accusations, at all events the matter would have been cleared in the eyes of men who were free from those animosities. Holding those opinions, he should feel it to be his duty to vote for the Amendment placed on the Paper. That Amendment was not a condemnation of the Government. ["Oh, oh!"] If the hon. Gentleman who said "Oh, oh!" would read the Amendment over again, he would see that it did not purport to be a condemnation of the Government. It stated that a number of the Irish people had formed a particular opinion, and then it went on to ask that an inquiry should be made. It was on these grounds that he should vote for the Amendment.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he thought they might dismiss a very great deal of what had been said during the debate as entirely irrelevant to the issue before the House, which was, not whether this man was guilty or whether this man was innocent, but whether a fair case had been made out for inquiry. He paid little attention to the dying declarations of men about to be hanged respecting their own innocence, or to the assertions of such men as Casey, because he made himself a murderer and a liar. There were, however, two clear and prominent facts which had come forward in the course of the debate, and which, he thought, justified them in voting with the hon. Gentleman who had demanded this investigation. One of those facts was connected with the depositions. The men were convicted on the evidence of three persons who had seen them go into the house where the murder had been committed. Those three persons stated that the men had not blackened faces, and that they had black clothes. It was altogether extraordinary that in what the Solicitor General for Ireland called a bright, starry night it was possible to see whether the men had blackened faces or not, sufficiently clearly to be able to distinguish their features; but it was evident that if these men had had blackened faces, it would have been absolutely impossible for their features to have been distinguished. It was put before the jury that there was no evidence to show that other persons had seen these men, and that they had not blackened faces. What were the real facts of the case? Two persons in this family were boys, one aged 17 and the other nine. The elder boy not only made a statement to the policeman, but he had made a deposition before a magistrate and had sworn to it. That deposition had not been produced, and he said there was a deliberate intention on the part of the counsel for the prosecution to conceal the fact. The younger boy, who had been taken away by the police, and who, therefore, could not have been in collusion with the other boy, made a deposition similar to that of his elder brother, that the men had blackened faces, and that they wore white coats. The whole case turned on those depositions, and the jury ought to have had those two facts before them—that the three men on the one side swore that those men had not blackened faces and recognized them, and that those two boys swore they had blackened faces and did not recognize them. The complaint was that the trial was unfair ab initio from this determination on the part of the prosecuting counsel not to submit this evidence to the jury. There was also the statement of the parish priest that he believed the men were innocent, although he had urged them to plead guilty as the only mode of saving their lives. He thought that in doing so the priest had acted most wrongly; but still the statement ought to be considered. He had not the slightest doubt that if the same circumstances had taken place in this country, and if the facts had been backed up by the English Members in the same way as this case had been by Irish Members, the inquiry would have been granted. If a demand for an investigation had been endorsed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, was it to be supposed that the Home Secretary would neglect it? It was because they applied one system of justice to Ireland and another to England that they got into all those difficulties about Ireland. They had been told that an investigation had been granted; but what had been the understanding? The Irish Members had been told, during the discussion of the Estimates, that if they would not discuss this matter and allowed certain Estimates to go through earlier than perhaps they otherwise would have done, an investigation would be granted provided the Archbishop of Tuam demanded it. Having got the quid pro quo, Lord Spencer put them off with an inquiry by the officials into the conduct of the officials. He did not know anything about Mr. George Bolton except what he had seen in the newspapers; but that gentleman did not seem to be a likely person to bring himself in guilty if he had to decide the question. The Home Secretary asked who was to be sent to make the inquiry, and said that Lord Spencer could not go himself. Nobody asked that Lord Spencer should go himself; but he could send someone, and could act on the decision of that person. He thought it was a reasonable proposal that some English lawyer connected with no Party should make a fair and impartial inquiry. They had now in prison four men who had been sentenced to penal servitude for life; and the question before the House was—Did they think that the hearing had been fairly conducted, not so much into their innocence, as into the question whether there should be a second trial? On that question he would give his vote for the Amendment of his hon. Friend opposite, notwithstanding what had fallen from the Home Secretary as to the aspersion it would cast upon Earl Spencer. He thought, however, that his hon. Friend would get a little more support if he were to strike out of the Amendment the earlier part of it, which expressed dissatisfaction with the general administration of the law, and would limit it to the words—

"This House humbly assures Her Majesty that it would ensure much greater confidence in the administration of the Law in Ireland if a full and public inquiry were granted into the execution of Myles Joyce, and the continued incarceration of Patrick Joyce, Thomas Joyce, Martin Joyce, and John Casey."

MR. HARRINGTON said, he had no objection to amend his proposed Amendment in the manner suggested by the hon. Member for Northampton.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment,

To leave out all the words after the words "and humbly," to the word "innocent," inclusive.—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment," put, and negatived.

Question proposed,

"That the words 'and this House humbly assures Her Majesty that it would ensure much greater confidence in the administration of the Law in Ireland if a full and public inquiry were granted into the execution of Myles Joyce and the continued incarceration of Patrick Joyce, Thomas Joyce, Martin Joyce, and John Casey,' be inserted after the word 'us' in paragraph 9."

MR. GREGORY said, that the question before the House was one entirely free from Party character, and resolved itself merely into one of what would be the effect upon the Executive Government in Ireland. They had had a capital conviction before a Judge and jury, or rather three successive convictions, for a crime of no ordinary atrocity, and also verdicts against five other men; and it was now sought practically to disturb those convictions, and to constitute the House of Commons, for that case, a Court of Criminal Appeal. He hardly thought it a very proper tribunal for the purpose; but, as it was sought to impose the duty upon it, it was necessary to examine the case upon which it was founded calmly, dispassionately, and even judicially. It depended mainly upon a statement made by the informer, Casey, supplemented by some inferences of the hon. Gentleman who originated the Motion, to which he would subsequently advert. Now, Casey was avowedly a principal in one of the most atrocious crimes ever committed. He had, upon oath, on three several trials given his account of the transaction; but he subsequently made a statement involving other persons as the criminals than those against whom his evidence was directed. Now, as a general rule, when a man gave you two different versions of the same transaction you disbelieved both; but, in this instance, the evidence of Casey was not only corroborated by other evidence, but two of the men who were executed confessed their guilt, and five others pleaded guilty to the indictment. As regarded the independent witnesses, the main evidence was that of the three Joyces who followed and tracked the prisoners. Their evidence was wholly unimpeached; there was no allegation against their character, nor any motive or animosity against the accused attributed to them. They followed the prisoners for two miles; they were within about 20 yards of them when the murder was committed; and the prisoners being well known to them it was easy for them to identify them. It was alleged that it was a dark night, and that, the faces of the men being blackened, the Joyces could not recognize them; but it was not always necessary to see a man's face to identify him. You follow a man you know in the street, and you recognize him by his figure, walk, gait, and bearing. You walk up to him and accost him on the strength of that, and you are generally right. With respect, again, to the blackening of the faces, it was a singular thing that the counsel for the defence had never ventured to ask a single question on the subject. It was admitted that the counsel were informed of the depositions made by the boys, such as they were, and they had four witnesses put into the box by the Crown who could have answered the question. How could the defence have been prejudiced by the answer?—because, if it had been in the negative, it only left the case as it ultimately went to the jury. With regard to Myles Joyce, it would have been a convenience if they could have had the confessions of the two men; but it seemed that there was a rule in the Irish Office which prevented their being produced. They had, however, the statement of Lord Spencer that there was nothing in these declarations which would prevent the inference that Myles Joyce had been a party to the committal of the crime, even if he had not actually struck the blow. It must be remembered that there was a common belief among ignorant men that if a prisoner had not actually struck the blow he was not guilty. As to the five men now under penal servitude, they had deliberately pleaded guilty, and now they sought to withdraw their plea. But if they were totally innocent of the crime, where had they been when it took place? What evidence did they give of their whereabouts on the occasion. Some of them presumably were married men with children, and they might have called their children as witnesses if they had been at their homes. The hon. Member who brought forward this Motion had made great use of the brief of the Crown; but, for himself, he would like to see the brief for the defence as well. If an alibi was a true one it was a complete defence, and it seemed strange that if these men were totally innocent there was no such evidence brought forward by the defence. Why, again, should not Casey have given the right names in the first instance? It was evidence of the crime that was wanting—not evidence against anyone in particular—and there was no reason why he should have given false evidence. He had deliberately made a statement against these men, and it had been a voluntary one. It had been he himself who had opened negotiations with the Crown. For his own part, under all the circumstances, he could not but look upon this

Mr. Gregory

Amendment and the manner in which it had been treated as an attempt to frustrate the maintenance of law and order in Ireland, and as an attack upon the Executive in that country. Although he was opposed to the whole Irish policy of Her Majesty's Government, he considered it his duty to support them on this occasion by voting against the Amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND said, he must complain of the tone of the speeches delivered by Members of the Government in the debate. The desire of the Irish Members was to bring a very doubtful case to a just issue; but, judging from the fierceness and the language of the Home Secretary, one would imagine that they were conspiring together to upset law and order in Ireland. In any remarks he (Mr. W. Redmond) might make he did not expect to alter the determination of the Government. In dealing with the present case they were holding up to view the whole system of the administration of the law in Ireland. The great evil and cause of the failure of the Government of Ireland was that, instead of placing the administration of affairs beyond suspicion, Her Majesty's Government did all they could to fill the minds of the people with suspicious feelings. It should be remembered that when the murder took place, and the trial took place, Ireland was in the midst of a violent agrarian agitation. The Executive were anxious to obtain a conviction, and as a result the trial of the men in question was hurried on in an unsatisfactory manner. The people of Ireland could not understand why such a reasonable thing as an inquiry should be refused. He had travelled throughout Ireland during the Recess, and he could inform the House that the conclusion the people of Ireland arrived at was that the Government, in refusing the inquiry, refused it because it would reveal a most decided and terrible miscarriage of justice, and that Her Majesty's Government wanted to shield Earl Spencer and other Government officials in Dublin Castle from the consequences of their acts. He believed, and Ireland believed, that if that inquiry was still refused, that that was the reason, and the sole reason, for it. It was impossible to deny that there were circumstances connected with the case which threw grave doubts on the correctness of the verdict. When such a reasonable doubt existed it was obviously the duty of the Government to institute an inquiry. He warned the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government that there could be nothing more fatal to the future administration of justice in Ireland, and nothing more calculated to intensify the hatred of the Irish people for the English Government, than a refusal to grant a full and fair inquiry into a case which was so admittedly doubtful.

Mr. MELLOR said, that an inquiry had already been made by Earl Spencer himself; he had not left it to any subordinate, but had made every inquiry himself, and had consulted the Judge who tried the case. The Judge was perfectly satisfied with the verdict, and to grant a fresh inquiry, when no fresh facts had been brought to light, would be to cast a most unjust reflection on the conduct of the highest officials in the country. There was no ground for casting such a reflection upon them; and though, if any fresh evidence had been brought forward, he would support an examination into the whole case, he saw no grounds for asking the Government to reconsider their attitude in the matter. By granting the inquiry asked for, the House would be declaring that there was reason to believe that the independent witnesses had committed perjury for the purpose of obtaining the conviction of innocent men. It was impossible, after reading the evidence in the case and considering all the facts, to adopt the views of hon. Members who supported the Amendment. The Lord Lieutenant and the Irish officials could have had no possible interest in this case but to see that justice was done. This was in no sense a political crime. What could it matter to the Lord Lieutenant or the other officials whether Myles Joyce was convicted or not? Therefore, they ought not to be censured for the action which they took. The hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) said it was the duty of the Crown to put the two dying declarations, of which so much had been said, in evidence; but the House should remember that the prosecuting counsel had to exercise his discretion in the matter. It was known to the counsel for the defence, and to everybody in Court at the time of the trials, that at the Coroner's inquest Police-constable Johnson said that the boys had stated that the persons who came into the house had blackened faces. The prisoners' counsel might have satisfied themselves on that point by cross-examining Johnson; but this they did not do, although Johnson was called by the Attorney General, so that they could put any question to him. It was unfair, under such circumstances, to say that the counsel for the Crown failed in his duty in not putting in these statements, or in not communicating them to the counsel for the defence. Inquiry had been made by the highest officials, and the result was that the Lord Lieutenant and everyone else were satisfied that it would be dangerous to reopen this case; and if they did so, case after case might similarly be reopened.

MR. LEWIS said, it was admitted on both sides that the case had been stated with great power and fulness, and his excuse for interposing for a few moments must rest on this—he was not aware that any Member from Ireland had expressed himself adverse to the Amendment; and he took the opportunity of saying he felt bound to disagree from the course most unfortunately taken by the three hon. Members who had spoken from the Conservative side. Looking at the Amendment as it stood, it pointed to a new inquiry; whereas what was really meant was a new trial. There had been a great confusion of terms throughout the debate; and when they spoke about a new trial, as the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) did, although that hon. Member might think such a thing possible, yet they knew that the law permitted no such thing to be done. He (Mr. Lewis) supposed that what was meant was that the Lord Lieutenant was to act as if it were a new trial, and be playing the part of Judge and jury, going over, as if he were a Judge, each case tried and decided by Judge and jury under proper process of law. Now, if that was so, he must say, taking the matter as it was supported, there was no case. The beginning and the end of it was the recantation of the evidence of the approver, Thomas Casey. The Home Secretary, in his very able speech, pointed out—and, as it was a point not to be forgotten, it might be repeated—Casey was not an informer on whose evidence conviction of the prisoners rested. He was merely a redundant witness, brought in for the purpose of supplementing the mass of evidence that supported the prosecution, and was introduced solely for the purpose of removing all possible doubt. It seemed to him that in calling this approver the Crown counsel rather overdid his case than supported it. But, putting his evidence aside, if the verdict was not to be supported, then no verdict in the United Kingdom in a murder trial could be sustained. On the other hand, if this verdict could justifiably be attacked, how could the administration of justice be carried on in any Court in the United Kingdom? Complaint was made that the test the Home Secretary put as to the mode of investigation was not a proper one; but it was a very proper one. If this man's new evidence was right, then other men ought to be put on their trial who had not been tried, for he pointed to A. and B. as guilty; and, therefore, if his evidence was to be credited, they ought to be put on trial; and, if they were, would any jury deliberate for a second in coming to a conclusion? The Crown would be told hereafter—"The witnesses you brought forward on a former occasion are now convicted of perjury, and you produce them for convicting in the present trial." Here was a kind of composite case. Was the informer to be credited as regarded half the prisoners, but perjured as regarded the other half? That seemed to him an impossible position to take; and when they raised the question of identification there was the same trouble as regarded the five who acknowledged themselves guilty as the five who did not. With regard to what had been said about the blackened faces, all he could say was that he could just as much identify a man from his back as from his face. As the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) had pointed out, if they saw a man whose gait, whose manner, whose dress was perfectly well known to them, they did not want to see his face to identify him in the street many yards off. He was startled and grievously disappointed to find the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke), with his reputation, condescend to such puerilities as he did. What did he think of most importance? He, with his knowledge of the law, asked for an inquiry; and two things he put forward in support of his view—first, that after the two first prisoners were convicted, and before the jury were sworn for the next case, the Judge made some observations on their guilt. But if the Judge did so, was that any reason for attacking a verdict arrived at by any independent jury? Another objection was that an adjournment of the trial was refused. Now, assuming that was an improper or unwise exercise of discretion, was it a reason why the solemnity of the administration of justice should be despised and condemned, and Judge, jury, and counsel be accused of being engaged in a conspiracy? He would venture to say, if the House were for a moment to attempt to interfere in this case, they must not expect to have law and order abiding in Ireland. The Opposition in that House had frequently to complain of the inaction of the present Government in Ireland; and he would ask hon. Gentlemen around him how they could consistently turn round upon the Administration, now that they were supporting the due administration of law in that country? How could they now censure Her Majesty's Government for the legitimate performance of their duty? He would not be representing the opinion of his constituents if he were to join in this attack on the Government. All he could say, with great humility, was, he deeply regretted to find the Amendment had any support amongst Conservative Members. It was greatly to be regretted that they, who had so often had to support the Government in protecting life and property, should, in reference to the punishment of one of the most dreadful butcheries that ever disgraced a civilized country, be called upon to cast stones at a Government standing by a Judge and jury in the due administration of the law. He sincerely hoped the House would not entertain the Motion.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY observed, that the more this case was discussed in the House the more painful it became. It had gone beyond the question of administration of justice in Ireland, and touched vital points in the administration of justice in England also. The question of the propriety of withholding from a jury the dying declarations that were made by two men—one of whom was fatally injured, and the other only recovered after a protracted illness—was a question that had been debated by lawyers on both sides of the House; but he was surprised to hear his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Mellor) contend that a prosecutor's counsel was right in not placing these dying declarations before the Judge and jury. Personally, he had always thought it was the duty of counsel in England to put everything before the jury that could conduce to the elucidation of the truth. Did anyone mean to say that the great discrepancies shown by these depositions, as compared with the statements made by the witnesses, would have had no influence on the minds of the jury who had heard the case? He had reason to believe, from what he had heard stated, that the Judge was aware of the existence of these depositions; and yet was it possible that the Judge should have known, and yet should have stopped one of the jurymen from asking a question respecting them? It was said that the boy who made them was raving; but, if so, why did Mr. Brady take them? Why was that declaration made in which Michael Joyce stated, among other things, that the men had black upon their faces? The young brother of that witness, when he was supposed to be dying, though he recovered after many months, also made a statement to the same effect. When he was put on the table to be examined he was asked whether he understood the nature of an oath, and when he answered that he did not he was told to stand down. Where was that boy during the three or four months before the trial? [Mr. CALLAN: At George Bolton's.] He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) knew where the boy was, and he did not need hon. Gentlemen to interrupt him in that way. Why was not the boy, in the meantime, instructed in the value of an oath, in order that his evidence could have been admitted? He had read over and over again that a Judge had postponed a trial for the express purpose of allowing an important witness to be instructed in the nature of an oath. This murder was undoubtedly the most atrocious crime that had come under the notice of civilized Ireland or England during the present century, and was committed within 25 miles of his own house. Such a concatenation of depravity and wickedness as had attended the circumstances of this murder—the perjury committed admittedly by the ap-prover; the perjury admitted in the confession to the clergy; the utter absence of knowledge of even the existence of a God on the part of some of the witnesses, filled his mind with perfect horror. As to the condition of Ireland, no one was doing good service to the Irish nation who excited the minds of the Irish people to believe that the Lord Lieutenant was himself personally criminal in this matter. ["Oh, oh!" from the Home Rule Benches.] Did anyone, then, think that the Lord Lieutenant was personally criminal in this matter? [Mr. BIGGAR: Yes, yes.] Any Member who made such accusations was only exciting prejudices against the best case that could be brought forward, that would be fatal to its calm consideration by that House. Personally, he made no charge against the Executive, he made no charge against the jury, and he made no charge against the Judge. As to making a charge against the Chief Secretary or the Lord Lieutenant, suggesting that they were actually thirsting for blood, it was too disgusting and too horrible to be even uttered in that House. But there was something more than this. The depositions in question did not touch the guilt of other persons. He could quite understand such declarations not being easy to cross-examine upon when they affected the guilt of other people; but, in this instance, they did nothing more than say that they were unable to accuse anybody, because the faces of the murderers were blackened. He asked how could counsel for the Crown think he was doing his duty when he kept back those declarations, and thus concealed a material fact, which, if believed, would have negatived the evidence on which these men were hanged? The two stories were incompatible. Either the independent witnesses swore truly, or the two young Joyces stated that which was false to the magistrate who took their depositions. His claim was that it should have been left to the jury to see whether those discrepancies could be reconciled. He quite agreed with the Home Secretary that too much reliance should not be placed upon dying confessions; but in the case of Myles Joyce it should be remembered that he was acquitted by his fellow-prisoners even when they admitted their own guilt. But there was one important question he desired to have answered. To whom did these men make the declaration? It was said it was a statement not made to the Governor of the prison, but a solemn statement made to the Resident Magistrate engaged in the case, and that it was made upon oath in the form of a deposition. Was that true, or was it false? Was it possible that in the administration of justice in Ireland a deposition on oath could be taken from a criminal previous to death exculpating himself and inculpating anyone else, and for an official of the Crown to take it? If it was not true that the statement was taken upon oath, why did not some official of the Crown say so? If there was anything in that deposition which would throw light on any part of the affair, why, in the name of the God of justice, was it not produced? It was with the greatest pain that he had come forward in this matter. Everybody knew that he was not in perfect accord with hon. Gentlemen opposite; everybody knew also that his voice had not been silent in denouncing those crimes that were a disgrace to the country during the time they prevailed, and that he endeavoured to put the saddle upon the right horse in such cases if he could; but he could not remain silent there after reading the pamphlet of the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington). The questions were few and simple, and if they were not more satisfactorily answered than they had hitherto been, all he could say was this—that the conclusion which would be come to, not only in Ireland, but in every country where they took the trouble to read these proceedings, was that there was something to conceal. If anyone wanted to know what feeling had been excited in Ireland on this subject, he had only to read the article in The Times of to-day from their own correspondent. It should be remembered that the Archbishop of Tuam had hitherto been a strenuous supporter of law and order, and had acted with a courage that was deserving of the highest honour. Did the Government think they did well to discourage such men? The question would not only be debated in Ireland now, but would go on to be debated, and it would be heard of again in that House. By refusing an inquiry they would greatly embitter the hatred of the Irish people in regard to the manner in which justice was administered. Considering that there were four men now lying under sentence of penal servitude for life who were alleged to be innocent, he saw no good reason why the Lord Lieutenant should not follow the precedent he had set in Kilmartin's case, and send down a Queen's Counsel to investigate the matter. If an inquiry were refused, he should say that justice had been frustrated in Ireland, and not for the first time.

MR. MACFARLANE explained that it would have been very difficult for him to have voted for the Amendment as it originally stood. He should have been obliged to explain that his vote went only in favour of an inquiry, and not as endorsing in the smallest degree the aspersions that had been cast upon many of the officials of the Crown in Ireland. He was sorry such a charge was made against Lord Spencer, because he could not believe that any Nobleman would lend himself to such a thing. There were three reasons which should induce the Government to grant an inquiry. The first was the possibility that there had been a miscarriage of justice; the second, and the most important one, was that the public was convinced, rightly or wrongly—a very large mass of the public—that injustice had been done. That was not desirable in any country, and least of all in Ireland. But there was another reason, and that was the possibility that an inquiry might enable them to deal with this perjured villain, Thomas Casey. Let him be asked to swear to the truth of the statement which he now made in contradiction of the statement he had previously made, and then it would be in the power of the Government to prosecute Mr. Casey for perjury, and that of itself would be a great advantage, because a greater villain never walked the earth, by his own confession. It was very much to be regretted that the dying deposition included in the brief for the Crown had been withheld from the counsel for the defence. No one had noticed the particular point that Michael Joyce never said that he did not recognize the men; on the contrary, there was a distinct statement that he did. The reason why the Government, as he understood it, refused an inquiry was that it would discredit justice in Ireland. But he did not think that justice could be further discredited than it was in Ireland. He was sorry the Government had made such a determined stand, because he thought they had made a mistake. He trusted the Government would reconsider the question and grant this inquiry.

MR. ROUNDELL said, he had listened to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) with extreme regret, because he considered that the question of the administration of justice was one far too sacred and too important to be made a matter of Party politics. He was content to express his strong conviction of the utter groundlessness of the charges which had been brought against the Irish Government, to protest against this attempt to impeach the administration of justice in connection with these murders, and to rest the vindication of the conduct of these trials and of the action of the Lord Lieutenant upon the speeches which had been delivered by various Members of the Government. His object in rising was to express his strong and very deep sense of the utter mischievousness and the wicked recklessness of these charges, which had been brought upon the flimsiest foundation, and which had been trumped up for Party purposes in order to discredit the administration of justice.

MR. HARRINGTON rose to Order. He wished to know from the Speaker whether the hon. Member was in Order in asserting that he and those hon. Members who supported his Amendment had trumped up charges for political purposes?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not in Order in stating that hon. Members have trumped up charges with that motive. The hon. Gentleman, I am sure, will withdraw that expression.

MR. ROUNDELL begged to withdraw the expression, with an expression of regret for having used it. He would say that these charges struck at the very root of the administration of justice in Ireland; and if the Resolution were carried it would render government impossible in that country. It was impossible to reprobate too strongly the conduct of those who were dealing this blow at the administration of justice in Ireland, or the political profligacy of those who were willing to play ducks and drakes with such a sacred subject for Party purposes. Some hon. Members appeared to be content to cast common honesty, patriotism, and national interests to the winds as long as they could embarrass the Government. The object of the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington), and of those who acted with him, was evidently to discredit the administration of justice in Ireland.

Mr. CALLAN rose to Order. He wished to know whether the hon. Member was justified in saying that the object of any Member of that House was to discredit the administration of justice?

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not gather that the hon. Member made such a charge.

Mr. CALLAN: Those were his words.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member had not completed his sentence.

Mr. ROUNDELL said, he had observed that the object of the hon. Member for Westmeath, and of those who acted with him, was evidently to discredit the administration of justice in Ireland.

Mr. GORST rose to Order. The language of the hon. Member was quite clear; and he wished to know whether the hon. Member was in Order in using it? The statement made by the hon. Member was that the object of the Mover of the Amendment to the Address, and of those who acted with him, was to discredit the administration of justice.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member did not appear to have finished his sentence. He used some words which did not reach my ear. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will repeat those words?

Mr. ROUNDELL: What I said was that their object was to discredit the administration of justice in Ireland.

Mr. MITCHELL HENRY: I rise to Order. Is that expression Parliamentary?

Mr. SPEAKER: I cannot say that the hon. Member, in attributing motives of that kind to hon. Members of this House, is regular, or is using Parliamentary language. After that expression of opinion, I have no doubt that the hon. Member will withdraw the observation.

Mr. ROUNDELL said, that after the ruling of the Chair he would at once withdraw the expression. The object of the hon. Member for Westmeath, and of those who acted with him, was to prevent, if possible, the renewal of the Prevention of Crime Act—an Act which, in his judgment, alone answered for such measure of law and order as now—outwardly at least—prevailed in Ireland. Of this he was sure—that he spoke with the full assent of the great majority of hon. Members on both sides of the House when he said, deliberately, with the strongest emphasis and with the deepest conviction, that the renewal of that Act, in its main provisions at least, and possibly with an extension of some of its provisions to the United Kingdom, was a vital necessity, paramount in importance over all minor considerations of its possible effect upon the fortunes of this or that Ministry.

Mr. GIBSON said, that a Motion like that now before the House was one which would always receive the attention and anxious consideration of all Parties; and, therefore, he was not surprised to find that hon. Members had given great attention to this question. For the purposes of argument, he was content to pass by the magnitude and the atrocity of these murders. It was conceded that there was no reflection on the Judge who presided at the trial. It was also conceded that the juries, upon the evidence submitted to them, were within their rights in the way in which they had performed their duties; and it was further admitted, and not to be denied, that the prisoners had the advantage of the defence of the Queen's Counsel and junior counsel they themselves had selected. These being matters of great importance, and out of the controversy, what remained? It was sought to set aside trials that were had before that Judge and before those juries, and with the advantage of that defence, and also to repeal judicial proceedings in which four men, now alleged to be innocent, had themselves elected in open Court to plead guilty. Of course, he need hardly say that propositions of that immense breadth required the most close and jealous examination when they were gravely submitted to any tribunal, or to any assembly; and it was obvious that a proposition to set aside or impeach or invalidate proceedings of that nature could not be gravely entertained without very powerful arguments, and without almost overwhelming proofs. He would not go at all into the details of the evidence; but he would take the three chief, broad facts which stood out in conspicuous relief—first, that of the 10 men who were charged with being parties to this murder, nine of them, at some time or other, openly admitted their guilt. That was a great and important fact. The next great fact by which he had been struck was that three independent witnesses, not mixed up or involved in the crime, had given evidence, and given it at once, two days after the offence, from which they had never varied or swerved. That evidence was supported by the fact that nine out of the 10 had admitted their guilt. The other fact to which he would refer was of less importance—namely, that there were two approvers; and he put that last, because he thought it the least important. It merely accentuated facts which had, in reality, an independent existence. Those being the broad, essential facts that struck the mind, what was it that first started this inquiry, and put it within the purview of examination? It was the fact that these approvers had made a statement inconsistent with their previous evidence. He would, however, pass by the approvers with the observation that at one time they admitted—and one of them still admitted—that they were guilty of murder; and they now asked to be credited with implicit belief in their recent statements, because they had now added the further admission that they had been guilty of a perjury which assisted in the conviction and execution of a man whom they knew at the time to be innocent. The approvers' case was that they were suborned by the officers of the Crown, who possessed full knowledge of the facts, deliberately to come forward and swear away the life of an innocent man. He could only say that that was a most terrific charge, and, just as it was a terrific charge, so it rendered them bound to examine it closely, and to see that they were not carried by their feelings to a hurried conclusion—one which they were not coerced to by other cogent evidence. When they were asked to assume such a state of unheard-of crimes the question occurred to them, what was the motive that drove these men to such an appalling state of crime and wickedness? This was not a case of loyalty and disloyalty, or landlord and tenant; it was not a case of class hatreds or sectarian animosities; it was a case of peasants against peasants. He felt bound to say, with the advantage of his professional training as a barrister, that, looking at the matter as closely as he could, he was unable to arrive at the conclusion at which they were asked to arrive. The Archbishop of Tuam had made himself the medium of communication in regard to this extraordinary statement of the approvers; and he had no doubt that when the Archbishop found himself the depository of it, he thought it his duty to communicate it to the Head of the Executive in Ireland. That was the state of facts presented to the House of Commons last August; but he would make neither observation nor criticism on the way in which the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War undertook that the matter should be examined into. At any rate, Earl Spencer had felt himself bound to examine into the question; and the letter of Sir Robert Hamilton, with the Memorandum attached, embodied the result of that examination. That letter was not the isolated work of the Viceroy himself. He had able advisers, and no doubt the Lord Chancellor of Ireland himself, a most able and capable man, assisted in every step of the examination. That being so, they were asked to regard that inquiry as naught, because the three officials, whose names had been referred to, were heard in the matter and took some part in it. He failed to find anything to lead to the conclusion that, beyond supplying the Executive with such information as they were asked for, those officials took any more active part in the inquiry. It was impossible to make an inquiry into the matter without inquiring of those three men what their acts had been, and the only other persons who could possibly be mixed up in the matter were the two informers. The statement of the informers was, of course, known to the Executive; for it was contained in the letter which the Executive received from the Archbishop. With all the information thus before him, Earl Spencer had exercised the grave responsibility of deciding on the case. It was, however, urged that apart altogether from the question of the informers, in consequence of certain evidence having been kept back at the time of the trial, which had been given at the Coroner's inquest, in reference to the statements by the two boys Joyce that the murderers had their faces blackened, an inquiry should now be granted. It was asserted that this evidence was kept back, not through carelessness or neglect, but deliberately, as a piece of malpractice, knowing that such evidence would advance the case of the prisoners. That was the charge which was now made. But where was the motive on the part of those who were thus charged with such malpractices? This was not a case between class and class, but between Galway peasants on the one hand, and Galway peasants on the other; and several convictions, admittedly just, had already taken place in regard to the murders. Where was the motive to induce the Crown counsel to be guilty of such a malpractice? A great deal had been said with regard to depositions; but there were two depositions in the possession of the prisoners' counsel—namely, the depositions of Collins and Johnson, made at the inquest, in which they said that the two boys had told them the men had blackened faces. [Mr. HARRINGTON: No.] He was dealing with the debate as it had gone on; and the Solicitor General for Ireland had made that statement in the House on the responsibility of his position. He confined himself to the declaration of the Solicitor General, who pledged himself to the fact that the depositions of Collins and Constable Johnson substantially embodied the declarations of these two boys, which were made on the morning after the murder, and were in the hands of prisoners' counsel. The case of the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) was that the depositions of the two boys were not in the possession of the prisoners' counsel. He (Mr. Gibson) had no means of examining these matters any more than other hon. Gentlemen; but he accepted the statements that were made on the responsibility of the Solicitor General for Ireland. The two depositions purported to be dying declarations; but it was quite certain that the declaration of Patrick Joyce could not, from any aspect of the case, be made evidence as a dying declaration. [Mr. HARRINGTON: Why not?] The person who made the declaration was not dead. On the contrary, he was produced in Court on the trial, and it had been pointed out by hon. Members that he was unable to be examined owing to the circumstance that he was not sufficiently informed to understand the nature of an oath. Therefore he assumed that, whatever that particular declaration might be called, it could not be made evidence in any shape or form in itself, or by the persons to whom it was given. Of course, that left the case of Michael Joyce untouched; but the declarations of both boys were noticed by Collins and Constable Johnson, and the reference to them would be found in their depositions. He was glad that the fact had been stated, because, no doubt, it was perfectly right that the prisoners' counsel should be fully seized and possessed of every topic that might be ultimately urged, and that could throw light upon the transaction, leaving them to the exercise of their own judgment whether they would use it in the elucidation of the trial from their point of view. He quite agreed with that proposal, especially in a case of this sort, where identification was of such extreme importance. It was manifest to anyone who read the statements of Collins and Johnson that, although they were only giving what might be called hearsay evidence, they had furnished the prisoners' counsel with materials which they might use if they thought proper by means of cross-examination or otherwise. Of course, it was always possible to raise an argument upon questions in connection with trials which had taken place by suggesting that something might have happened differently, or that greater or less force ought to have been given to particular points. He did not think that any inquiry whatever could be upheld if that class of reasoning were to have too much weight attached to it. All they had to see was that the prisoners had been fairly tried, and that those who defended them had been fully and fairly instructed. If that were done it ought to go far to satisfy the House that the trial was one which ought not to be lightly set aside or impeached. There was only one other topic he desired to make a comment upon, and it had reference to the four men who were now undergoing penal servitude, and who were alleged to be innocent. If that were really so, it was a serious matter. Myles Joyce was dead, and, of course, this discussion could not have any effect upon his case. But these four men were alive, and there might be an urgent desire to have the case examined into fully in their interests. But the men themselves deliberately pleaded guilty in open Court. There was no question of jury or prosecutor at all; but in open Court they pleaded guilty before the Judge. There was no question that the Judge took any improper steps in the case; and it would require an overwhelming case to his mind to induce him to arrive at the conclusion that any inquiry should be granted as to whether men were innocent who themselves had deliberately pleaded guilty in open Court. He made no reflection on the action of the clergyman. He had read the letter written by that gentleman, and it seemed to him that the rev. gentleman was anxious to do that which he considered wisest and best for those who were, perhaps, members of his congregation. If he had erred, no doubt it was from a desire to do what he thought was for their good; but he (Mr. Gibson) was certainly unable to arrive at the conclusion that the House of Commons, acting judicially upon the facts as disclosed at present, could arrive at the conclusion that four men were innocent who had deliberately admitted their guilt. He found that afterwards—some days afterwards—they presented a Memorial to the Lord Lieutenant asking for the clemency of the Crown on the ground, not that they were innocent, for they did not assert their innocence, but because they had not taken the same part, and that their guilt was of a less degree than that of others.

MR. HARRINGTON asked where that was stated?

MR. GIBSON said, that it had been stated by the Solicitor General for Ireland. [Cries of "No!"]

MR. HARRINGTON said, he thought that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was mistaken. Where was the Memorial? Would the right hon. and learned Gentleman produce the Memorial?

MR. GIBSON said, he was quite aware that it was not in the pamphlet published by the hon. Member (Mr. Harrington); but the Solicitor General for Ireland had openly made that statement in the House on the responsibility of his position. As he had stated before, he had no more opportunity of examining these statements than any other hon. Member; but he accepted them on the responsibility of the Solicitor General. What the Solicitor General said was, that in a Memorial presented some time after these men had admitted their guilt they asked for the clemency of the Lord Lieutenant, not on the ground that they were innocent, but that they had not taken the same part, and were not present in the same degree, as others. In this case, in order to establish the right of inquiry, it seemed to him necessary to arrive at the conclusion that three witnesses, actuated by some petty and private malice, had knowingly sworn away the lives of innocent men. That was certainly one of the propositions made; and the second was that the Government officials, with full knowledge of the facts of the case, conspired to get the conviction of innocent men by the subornation of perjury and the suppression of evidence. That was putting the matter in a form of precision, and these were certainly two enormous charges. He had heard the statement of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), in the course of his very able and closely argued speech, and he assumed that the debate would not close without some indication from the Law Officers of England as to what their opinion in the matter was. It was not desirable that an important matter, involving so many grave issues, should close without a full expression of their views; and he believed the House would await the opinions of the Law Officers of England with much interest. They could never relieve any Executive of the responsibility of their position. If men were in Office carrying on the details of the Executive Government, possessing the right of making examination into these cases, and wielding also the Prerogative of mercy, upon them must always rest the enormous responsibility of the just and fair discharge of their duties. In this case, as far as he could see, all the facts had been before the Executive, and were before them now; and with a full knowledge of the facts, for the reasons they had given in the Memorandum, and for the reasons which they had given since, they had arrived at the conclusion that this was not a case in which any further inquiry should be granted. Under those circumstances, he was unable to support the Amendment which had been moved.

[Third Night.]

MR. O'BRIEN remarked, that the speech announced early in the evening by the Home Secretary had now been delivered; but he did not know that it added a great deal to the debate, except in enabling hon. Members to draw a contrast, which was somewhat humiliating to Irishmen, between the Irish Tory officials and those English Tory Gentlemen who, one after another, had got up in the House and evinced a desire for inquiry in a case where the life of one innocent man and the liberty of four other innocent men had been sacrificed. A great portion of the debate had been diverted by the Representatives of the Government into a perfectly needless defence of what the Judge, the jury, and Earl Spencer had done in reference to the case as it was presented on the trial in Green Street. But that was not the question before the House. The question was whether the evidence in this case was falsely and fraudulently presented at Green Street. The question was whether the Government knew very well, or the officials had realized very well, that everything in the case depended upon the evidence of the three Joyces not being discredited; whether, knowing that they did not deliberately suppress two vital depositions which were in their printed briefs before them, and keep them from the knowledge of the prisoners' counsel; and whether Earl Spencer had not up to that hour suppressed two other dying declarations which still further discredited, and altogether shattered, the story of these three witnesses. He did not propose to waste the time of the House in discussing the improbability or the impossibility of the story told by the three Joyces. He had himself gone over the ground, and he could hardly imagine anybody, except an Irish Solicitor General with a handsome fee in his pocket, going over that ground, and coming to any other conclusion than that the story of the Joyces was, from beginning to end, as wild and as impudent a fabrication as was ever made. It was not necessary to dwell upon that. He would not even follow hon. Members into the question whether the two boys were right or wrong in saying that the murderers had blackened faces and wore white jackets. All he would point out was that, although the Government now raised the question that the boy Michael

Joyce was raving when his statement was taken, yet Mr. Newton Brady administered to him an oath believing him to be capable of understanding it, and took down his sworn deposition with the knowledge that he was dying. He would only make one other remark, and it was that in a somewhat similar case in the County Clare a few disjointed words were heard from a dying man—Doherty—and upon those few words gurgling in a dying man's throat Francis Hynes was hanged. The question was not whether this was right or wrong, but whether it was within the province of the Crown Solicitor to pronounce these boys' depositions worthless, and to smother them up. Was it the province of Mr. Peter O'Brien, who had the depositions in his brief before him, and who knew that the prisoners' counsel had not seen them, to conceal them? He did not know where the line was to be drawn if a Crown Solicitor was to have a discretion in a matter of this sort. Was it to be tolerated, when the Crown opened a case upon a particular theory, that a Government official was to be at liberty to hide away every bit of evidence that conflicted with, or utterly destroyed and shattered, that theory? He thought the way in which the case had been presented to the House by the various Members of the Government who had spoken in the debate was not much more creditable than the way in which it had been presented to the jury in Green Street. The Home Secretary, to some extent, had adopted a more judicial and a fairer tone; but the speeches, both of the Irish Solicitor General and of the ex-Chief Secretary for Ireland, were speeches adapted for English Members who were ready to listen to them, but who would not listen to the arguments of Irish Members. The Government had the hardihood to assert, and it had been re-asserted that night, that the whole of the case of those who desired inquiry was founded upon the statement of the informer Casey; the fact being that Casey's statement might be struck out of the case altogether, and their claim for inquiry would not be injured. The ex-Chief Secretary, in particular, did all he could to spoil the perspective of the case by labouring on certain little discrepancies between the statement of Casey to the police, and to the Archbishop of Tuam, and he had eloquently denounced Casey as a murderer and a perjurer. Undoubtedly, Casey was a murderer and a perjurer of the deepest dye; but so was Patrick Delaney, the Phoenix Park murderer; and he wondered that the Crown did not remember, when they put him on the witness table in Dublin that day, that the object this murderer of Lord Frederick Cavendish now had was not to bring other murderers to justice, but to swear away the liberties of political offenders. Her Majesty's Government had thought Casey worth paying £1 a-week to until he went to confession, and they had thought it worth making more than one attempt to bribe him to leave the country. Let them deny that if they could. He thought he should be able to show, by simply reading the Memorandum, that the discrepancies and contradictions were in Earl Spencer's own statement, and not in Casey's testimony. He would give the House one specimen. Earl Spencer said, speaking of an interview between Mr. Brady and Casey—

"It is to be remembered that this happened on Saturday, the trials being fixed to commence on the following Monday, and that the case was considered by the Crown as being perfectly complete and conclusive against all the prisoners."

If it had been so considered, why should the Government allow a man to go free who was admittedly one of the murderers?

"The nature of Casey's evidence having been reported to the Attorney General, it was determined to accept him as an approver. On the following Monday all the prisoners were brought down to Green Street. Immediately on their arrival Casey sent a message to Mr. Bolton by the Governor, saying he was anxious to see him. Mr. Bolton thereupon went down to the passage below the Court, into which the cells open, accompanied by the Governor and Mr. Brady, R.M."

Why should Mr. Bolton have gone at all if it had been agreed that Casey was to be accepted as an approver? The Memorandum went on to say—

"The Governor called Casey out, and Casey was then informed by Mr. Bolton that his evidence would be accepted, provided he told the entire truth."

It was quite evident that Casey's first statement to Mr. Bolton was not accepted as satisfactory. And why? Because Casey refused to name Myles Joyce among the guilty party; and they had it now admitted in the Memorandum of Earl Spencer that it was not until the men were actually brought down for trial to the Court House that, in a second interview with Mr. Bolton, Casey was accepted as Crown witness. As a matter of fact, with a rope round his neck, he had mended his hand, and made his story tally with that of the three Joyces. It was Mr. Bolton's intention, from the beginning of the case, to have nothing that would conflict or would not exactly square with the testimony of the three Joyces. Hence Casey's first statement was refused, because he would not implicate Myles Joyce. It was for the same reason that Mr. Bolton suppressed the declaration of the dying boys. Why did he suppress them? Because they conflicted with the story of the three Joyces. Upon another and important element in the case, the Government went on the theory—and the whole defence of the Government seemed to go on that theory, for the House had now before it nothing or very little that was not before the jury in Green Street—that everything was clearly brought out at the trial; and, therefore, the House had been favoured with a long defence of the Judge and jury, and the pages of the national journals had been searched for expressions of approval in regard to the conduct of the jury. He wondered the right hon. Gentleman the ex-Chief Secretary, as he made his quotations, did not wince when he referred to journals which he had not hesitated or scrupled in that House to calumniate and to hold up when it suited his purpose to do so as sympathizing with crime. He (Mr. O'Brien) left the House to infer what a pass things had come to with regard to justice in Ireland, when the mere fact that a couple of Catholics had been admitted upon the jury, and a Judge had conducted himself like a gentleman, had to be celebrated as a phenomenon in the national journals. Among other brilliant points made by the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland, there was this one—that for full two years after this trial happened there was no complaint of it in Ireland. He would remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that the scene on the scaffold was hardly known, and it was not supposed that Earl Spencer had in his possession two dying declarations of Myles Joyce's innocence. He would further remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that he himself (Mr. O'Brien) was prosecuted for denouncing the execution as a judicial murder, and such was the state of public feeling in Dublin at the time that the Government were only saved by a majority of one from having the bill thrown out by the Grand Jury. His hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) had openly denounced Earl Spencer for having hanged an innocent man. He was prosecuted for it, but the Government dared not go on with that prosecution. Why was that? It was because they knew very well that the Grand Jury of the City of Waterford would have thrown out their bill. There was something to say in defence of the Judge who tried the Maamtrasna prisoners. The Irish Members did not impugn the Judge or jury in this matter. He was unable to guess what the learned Judge might say now, if he were charging a jury with all that had been discovered since in his possession. It must be remembered that much had been discovered since Mr. Justice Barry was consulted by Earl Spencer in reference to the Memorandum. He (Mr. O'Brien) was anxious to quote to the House what the same learned Judge, Mr. Justice Barry, said in the Clonbur murder case, when he discovered that a dying declaration of vital importance to the prisoner, but not of more vital importance than the two declarations of the dying boys in this case, had been withheld. He had been anxious to quote the language of the learned Judge when he discovered that that dying declaration had been withheld by the representative of the Crown. Unfortunately, he had not the learned Judge's words by him; but he knew that Mr. Justice Barry denounced the conduct of whoever was responsible for the disappearance of that affidavit in language of the gravest censure. The Judge in that case was the same as in this. The Crown Solicitor was the same—it was Mr. George Bolton, who, by an unfortunate coincidence, was in both cases the victim. He (Mr. O'Brien) had heard the same Judge, Mr. Justice Barry, declare at Belfast later, when trying an action against him (Mr. O'Brien) by Mr. Bolton for libel, after hearing Mr. Bolton's evidence, that the disappearance of the affidavit in the Clonbur murder case had never yet been explained. The Home Secretary had taunted him that night with the fact that Mr. George Bolton had been enabled to obtain a certificate of character from an Orange jury in Belfast. No doubt, he had done so. For the only thing he (Mr. O'Brien) had charged Mr. Bolton with—namely, swindling and subornation of perjury, Mr. Bolton had obtained a verdict of £50 from a Belfast jury. He would like now to say a few words about the inquiry. The ex-Chief Secretary had taken upon himself to quote a most misleading report of the speech of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War in reference to the inquiry that was really promised. He thought the right hon. Gentleman might have left the noble Marquess, whose straightforwardness most of them were disposed to recognize, to answer for himself, and to throw some light upon the matter in the course of the discussion. He thought that the ex-Chief Secretary for Ireland might have entitled himself to the charity that was due to defunct politicians, and have allowed the Irish people to forget the peculiar characteristics of his career in Ireland. But the right hon. Gentleman had judged differently; he had thought it necessary to remind them that he still lived. Certainly, he had upon this parting occasion left upon record a speech which was a perfect specimen and epitome of all the qualities that had earned for him the indignation of the people he was supposed to rule, although most likely they had earned for him also the cheers of his Friends in that House. When he had heard the right hon. Gentleman the other night discussing in the most lofty manner the mundane motives that were attributed to the Government in this matter by the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), he could not help wishing that the right hon. Gentleman had given them a little less of his preaching, and had exemplified a little more in practice the virtues he professed. When the right hon. Gentleman was complimenting the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) on his ability and sincerity—qualities which the House would readily recognize without the assistance of the right hon. Gentleman—he might have remembered that he had put the subject of his compliments on a plank bed; had seized his newspaper and plant; that he had defended his action in the House of Commons by imputations which might have ruined the hon. Member's good name, and that he had never yet had the generosity to acknowledge the mistake he had made. This was not the only test the House possessed of the right hon. Gentleman's judgment in Irish affairs. There was not a single case of this kind which had been brought forward by the Irish Members in which the right hon. Gentleman had turned out to be right, and in which the Irish Members had turned out to be wrong. Let them take Kilmartin's case. The right hon. Gentleman exerted himself just as strenuously in that case to prove that the law could do no wrong in Ireland; that Kilmartin was rightly sentenced to penal servitude, and that he ought to remain there. And Kilmartin would have remained there if the view of the right hon. Gentleman had been taken; but an independent investigation was made into that case, such as was asked for now. Mr. Carton was sent down to investigate it on the spot, and the consequence was that Kilmartin was now free. Earl Spencer did not deserve very much credit for liberating him, for he had been mean enough, in discharging the man, to continue the wrong by insinuating that he was guilty after all, and declaring that the remission of the sentence was an exercise of mercy and not of justice. Did any sane man believe that the release of Kilmartin would ever have entered into Earl Spencer's head or heart if it had not been that the opinion of the House of Commons had forced him to liberate an innocent man? As to the quotation from the noble Marquess's speech, the noble Marquess unquestionably did make a general promise only at first; but after the stress of another hour's debate, he made another and a satisfactory promise of a full inquiry; and he (Mr. O'Brien) would put it to the noble Marquess himself whether any man in that House could have dreamt that the inquiry he promised to make was to take the form of a secret conclave in a private room in the Castle conducted by Castle officials? Who was the principal witness in that inquiry—the vital witness in that inquiry? It was Mr. George Bolton, who simply passed a verdict upon himself. Mr. George Bolton was officially suspended, and in disgrace, and it must be said for him that he was in suspension under false pretences. He was suspended on the ground that he was a bankrupt. He was not a bankrupt at all; but, nevertheless, the Government did not venture to reinstate him. Upon the certificate of an English Judge—Mr. Justice Fry—he was declared to be a convicted swindler of a most heartless type, and he was the person who was responsible for the disappearance of a vital affidavit of the Clonbur murder case. He was a man who held two situations, and whose chance of obtaining a pension depended on his finding some reply to Casey's confessions. And this was the sort of man who was practically asked to present a Report upon his own conduct. The Home Secretary, in the earlier part of the evening, hinted that the Irish Members were flying at higher game than George Bolton. He agreed with the right hon. and learned Gentleman most thoroughly. He believed George Bolton to be altogether of the third or fourth order. Earl Spencer said that he had satisfied himself that no inquiry was necessary. He (Mr. O'Brien) thought it would be much more to the point if the noble Earl had satisfied the Irish people as well. Earl Spencer was just as deeply involved in responsibility for these transactions as anybody else. It was a notorious fact that Earl Spencer wrote Mr. George Bolton an autograph letter, thanking him in terms of the highest commendation as a public benefactor for his efforts in the cause of justice. If the Government would lay that autograph letter from Earl Spencer on the Table, and contrast it with the achievements of Mr. Bolton, he was not at all sure that Earl Spencer would derive much advantage from the correspondence. The Government had the power, and the majority of the House apparently would probably go with them, to refuse an inquiry into this case, just as they had the power to hang innocent men; but what would be the opinion of the Irish people all over the world about it? It would be this—that Myles Joyce was murdered, and that Earl Spencer was afraid to face an honest inquiry. The noble Earl was afraid, perhaps, that it might be found that other men had been murdered as well by the same legal machinery. The opinion among the Irish people would be that Her Majesty's Government had found out that they could not rule Ireland except by perjured informers and infamous officials of this kind, and that they had made up their mind to resort to acts in Ireland that would drive the people to revolution if they were tried in England. The only foundations for so-called justice in Ireland were the bayonets of the military and police. One of the most extraordinary and perverse notions which ever entered English heads about Ireland was that Earl Spencer had produced tranquillity in Ireland. On the contrary, he believed Earl Spencer had done more than any other man in their time to interrupt and destroy that process of tranquillity. The ex-Chief Secretary the other night, when he paraded the reduced statistics of undetected crime in Ireland, abstained from referring to the secret statistics of murder under Earl Spencer's rule, and the hankering desire for immolating victims, so that it might be said that there was no undetected crime in Ireland. George Bolton knew his business, and his business was to enable his masters to boast in the House of Commons that there was no undetected crime which had not been unavenged. In this particular case Bolton knew that his best trump was the story of the three Joyces. He determined to stick to it through thick and thin, he destroyed every bit of evidence that collided in any way with it, and he did all he could to tout for information in support of it. In conclusion, he (Mr. O'Brien) would only refer for an instant to the miserable attempts which had been made to explain the vital point in this case—why the two depositions which were before the eyes of Crown counsel were withheld from the eyes of the prisoner's counsel. It had been stated that the subject of those depositions was hinted at in the information of Collins and Constable Johnson at the inquest; but did anybody assert that any full report of that inquest appeared in any newspaper? The prisoners were not represented at the inquest by counsel, and they were not even produced there themselves. Even if they had been present they spoke Irish, and would not have been able to understand what was going on. Then, was it necessary to say that the depositions of these men, Collins and Policeman Johnson, were handed over to the prisoners' counsel? The hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) had most learnedly and ably pointed out the difference between the dying declarations before Mr. Brady and the statements of Collins and Johnson. It was almost a farce for the Irish Members to argue with the majority of that House; and he was sorry to say that they were not in a position to threaten. But he warned the House that, whatever the vote of the House might be, an adverse vote would only exasperate the feeling of the Irish public about Myles Joyce's fate, and sooner or later Earl Spencer, and the Government which harboured him, would repent of the way in which they had dealt with this question.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that in rising at that hour of the night he felt called upon to protest, in the first place, against the most extraordinary manner in which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) had misrepresented the essential points of the case. What could be less fair, as a representation of the reality, than when the right hon. and learned Gentleman again and again laid stress on the fact that four men, whose innocence seemed now so clearly established, had pleaded guilty on their trial at Dublin? Surely, when the right hon. and learned Gentleman made that imputation, he ought to have called the attention of the House to the circumstances under which these unfortunate country peasants, ignorant of the English language, surrounded by everything that could terrify their inexperience and deepen their despair, and in the company of informers who had received every inducement to swear to anything that seemed to suit the case of the Crown, were induced to plead guilty as the only chance of escape from the rope prepared for them by the hands of perjured witnesses. He had been deeply sorry to hear the right hon. and learned Gentleman indulge in such clap-trap in behalf of the case; and he must also protest against that other argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman when he put to the House that stale fallacy—where was the motive of the prosecution for accusing these men, rather than any other men, in the case of peasant against peasant? If the case before the House were not the case of Irish peasants done to death by the zeal of the Crown Prosecutors in Ireland, the House would find no difficulty, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman would find no difficulty, in explaining how, under this system of preparation, a case for the Crown under the Third Empire was made out. In the first place, the prosecuting counsel formed a theory, and in too many cases they went to any length in order to shape their facts so that they might fit in with that theory. Having once seemed to convince themselves by an examination of the facts, that they bore a certain interpretation, thenceforward their official minds were bent not upon a careful and impartial sifting of the evidence, but upon a careful packing of the evidence in order to suit the theory they had preconceived in their minds. There would be no difficulty in suggesting such an explanation if it were an English case; but as it was an Irish case, the right hon. and learned Gentleman harped upon the theme—"Where was the motive?" He (Mr. O'Donnell) thought that whatever might be the conclusion drawn from the course of the debate, as far as it had proceeded—and he was afraid that that conclusion would be fortified by the subsequent stages—an unsatisfactory result would be substantiated by the way the facts of the case had been met by a Liberal Administration. Great interest had been excited by the case in the mind and heart of every Irishman who had observed the action of Her Majesty's Government, from the first moment the matter was brought before them, and at last one of the most law-abiding and order-loving ecclesiastics in Ireland presented the facts of the case to Her Majesty's Government. But the Archbishop of Tuam had been met in a manner that could only tend to exasperate the Irish people, and which was not only an outrage upon justice, but an insult to the intelligence of the Irish people. Certainly, the Government were to be congratulated on the discrimination their officials had displayed in the course of the inquiry. It would be found that, with the exception of the evidence which saved the perjured murderers, they had suppressed the evidence even of the victims themselves, which might have saved an innocent man from the scaffold and others from the horrors of penal servitude. The Government and the Government officials were safe in the House of Commons, in the presence of their majority, and were safe also even when that majority was absent. As had been observed already that evening, it was very easy for Liberal Members to stand up and make speeches in support of the Government, when those Members had abstained from listening to nine-tenths of the Irish case. One after another the supporters of Her Majesty's Government had risen in their places to maintain that the whole of the Irish case rested on Casey's evidence—those Gentlemen who came forward as the advocates of Her Majesty's Government having carefully absented themselves from the House while the most telling and most essential portions of the case were being made known, portions in no way dependent on the repentant admissions of Casey, the perjured Crown witness. The hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien), in the most eloquent and convincing speech which he had just delivered, had laid great stress upon the not very creditable manoeuvre of the late Chief Secretary for Ireland, who did not hesitate to quote from the columns of the national organs expressions of thankful approval of what, at the time, was believed to be the just punishment of a dastardly crime. If it had not been to suit his own purposes, the opinions expressed by the national journals would not have come so glibly from the lips of the right hon. Gentleman, but, on the contrary, he would never have permitted his supporters to know that the national journals had ever condemned outrage, or expressed their approval of the punishment of crime. He (Mr. O'Donnell) asked the House to contrast the present action of the late Chief Secretary for Ireland with his studied reticence for years—his studied suppression of evidence of the most important character with regard to the Irish people and the Irish journals—and he asked the House to judge, when such had been the conduct of the late Chief Secretary under their very eyes, whether it was difficult to understand how it was that inferior officials in another arena resorted to the same shameful system of suppressing evidence? The late Chief Secretary had deliberately stated that even if Earl Spencer had committed a mistake—and by a mistake he meant euphemistically to cover more than what ordinary people called a mistake—that even if Earl Spencer had committed a mistake, it ought to be overlooked in consideration of the success of his administration. Was there ever a more dreadful application of the horrible doctrine that the end justified the means? Was ever such a lesson preached from the most demoralized pulpit inside or outside Christianity? These were the official morals—the governing morals—of the best specimens of Ireland, headed by a Scotch Regenerator of Ireland sent over to administer their affairs. Was it, then, a matter of surprise to find the Boltons, and the Lee Andersons, and all the rest of the official tribe ready to carry out the same official doctrine that the end justified the means? The Irish Members now came to that House to ask for an inquiry into Earl Spencer's mistakes. One of the chief organizers of Earl Spencer's mistakes was Sir Samuel Lee Anderson, for, as if to throw ridicule upon the dignities conferred by the Crown, upon that very day, Anderson, the jury-packer, had received the honour of Knighthood—rising up from his bended knee with all the blushing honours of British chivalry upon him. Her Majesty's Government left uncleared the reputation of the man who had been judicially murdered, and they preferred to leave in life-long slavery innocent men who had been unjustly condemned, rather than run the risk of exposing that which, after all, was probably only one of the minor mistakes of Earl Spencer. Surely, the Prime Minister would not take unkindly a suggestion on this matter which had just occurred to him. He believed that the works of that eminent politician (Mr. Gladstone) had been for some time in preparation for republication, and in due course, no doubt, his famous disquisitions upon King Bomba and the Neapolitan system of government would again be issued to an admiring public. He would suggest to the Premier that it might complete the European idea of his consistency if he would add to the work an Appendix in the form of a Vote under this heading—"The Suppression of Evidence, and the Execution of Innocent Persons, under my Administration of Ireland." If the right hon. Gentleman would do that, he (Mr. O'Donnell) would promise him an European success. He confessed that he was curious to observe the intervention of the English Law Officers in this most important discussion. He should observe with great interest by what process the English Law Officers would be able to reconcile their English countrymen to the possible application in England of those theories in regard to the suppression of evidence by the Crown on which the Crown was so dependent in Ireland. Not only had the depositions of the victims of the murder been suppressed at the trial, but, as had been again and again pointed out, Earl Spencer still continued to suppress the dying depositions of the two criminals who, while acknowledging the justice of their own punishment with their dying breath, and knowing that they were about to be launched into eternity, protested the innocence of Myles Joyce, who, by the mistake of Earl Spencer, was sent to die by their side. The other day, in the North of England, two men were sentenced to death for the murder of a police-constable. One of the men acknowledged his guilt, and emphatically declared the innocence of the other man who had been legally convicted, and who stood, just as he did, condemned to death. In that case, the Crown respited and pardoned the innocent man—the man whose innocence was testified to by the real murderer. They acknowledged his innocence, and it was notorious from one end of the country to the other that it was the solemn dying declaration of the real culprit that was the determining evidence which produced the pardon and liberation of this unoffending man. In the face of that case, which was of public notoriety, was Earl Spencer to be permitted to keep back from the public of this country these dying depositions? He told Her Majesty's Government that they might refuse 10 times, 50 times, or 100 times to produce the depositions; but the Irish Members would in the end drag them from them. Her Majesty's Government must not suppose that a debate that night, or next week, or a month hence, would exhaust the question. The determination of the Irish Members would last as long as the resistance of the Government. They were determined to drag this matter out into the full light of day, and, in the end, Earl Spencer, with all his mistakes and all his official admirers, would be obliged to give up the depositions. The Irish Members would hunt up the present Government until they rendered full satisfaction, and would even follow the matter up with their Successors—an eventuality which might not be far distant. He expected no practical result from the present proceedings; but he believed that in the minds of a vast majority of the English people there was a very strong suspicion that Earl Spencer had very good reasons for avoiding inquiry. Furthermore, he was satisfied of this—that the action of Her Majesty's Government afforded a conclusive argument to justify the Representatives of Ireland in treating that Government as one of the most unscrupulous, one of the most hypocritical, and one of the most cruel Administrations which had ever represented English usurpation in Ireland.

MR. DEASY said, he had not intended to take part in the debate at that late hour; but he had risen to express a hope, with his hon. Friend who had just sat down, that the Attorney General for England would give the House his opinion on the points which had been put forward by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), who had spoken in favour of the view of the Irish Members. In order to give the Law Officers of the Crown an opportunity of making up their minds, he would venture to occupy the attention of the House for a very short time indeed. In doing so, he did not propose to go into the evidence which had been laid before the House in much detail by many hon. Members from those Benches, and from all quarters of the House. He merely wished to say that he did not believe the Members from Ireland would be discharging their duty to their countryman were they to allow this question to remain without being adequately sifted to the bottom. It had been over and over again stated that it was the opinion of 99 out of every 100 persons in Ireland that Myles Joyce was murdered, and that four men were now detained in penal servitude for a crime of which they were innocent. He believed that no Gentleman who had listened to the discussion for the last night or two, if he were not altogether blinded by Party prejudices, could come to any other conclusion than that the case put forward by the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) was irresistible and conclusive. He (Mr. Deasy) could very easily show, he thought, that the points put forward in favour of his hon. Friend's view of the case had not been met by those hon. Gentlemen who had endeavoured to argue against them. One point which struck him as very powerful, and one upon which very little stress had been laid, except by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), was the identification by the so-called independent witnesses of the assassins on a dark night at a distance of 150 or 200 yards. His attention had been directed to this particular point in reading over the very able pamphlet of the hon. Member for Westmeath. In that pamphlet his hon. Friend stated, and the statement could not be contradicted, that, in the daytime, he took a policeman with him from the road to a distance of nearly 200 yards from the point at which the alleged assassins were said to have been identified, to the exact place where they were alleged to have been seen by the so-called independent witnesses. Meantime another constable walked along the road to the spot where those witnesses swore they were standing at the time of the identifications. His hon. Friend asked the policeman who accompanied him whether he could tell him which of the constables was standing on the road facing him; the constable to whom he put the question was unable to say, although it was then the middle of a clear and bright day in broad daylight. After considerable hesitation the man said he thought that it was Constable Murphy, for he was the stoutest of the men in the hut. Now, it was notorious that the Government were slow to keep men in the Constabulary unless they had good eyesight; and if it was impossible for a constable, in the middle of the day, to recognize a companion at that distance, how much more impossible was it for these three independent witnesses to have been able to distinguish the assassins at the same distance on a dark night! The thing was utterly absurd. No one would believe it; and it was only because the Lord Lieutenant and his underlings were afraid of an investigation, that one had not been granted long before this. The speech of the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland was one of the most extraordinary he had ever heard in his life. He did not think that the hon. and learned Gentleman attempted at all to combat the arguments of hon. Members on that side of the House. On the contrary, he kept altogether wide of the main issue raised by them, and argued no point to which they attached importance. The hon. and learned Gentleman quoted from United Ireland, and also from The Freeman's Journal, to show that at the trial of Myles Joyce no serious complaint was made against the composition of the jury or against the conduct of the Judge. It had been stated over and over again during the debate that the conduct of the Judge and the verdict of the jury were not at all impugned by hon. Members on those Benches, and they had very little fault to find with the manner in which the learned Judge discharged his duty on that occasion. It had been alleged that one jury was packed, and the number of Catholics who were challenged was sufficient to prove that it was packed. He had no doubt, however, that if it had been fairly constituted it would have given exactly the same verdict which the other two juries had given on the same evidence. What the Irish Members alleged was that the evidence had not been fairly put before the jury, and that most important evidence had been suppressed. The hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) had pointed out that in the case of Francis Hynes there was no scruple on the part of George Bolton to put in evidence the dying depositions made by a man who was admittedly raving, and almost unconscious at the time it was made. Nevertheless, in this case, on the very same ground, the Crown carefully abstained from putting in evidence the dying deposition of the murdered boy. They said it was because he was raving, and almost unconscious, and that it would have been unfair for them to place that deposition at the disposal of the counsel for the prisoners. But in the case of Francis Hynes no consideration of that kind was allowed to stand in the way, and because the dying man in that case merely mentioned the name of Francis Hynes, Hynes was convicted and died on the scaffold. He (Mr. Deasy) did not see why the Crown should not have acted in a similar manner in the case of the Maamtrasna prisoners, except that they were determined at all cost and at all hazards to get a conviction against these men. They were also told by the hon. and learned Solicitor General that the House of Commons could not be converted into a Court of Appeal. He knew it was extremely inconvenient to the Government that Irish Members should be pursuing the course which they felt it their duty to take on the present occasion; but there was no other way open to them, and if the Government undertook the responsibility of legislating for Ireland, and devised for that purpose machinery which in this case had resulted in the execution of an innocent man, and imprisonment of four innocent men, they must take the consequences. The hon. and learned Gentleman had also told them that to grant an inquiry would be to discredit the cause of justice in Ireland. But the hon. and learned Gentleman must know very little of the country which he represented in that House, because if he had kept his eyes and ears open he would have been convinced that there was no respect for the law as administered in Ireland; indeed, the only persons who at the present time were taking a course likely to bring about some respect for the law there were those who were backing up Irish Members in their demand for this inquiry, and the Irish Members themselves, for he believed that nothing would be more conducive to the re-establishment of law and order than an investigation of the circumstances attending the trial and execution of Myles Joyce, and the sentences on the men now in penal servitude. But if only for the sake of their families, if only for the sake of the unfortunate individuals who were disgraced by reason of their father's death on the scaffold, he believed that House was bound to grant this application if they were not positively reckless of what was done in Ireland in the name of law and order. But the best proof he could give of the insufficiency of the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman was that after a short time the late Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland got up to speak also on the same side. One of the statements made by the right hon. Gentleman was that many hon. Gentlemen who had not the advantage of hearing the Solicitor General for Ireland might rest assured that he had fully met the arguments of his opponents. He said this lest hon. Members who had heard his speech as well as the two speeches made subsequently by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) and the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) might think that the Solicitor General for Ireland had utterly failed to prove the case to which he had addressed himself, and the right hon. Gentleman accordingly seriously told the House that the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech was convincing. He believed that statement was made for the benefit of those hon. Members who had heard the hon. and learned Gentleman, but who remained unconvinced, and were more disposed to take the word of the right hon. Gentleman than to place confidence in the arguments of the Solicitor General for Ireland. The late Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had also taken upon himself the responsibility of explaining away the statement of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War; but he (Mr. Deasy) was at a loss to understand why the noble Marquess was not able to defend himself. He had often seen him in a more difficult position than that in which he was placed by the speeches delivered on Friday last. And yet he appeared to be unable himself to explain why it was that the inquiry which he promised had not been granted. Perhaps he felt that the right hon. Gentleman was more conversant with the art of Parliamentary debate, and was a better hand at proving that black was white; at any rate, it was a strange thing that the noble Marquess would not take the trouble to get up in his place and explain why it was that the promise made had not been carried out; because it was useless for him, or any right hon. Gentleman, to endeavour to put an interpretation on his words which they would not bear. It was evident that the noble Marquess intended seriously to have the inquiry held when he gave the pledge. That pledge, however, had been broken, and Irish Members would not in future be disposed to rely upon any promise that might come from the Treasury Bench. If there was one person on that Bench upon whose promises Irish Members were willing to rely, it was the noble Marquess the Secretary for War; but he regretted that in future his word could not be seriously taken by them. But the true explanation of the conduct of the Executive in Ireland and of the conduct of the late Chief Secretary was to be found in the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that up to the time of the murder of Francis Hynes, 61 murders had been committed in Ireland. The Orange Party there—Mr. George Bolton, and those who acted with him, and whose position depended upon the goodwill of the English journals, and upon English far more than upon Irish public opinion—found it necessary to prove that the Criminal Department in Ireland had not completely broken down. Accordingly, having confined 10 or 12 men in prison, although they might have reason to suppose that one or two were innocent, they did not scruple to take the lives of three of them, and, on a plea of "guilty," sent the others to penal servitude. He was not surprised at all at the course taken by Mr. Bolton and Mr. O'Brien—men described by the occupants of the Treasury Bench as persons of the highest honour. Well, Mr. Bolton's honour had been impeached in that House; and he (Mr. Deasy) had experience of the way in which Mr. O'Brien managed to get convictions from juries, for, in the City which he had the honour to represent (Cork), a trial, in which the latter was engaged, of some prisoners charged with political offences at the last Winter Assizes, was brought under his notice. He was inclined to believe that no political trial could go on in Ireland without the aid of Mr. O'Brien. At the trial in question the jury disagreed, and Mr. O'Brien followed certain of those who tried the prisoners into the street and demanded the names of those high-minded and honourable men who refused to agree to a verdict against the prisoners. It was thus that justice was administered in Ireland, and thus that Mr. O'Brien conducted prosecutions. He would not detain the House at greater length, because he believed that many hon. Gentlemen wished to speak on this question after what they had heard from the learned Solicitor General for England; but he would add, in conclusion, that no case for a full and fair investigation had ever been more completely proved or better made out than this, and he agreed with those who said that if the Government did not accede to the request of Irish Members, they would not hear the last of it during the present Session, but would be troubled with it for many a long day.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 “That the Debate be now adjourned.”
 —(Mr. Justin M'Carthy.)

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 28th October, 1884.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Public
 Petitions, appointed and nominated.

QUESTIONS.

NAVY—NAVY PAY.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, Whether Her Majesty's Government propose to take any steps to improve the pay and rations of the seamen of Her Majesty's Navy?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: Additions of pay have been from time to time granted, and the pay of petty officers was increased last year. No further changes are at present proposed. The rations are good in quality, and sufficient.

TRADE AND COMMERCE—RAILS FOR INDIAN RAILWAYS.

MR. H. H. FOWLER asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been called to statements which have appeared in the public press, that the Government has made large contracts with Belgian ironmasters for the supply of rails for Indian railways; and, whether he will give the House full information as to the nature and extent of these contracts?

MR. CARBUTT also asked, What truth there is in the statements made in the South Wales newspapers that the Indian Government had obtained large quantities of rails abroad, to the manifest injury of our ironworkers at home, who are at present only partially employed?

MR. J. K. CROSS: In reply to my hon. Friend (Mr. H. H. Fowler), I may say, Sir, that on the 23rd of June last, since which date no foreign contracts have been made, I stated the nature and extent of foreign contracts placed up to that time during the last seven years; and I also said, with respect to steel sleepers which had been ordered in Belgium, that they were “somewhat novel to English manufacturers,” and that “several of our greatest English manufacturers had declined to make them or to tender for them.” I am now glad to be able to say that some of these firms have reconsidered this decision, have accepted the advice I then gave them, and are adapting their machinery to the manufacture of these sleepers. With respect to the Question which my hon. Friend now puts, and in reply also to the Question of my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth, I may say that I have not seen any authoritative statement as to the purchase of rails in Belgium. The fact is, not a single rail has been ordered abroad by the Indian Government during the last 10 years; and there is not the slightest shadow of an atom of foundation for the report.

NAVY—THE DOCKYARDS—REORGANIZATION.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, When it is proposed to promulgate the new scheme for the Dockyards?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: A scheme for the reorganization of the constructive staff at the Dockyards has recently been promulgated. No other changes are at present in contemplation.

WEST INDIES—ISLAND OF GRENADA —ECCLESIASTICAL AFFAIRS.

MR. HEALY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, What reply Lord Derby has given to the petition of the Catholics and Nonconformists of the Island of Grenada in reference to the illegal vote for the Parsonage of the Disestablished Church?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: The history of the case is as follows:—On the 12th of June came a despatch saying that the Legislative Council had voted a sum of money for the Rectory House of St. George's. As the Church had been disestablished in 1874, the Secretary of State replied by an inquiry as to what obligation there was on the Colonial Government to execute these repairs, and at the same time a telegram was sent to the Governor, instructing him to defer the expenditure of the money voted. A reply was received to the effect that, in the view of the Colonial Government, there was an obligation on them to keep the Rectory of St. George's in repair during the lifetime of Canon Anton, whose vested interests had been saved by the Act of 1874, and that on his death they were, therefore, bound to pay for the dilapidations before handing it over to the Church Body. We were also informed in another communication that the largest portion of the sum voted had been already expended—the repairs having been begun as early as the 12th of May. To this Lord Derby replied that he regretted that the Vote had been taken without his sanction, which would not have been given, and that it was not reported to him till it was too late to prevent the expenditure, and directed the Governor to communicate the purport of this despatch to the Memorialists.

MR. HEALY: Might I ask the hon. Member whether, seeing that this Vote was illegal, the parties concerned will be compelled to refund the money to the taxpayers?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said the Vote was improper, but it could not be said to be illegal.

MR. HEALY: Will the hon. Member lay the Papers on the Table?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: I will lay them on the Table if moved for.

WEST INDIES—ISLAND OF ST. VINCENT—PRISON REGULATIONS.

MR. HEALY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If it is a fact that Mr. M'Leod, the Provost Marshal of the Colony of St. Vincent's, the person who, by virtue of his office, has control of and is responsible for the management of the prisons of that Colony, recently made to the Secretary of State a number of serious charges against Mr. Gore, the Lieutenant Governor of St. Vincent's, in connection with the management and control of the prisons of the Colony, in which Mr. M'Leod accused Mr. Gore of immorality in connection with the female prisoners, and of gross abuse of his position as Lieutenant Governor; if it is a fact that all inquiry into those charges was refused, and that Mr. M'Leod was compelled by the Colonial Office to withdraw the charges he had made; if it is intended to hold any independent inquiry into the truth or otherwise of Mr. M'Leod's charges; and, whether the Secretary of State for the Colonies recently declared in the House of Lords that the West Indian prisons required the strictest supervision?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: The charge made against Mr. Gore by Mr. M'Leod was addressed, not to the Secretary of State, but to the Governor-in-Chief of the Windward Islands, and was that Lieutenant Governor Gore had curtailed Mr. M'Leod's rightful powers as head of the gaol, and sought to deny him a voice in the management of the Kingstown Prison; but there was no reference to any immoral conduct. The statement in the House of Lords referred to in the Question was made by the Earl of Carnarvon, and it was one with which everybody would agree.

MR. HEALY: Although it is an admitted fact that the West Indian prisons require supervision, nothing at all is to be done.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: It is a fact that they require supervision, and also that they receive it.

MR. HEALY: I beg to give Notice that I shall draw attention to this matter, and to the conduct of the hon. Member, on Report.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) ACT, 1882 — PROCLAIMED MEETING AT CRANAGH, CO. WICKLOW.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether it is not the fact that the County of Wicklow is and has all along been in a state of tranquillity; and, whether he can state upon what grounds a public meeting, proposed to be held at Cranagh on the 5th instant, at which the senior Member was to address his Constituents, was suppressed?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): The county of Wicklow is, and has been, peaceable. The proposed meeting at Cranagh was proclaimed because, being summoned to condemn land grabbings, it was announced to be held in the immediate vicinity of an evicted farm, which had been purchased by a man named Murphy, who had been "Boycotted," and as regards whom personal danger was apprehended if the meeting took place there.

MURDER OF MR. BETHELL.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he could state what is the date of the murder by the Boers of Mr. Bethell, Chief of the Frontier Police; what are the dates of the first official Despatch sent from the Government to inquire into the circumstances of Mr. Bethell's murder, and of the official reply, and of the consequent instructions to Sir Hercules Robinson referred to on Monday; and, whether Mr. Bethell was killed while endeavouring to save from the Boers Montsioa, the Bechuana chief who protected British subjects during the Transvaal War, and whose territories were guaranteed by the Conventions of 1881 and 1884?

MR. STUART WORTLEY asked, At what date the first request was despatched from home for information concerning the murder of Mr. C. Bethell, which took place on July 31st, and which was reported in the English newspapers in the second week in August; and, whether such request was telegraphic?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: In answer to those parts of these Questions which are not rather matter for debate than for Question time, I may say that Mr. Bethell was killed on the 31st of July last. The first intimation we received that there had been any foul play in connection with his death was in a letter we received from his brother on the 22nd of August. On the 25th of August we received a communication from Sir Hercules Robinson, not alluding to Mr. Bethell's death, but in which he stated that Mr. Bethell's appointment as Commandant of Police had been disapproved by him, and that he told Major Lowe he could not approve of it. Having received that letter from Mr. Bethell's brother on the 22nd of August, we sent, on the 26th, a despatch to Sir Hercules Robinson, asking him to ascertain the truth and give all particulars; and we received his reply to that despatch, enclosing Mr. Wright's account, on the 23rd of October, and on the 27th we sent off the telegram I referred to yesterday. The important point to bear in mind is, that it is only by Mr. Wright's communications that we learnt that the names of those who committed the murder are known, and that there is a Native witness who saw and can identify the men. Although on this occasion I must ask the House to take my word for it, in justice to the Secretary of State I must say that he came to the determination, in reply, to send that telegram on Friday last, and it was in no wise in consequence of the Questions which were put down that that telegram was sent.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: May I ask if Her Majesty's Government received the intelligence of the death of Mr. Bethell by telegram; and, if so, on what date?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: We received the account of Mr. Bethell's death by telegram on the 8th of August, and we immediately telegraphed out at once to see what Mr. Bethell it was. It merely stated the death.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: May I ask the hon. Gentleman another Question? Two gentlemen were sent from Cape Town into Bechuanaland in an official position—Mr. Rhodes and Mr. Bowen, who was Secretary to Sir Hercules Robinson. They were not, I understand, far off at the time of the occurrence. Has no Report been received from them?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: My right hon. Friend is incorrect. They were a long way off, in Stellaland, and knew nothing at all about it. Mr. Rhodes went up afterwards. He arrived on the 25th of August in the neighbourhood of Montsioa's country; but he was not within several hundred miles of the place when the murder took place.

MR. GREYKE asked whether it was not the fact that in consequence of the publicity given to this matter in the Press by the brother and relations of Mr. Bethell, the Colonial Office took some steps; and whether they might not infer that had it not been for the agitation by the relatives of the murdered officer, the Government would have passed the matter over in silence?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: I can have no control over hon. Members' inferences, but the facts of the case are these. The first statement we received was on the 22nd August, in a letter from Mr. Bethell's brother. In consequence of that the Colonial Office sent out to make inquiries. Most undoubtedly the Colonial Office were as anxious as anybody to bring the murderers to justice; and I can assure my hon. Friend that he is quite wrong in thinking that we required any stimulus in taking action in the matter.

MR. STUART WORTLEY asked whether on the 8th of August, as the hon. Gentleman said when the first telegram arrived announcing Mr. Bethell's death, it was known at the Colonial Office that Mr. Bethell was in the employment of the English Government?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Yes; it was known that Mr. Mackenzie had appointed him temporarily, but we did not know exactly whether he had assumed office, and we did not know whether there were any police to command. I am not quite certain whether we knew at that time or not that Sir Hercules Robinson had refused to ratify it; but certainly we did know that he had been appointed by Mr. Mackenzie.

MR. STUART WORTLEY: Did Sir Hercules Robinson refuse, as a matter of fact, to ratify it?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Yes.

MR. GREYKE: May I ask why, if the facts were perfectly well known on the 11th or 12th of August, the Colonial Office waited for a letter from Mr. Bethell's brother before taking any steps?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, he really must dispute what the hon. Gentleman had stated. The matter was not well known in England. He believed the first mention of any foul play in connection with the death of Mr. Bethell was on the 19th of August. He thought that was the first date on which there was any mention in this country of any murder having been committed.

AFRICA (SOUTH)—CONVENTIONS OF 1881-4—MONTSIOA.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether, after Mr. Bethell's murder, the Transvaal Government forced Montsioa to submit to their authority; what is the position of Montsioa now; and, how much territory and how many of his tribesmen Montsioa has lost in consequence of his loyalty to Great Britain in 1881 and since?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: It is difficult to answer that Question. ["Hear, hear!"] What I mean is this—it is difficult to answer in a few words. The complete Papers will be in the hands of Members in a very short time. The exact position of Montsioa now I cannot say without making a speech. If the hon. Member asks me to make a speech, I will do so. It is impossible for me to give the figures in reply to the third Question.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH: I think I can answer the last part of the Question. I observe it is stated, with some apparent authority, in the public Press that Montsioa's territory is now confined to 10 farms. What I want to ask is, when Papers will be laid on the Table?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY replied, that he was urging the printers forward. One batch of Papers had been, he believed, delivered that day, and the other batch would be in the hands of Members on Friday or Saturday.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT gave Notice that, on that day fortnight, in order to give the hon. Gentleman time to obtain the information, he would ask, Whether it was not the fact that the boundaries of Montsioa's territory between his own lands and those of the Boers were fixed by the Conventions of 1881 and 1884; and, whether he could tell the House how many of the tribes had since perished by the hostile action of the Boers?

FRANCE AND CHINA—HOSTILITIES—BLOCKADE OF FORMOSA.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government are aware that, as reported in The Times of 27th October—

"The blockade of the west coast of the Island of Formosa began on the 23rd inst. and that no vessels are allowed to embark or disembark at the Island, which is completely isolated;"

whether this blockade by France of ports belonging to a Power with which she is not at open war is consistent with International Law; whether France has, under the circumstances, any right to prevent English vessels from entering the ports of the Island; and, what measures the Government propose in order to obtain for English commerce the compensation due for damages accruing from the interruption to which it is subjected?

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT also asked, Whether British merchant ships have been stopped and overhauled by French men-of-war off the Chinese coast; whether the French have declared a blockade of Formosa; and, whether the French Republic has declared war upon China; and, if not, whether Her Majesty's Ministers will direct the British Admiral in command of the China Station to take steps to stop these piratical proceedings?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Her Majesty's Government, on the 23rd instant, received from the French Government a formal notice of blockade of the ports of Formosa, and the notice was inserted in The Gazette of the 24th instant. France has undoubtedly the right to blockade those ports, and the notification of blockade might be taken by neutral Powers as a notification of a state of war. France has, in the circumstances, all the rights of war, including the right to prevent access to the blockaded ports, incident to a belligerent blockade if she desired to exercise them; but in the absence of a formal declaration of war, either by France or China, Her Majesty's Government have thought it necessary to communicate with the French Government on the subject, in order to remove all doubt as to the position of neutrals' shipping, and I am unable to make any further statement pending the result of that communication. Before the notification of blockade three British vessels were boarded off Tamsui; and upon representations being made to the French Government on the subject, it was admitted that the proceeding was irregular, by reason of a regular blockade not having been established. Her Majesty's Government will be prepared to make any claim for damages which can properly be supported by International Law; but up to the present time no such claim has been preferred. In regard to the last paragraph of the Question of the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett), I can only express my regret that he should have used expressions in this House offensive to a friendly nation.

In reply to a further Question by Mr. J. G. HUBBARD,

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, that he could not undertake, without permission from the Secretary of State, to lay any Papers on the Table. He might mention, however, that certain Papers relating to recent events in China were about to be laid; but he could not give any particulars with regard to them.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT gave Notice that he would ask the noble Lord on Thursday whether the examination of neutral merchant ships without a declaration of war did not constitute an act of piracy?

MR. WARTON asked whether the Government had taken any pains to find out the actual number of French ships, with the view of ascertaining whether the blockade was an effective one, or merely a paper one?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I do not know, Sir.

ASIA (CENTRAL)—BRITISH CONSULATE AT KASHGAR.

MR. ECROYD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been directed to the desirability, in the interests of British commerce, of establishing a Consul at Kashgar?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: This question has been under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government; and it has been decided, after communication with the India Office, that the amount of British trade at Kashgar was not as yet sufficient to warrant the establishment of a Consul there. If the hon. Member has any facts which he wishes to bring to the notice of the Foreign Office, every attention will be given to them.

AFRICA (SOUTH) — BECHUANALAND—SIR CHARLES WARREN'S EXPEDITION.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he can give any information to the House as to the scale of the Military expedition which is to accompany Sir Charles Warren from England to Bechuanaland; what is the number of the English Force now in South Africa; and, whether General Warren will be placed under the orders of the Governor, Sir Hercules Robinson, or hold an independent position in South Africa similar to that conferred on General Gordon in Central Africa?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: It is not yet possible to give the House any detailed information on the subject. The War Office are in close communication with Sir Charles Warren and with our officers in South Africa as to the scale and nature of the military forces, and preparations that may be necessary. The strength of the regular British troops in South Africa is about 4,000. Sir Charles Warren will, of course, be under the orders of Sir Hercules Robinson, as High Commissioner for South Africa.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Do I understand that an expedition will be sent from England?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: No; I do not say so.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: May I ask whether we may consider that Sir Charles Warren is going out to South Africa?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Yes, Sir; I think the House may consider that as settled.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: When shall we know? Sir Charles Warren is, I understand, still in England; and what we here wish to know is whether the preparations have been settled?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: That Question ought to be addressed to the Secretary of State for War.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Would the Secretary of State for War kindly answer that Question?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I cannot state for two or three days when the necessary preparations will be completed.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Will a Supplemental Estimate be asked for?

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—OVER-PRESSURE IN BOARD SCHOOLS—DR. CRICHTON BROWNE'S REPORT.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether instructions were given by the Secretary of the Education Department to Mr. Fitch, one of the permanent officials of the Department, to prepare an answer to Dr. Crichton Browne's Report, after reference had been made to that Report in this House?

MR. MUNDELLA: Immediately on receipt of Dr. Crichton Browne's statement it was sent to Mr. Fitch for perusal. Mr. Fitch communicated to me his dissent from Dr. Browne's conclusions, and his dissatisfaction with the methods which Dr. Browne employed; but he was not requested to make any official Report until the document was made public by being laid on the Table of this House.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Is it the fact that Mr. Fitch is the gentleman who had the principal hand in drafting the New Code?

MR. MUNDELLA: He had not the principal hand in drafting the Code. He was one of a Committee of nine or ten gentlemen employed on that Code.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES) — PENSIONS — SERGEANT INSTRUCTOR LYNE.

VISCOUNT LEWISHAM asked the Under Secretary of State for War, If, in accordance with his promise of 8th May 1884, he has submitted the case of Sergeant Instructor Lyne to the Admiralty; if he is aware that Sergeant Instructor Lyne has not received the additional pension to which he is entitled; and, what is the reason of this delay?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Yes, Sir; the case of this Sergeant Instructor was submitted to the Admiralty. I am informed from that Office that the increase of pension will be made as soon as the necessary Order in Council has been obtained. I am also informed by that Department that many points have arisen in connection with the award of pensions to non-commissioned officers in Marines serving in the Auxiliary Forces. Those points are in course of settlement, and an Order in Council will be obtained to sanction extra pensions being allowed.

PORTUGAL—QUARANTINE AT MADEIRA.

MR. CREYKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government has recently received reports from Madeira as to the quarantine regulations of the Portuguese Government involving loss of life to British seamen, especially with reference to the cases of the s.s. Plessy and the barque Valetta; and, whether Her Majesty's Government, in the event of the Portuguese Government declining to abolish altogether the vexatious and absurd restrictions placed on vessels direct from English ports, will impress upon the Government of Portugal the necessity of at once opening the existing excellent lazaretto at Madeira?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Her Majesty's Consul at Madeira has furnished Reports on the cases to which the hon. Member refers. Her Majesty's Government regret that, notwithstanding the strongest remonstrances, the Portuguese and other Governments continue to maintain a stringent quarantine system; but attention will at once be called to the importance of opening the lazaretto at Madeira.

AFRICA (SOUTH)—BASUTOLAND—THE POLICE FORCE.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, What is the number of the Police Force which has been put under the orders of Colonel Clarke to enable him to carry out the instructions given him by Lord Derby, in his Despatch of January 25th 1884, appointing him Resident Commissioner in Basutoland, and instructing him to protect life and property, and to maintain order on the border; what is the area of Basutoland; what is the length of the border line between Basutoland and the Orange Free State; and, whether any representations have been made by the Government of the Orange Free State with reference to the Force needed to maintain order on the border, in fulfilment of the terms of the Treaty of Aliwal North?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: The police force in Basutoland, under Colonel Clarke, consists of 13 officers—of whom four are Natives—and 146 men. The area of Basutoland is 10,293 square miles, and the length of the Border line between Basutoland and the Orange Free State is, I believe, about 200 miles. It is a fact that Sir John Brand in last July represented that, in his opinion, Colonel Clarke's force was insufficient; but I may remind my right hon. Friend that this was at a moment when there was an abnormal excitement and disturbance connected with the attack of Moroks on Sepinare, within the borders of the Free State, and since this is over complaints have subsided. I may add that Colonel Clarke did not share the opinion of Sir John Brand, and has not asked for more police than the number granted to him.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked whether this force had been under Colonel Clarke's orders for some time?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Yes, Sir; from the time he went to Basutoland.

POST OFFICE—MAIL SERVICE TO THE WEST OF IRELAND—THE MIDLAND GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Postmaster General, If he can inform the House of the nature of any proposals which have passed between the Post Office and the Midland Great Western Railway Company, with a view to the acceleration of the mails to the west of Ireland; and, whether steps will be taken to secure that the mails to and from the county of Mayo shall be accelerated in the same manner and on the same terms as those agreed to recently in respect of the mails in other parts of Ireland?

MR. FAWCETT: In the first instance an inquiry was made, with the object of ascertaining whether it would be possible to secure an acceleration by making the existing train start at an earlier hour and travel at a faster rate; but, on the Railway Company assuring us that this is impracticable, I am now considering whether circumstances would justify the running of another train. If any acceleration should be secured, I can assure my hon. Friend that Mayo would participate in it.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, If he will state the reasons for issuing the following "confidential communication" to District Constabulary Inspectors in Ireland:—

"Joseph R. Cox. Midland Division, Crime Department, Mullingar, 24th June 1884. Mr. Jenkinson wishes to have the movements of the above-named watched, noted everywhere. Annexed is his description. By Order (signed), M. Jacques, D.I.C.S. Joseph R. Cox, Secretary to the Lord Mayor, Dublin, 97, Stephen's Green, Dublin, five feet ten inches, thirty-three years, rather stout, sandy hair, regular nose and mouth, fair complexion, round visage, small whiskers under ears; native of Kilmore, county Roscommon, wears glasses, dresses well, wears a silk hat; was arrested under Peace Preservation Act. He was an organiser of the late Land League. His principal associates are leading Nationalists?"

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): I stated yesterday, in answer to the hon. Member, that the communication referred to was issued in misapprehension to the County Inspector in one Division. It is not usual, and it would be detrimental to the interests of the Public Service, to state the reasons for issuing confidential communications to County Inspectors. I must, therefore, in this instance, respectfully decline to state them.

INLAND NAVIGATION AND DRAINAGE (IRELAND) — DRAINAGE WORKS ON THE BARROW.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether Mr. Fitzgerald has yet completed his survey and valuation of the lands to be relieved by the contemplated drainage works of the Barrow; whether he can state the estimated expense of the works to be executed on the main stream; and, how soon the final Report of Mr. Manning the Engineer may be expected?

MR. COURTNEY: I am very sorry to say that in spite of all our efforts we cannot get Mr. Fitzgerald to report, and Mr. Manning's final Report must follow on his. The provisional Estimate for works on the main river only is about £300,000. In view of the delay on the part of the valuator the Treasury communicated with the Irish Government last week as to the expediency of appointing at once a Committee to consider what could be done with the materials in our hand. I have heard to-day by telegraph from the Lord Lieutenant that he agreed to the proposition.

TRADE AND COMMERCE—THE SHIP-BUILDING TRADE.

MR. MAC IVER asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If his attention has been called to the following paragraph, which appeared in The Glasgow Herald of last Saturday, viz.:—

"State of Trade—Glasgow. Shipbuilding still depressed. . . . A significant feature of the depression is a movement on the part of the operatives to procure employment on the Continent. Shipbuilding in France is reported to be on the increase;"

and, whether Her Majesty's Government are in possession of any information which leads them to doubt the accuracy of this statement?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: My right hon. Friend has asked me to answer this Question, and I will do so to the best of my ability. I am not certain whether the paragraph to which the hon. Member calls attention refers to any movement of operatives from Glasgow. If so, I have no information whatever on the subject; but I have heard of a movement of operatives from the North-East Coast, where the depression in shipbuilding is very great indeed; and I have learned that some few men—I believe no considerable number—have found employment in the shipbuilding yards in France, chiefly in connection, I believe, with the repairs which are going on upon French vessels. I may, perhaps, point out to the hon. Member that the French Bounty Law provided that ships might be built abroad up to a certain time, but that they were to be repaired in French ports; and the effect of that has been to increase the pressure of the depression in this way—that, in the first place, it created an exceptional demand for ships in this country, and led to the employment of a large number of persons who might not otherwise have been employed. When the artificial demand ceased, the depression, of course, was increased proportionately, and at the same time there has been an artificial demand for labour created in France by the repairs which have become necessary on these ships.

MR. MAC IVER: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to thank him for his reply, but, at the same time, to point out that he has not answered my Question, which is, whether it is or is not true that shipbuilding in France is reported to be on the increase?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I have no positive information—no late information—with regard to the question of shipbuilding in France; but, as far as I know, there is no considerable increase.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND) — INCREASED GRANT TO CONVENT SCHOOLS.

MR. BIGGAR asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether the Government are now in a position to state what is the scheme for increased emoluments to the Convent National Schools, in Ireland, as promised last Session by the Member for Hawick Burghs?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): On the 18th July last my right hon. Friend the late Chief Secretary stated that this matter was under consideration, and would be dealt with before the Estimates for the coming year are framed. That promise is kept in mind; but I am not at present in a position to make any more definite statement.

REPORTED FALL OF KHARTOUM.

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR): I wish to ask the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has received any confirmation of the rumour as to the fall of Khartoum which appeared in the evening papers?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No, Sir; no information whatever on that subject has been received either at the War Office or at the Foreign Office.

PUBLIC HEALTH—ALLEGED OUT-BREAK OF CHOLERA IN NORMANDY.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT: I wish to ask the President of the Local Government Board, Whether any steps have been taken to ascertain the nature of the disease which has broken out at Yport, in the North of France; and, if that disease is cholera, what measures had been adopted to prevent its spreading to this country?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Information as to the nature of the outbreak has been asked for by the Medical Department, and partial information has already been received. With regard to the steps taken to prevent the spread of cholera to this country, a most complete examination of the ports has been made in advance during the last four months; and all the regulations which were formerly in force, and which successfully prevented the last epidemic of cholera in Northern Europe from spreading to this country, and which probably have been improved by experience, are in operation at the present time, and have been supplemented by the examination of ports to which I refer.

MR. JUSTICE BARRY.

MR. CALLAN wished to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland a Question of which he had given him private Notice. It was, Whether the dying declarations of Patrick Joyce and Patrick Casey, taken by Mr. Brady, R.M., the day but one before the execution on the 15th December, admitting their own guilt, but stating the innocence of Myles

Joyce, and referred to in the Memorandum of Earl Spencer, were submitted to the consideration of Lord Justice Barry, who tried the prisoners; and, whether Lord Justice Barry was consulted in the matter by his Excellency before refusing to grant the inquiry?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER), in reply, said, that he had telegraphed to Dublin immediately upon receiving Notice of the Question; but he feared he could not answer it precisely. It appeared that Judge Barry certainly had the papers before him on the 13th of December.

MR. HARRINGTON: Does the hon. and learned Gentleman mean to insinuate that the depositions made on the 14th were before Judge Barry on the 13th?

NOTICE OF AMENDMENT.

QUEEN'S SPEECH.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Having regard to the statement of the Prime Minister the other night that the Government repudiate violence and outrage, and in order to enable the House to come to a decision on the matter at issue, as well as in justice to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, I now beg to give Notice that I will move the following Amendment to the Address:—

"And we humbly assure Her Majesty that we regret to find in recent speeches and actions of one of Her Majesty's Ministers, holding the high office of President of the Board of Trade, an incitement to interference with the freedom of political discussion, and a justification of riot and disorder."

MR. LABOUCHERE: It would be very convenient to the House to know whether the noble Lord intends to bring on his Amendment immediately after the one under consideration has been disposed of; or whether, as is reported, there is to be a debate on the Transvaal, or any other subject? Perhaps the noble Lord will be able to inform us.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I cannot tell.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that it would be convenient to the House if the hon. Member for Birkenhead intended to proceed with his Amendment on the Address immediately after that now before the House was disposed of.

MR. MACIVER said, that he intended to move his Amendment; but he hoped the hon. Member would not think him discourteous if he declined to state when.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.] [FOURTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [23rd October,] "That, &c."—[See page. 69.]

And which Amendment, as amended, was,

To insert in the ninth paragraph, after the word "us," the words "and this House humbly assures Her Majesty that it would ensure much greater confidence in the administration of the Law in Ireland if a full and public inquiry were granted into the execution of Myles Joyce and the continued incarceration of Patrick Joyce, Thomas Joyce, Martin Joyce, and John Casey."—(Mr. Harrington.)

Debate resumed.

AMENDMENT (MR. HARRINGTON)— THE MAAMTRASNA MURDERS— CONVICTION OF MYLES JOYCE AND OTHERS.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he was glad to see that the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) had found himself in a position to adopt the alteration in his Amendment suggested on the previous evening, for it put more clearly, more precisely and succinctly, what the Irish people most particularly demanded at the present moment. What they most wanted just now was a declaration of opinion from the House as to whether a case had not been made out for a re-investigation of the circumstances under which certain men were condemned to death, some executed, and some imprisoned for life. They did not want to have these murder cases retried in Parliament. The House had no machinery of that kind; but what the House was well entitled to ask was whether an appeal of the kind now put forward for re-investigation by proper authorities and in a proper way had not been made out, and whether they were not entitled to insist on that inquiry being held? Members should be made acquainted with the physical condition of that part of Ireland where the murders took place, and what the population consisted of. The population in the district lived in almost complete separation and isolation from civilization all round. He happened to be in that part of the country almost immediately after the occurrence of these murders; and, though he made no minute inspection, he obtained a tolerably clear knowledge of the district. Those even who had seen a Red Indian settlement or a Bedouin encampment could hardly have an idea of the condition in which the people of the Joyce country had lived. Local feelings of spite and ill-feeling grew and fostered easily in such a district amongst the people. A quarrel once begun would go on there from generation to generation, almost like a Corsican vendetta, and that would in a sense explain the personal hatred that existed, and even the dreadful fact that reckless charges were capable of being made against enemies who were not believed to be guilty of crime. He did not wish to arraign the finding of the jury or the action of the Judge. Nevertheless, there were some extraordinary features in the case. In their testimony the three independent witnesses had alleged that they had followed those ten desperate murderers over three Irish miles of broken country, and had never lost sight of them. Not one of those ten men, going as they were to do a desperate deed, had ever looked round to see whether they were followed. Then it was alleged that the three men had stood behind a bush, and that the murderers had almost touched them. Anyone who knew that part of the country knew that the vegetation was very scanty, and the bushes were all very small. The night was dark, and yet those who swore to the identity of the accused represented themselves as being in a position to state positively to their identity. Surely the very improbabilities of the case were sufficient to justify a re-investigation. Again, he was surprised at the careless way in which the Memorandum of the Lord Lieutenant had been made out. In one paragraph it stated that the evidence was "not merely circumstantial evidence." But the whole of the case had rested on direct evidence; and in the Memorandum

dum, therefore, the Lord Lieutenant seemed to be mixing up one kind of evidence with another. What answer had they received to their request for a reconsideration of the case? The Government appeared to be exceedingly unhappy in its selection of Irish Law Officers. It appeared that they were very much exercised by the difficulty either to get them into the House or to get them out of it; and certainly the statement of the Solicitor General for Ireland had not advanced the case for the Government very much. The hon. and learned Gentleman had made an unusually heated partizan speech on the matter. The ex-Chief Secretary, it was true, had gone into the case more clearly and closely. What did the whole sum of the case as represented by the right hon. Gentleman amount to? It was in great part a contention that there was very much evidence offered by the Crown, so much that the conviction was warranted. He spoke as though it was a question of weighing so many witnesses against so many, the verdict going to that side which had the most; but they claimed that if they could produce one witness who ought to be heard, and was not heard, they had established their contention, and showed that the case ought not to be considered entirely settled at the bar of public opinion. Not a single point made by the hon. Member for Westmeath was disposed of; all the most important points he left exactly as he put them, and nothing that was said in contradiction to the facts they had brought forward ought to change an impartial public opinion. Again, the ex-Chief Secretary attempted to work on the feelings—he was going to say on the passions—of the House, by his reference to the agrarian and other outrages that had been committed in Ireland. But he had nothing whatever to say on that central point of the case—the depositions of the two boys—and he (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) could not help expressing his great regret at the manner in which they had been dealt with, at least by one great newspaper which influenced public opinion out-of-doors and in that House. When the hon. Member for Westmeath made his speech and put his case before the Government, his pamphlet upon the subject was in the hands of all persons who were interested in the facts it contained. Yet the article in The Times newspaper, in stating the case, left out of it all reference whatever to these depositions. How could English public opinion be properly formed if such omissions were made? He supposed it was done by mishap or carelessness; but he asked the House, how could English public opinion be fairly formed on a question like the present when one of its most leading organs could thus deal with a part of the case so important and so momentous? He was quite certain that if similar conditions existed in connection with the administration of the law in England an inquiry would be promptly granted. The Home Secretary also made a speech of some weight and importance in reply to the case put by the hon. Member for Westmeath. Some part of that speech, indeed, was not perfectly consistent. It was conceived apparently in the same spirit as that of an answer given by the Under Secretary for the Colonies that evening to the effect that he had already answered a certain Question, and, besides, it would be impossible to answer such a Question as that. Very much in the same style was the answer of the Home Secretary. He said—"This question has already been re-opened, and, besides, it would be wholly impossible to re-open a question like this." The right hon. Gentleman told them that he had himself thought over the whole question, and had, on his own responsibility, advised the Lord Lieutenant not to grant the sort of inquiry they desired. He did not tell the House, when he gave this advice, that he had any idea whatever of the existence of the depositions of those two boys which were kept by the counsel of the Crown from the counsel for the defence. Irish Members asked the Government to do nothing unusual or unprecedented. They merely asked the Government to do what had been done in the case of Kilmartin—to give an independent inquiry into all the old facts and the new, and say whether, on the whole, there was not a case made out sufficient to allow innocent men to be set at liberty, and to remove from the family of one man who had been executed the stain of guilt if he were proved to be innocent. How could the Government, in face of the support given to this proposition by so many eminent English lawyers, refuse the appeal now made to them? He made no insinuation or reflection upon the learned Judge or the jury, yet he felt compelled to say that there was at that time a general inclination to say—"We must punish someone." That was a most unfortunate feeling to get into the public mind at a time of excitement. There was a disposition to connect these murders in the Joyce country with the agrarian disturbances and agrarian crime. The Home Secretary pleaded that it was the business of counsel for the defence to have found out and used whatever facts and depositions were favourable to the prisoners. But, surely, whether counsel for the prisoners knew or used certain facts or not, if certain important evidence was not presented to the jury, there was a case for an inquiry. It did not appear to him that the defence in these cases was very skilfully conducted. He thought a little more vigilance on the part of counsel for the defence would have enabled them to get all the evidence that could be brought forward in favour of the prisoners. But if that evidence had been produced at the trial it would have influenced the minds of the jury—nay, it might have entirely changed their verdict. Was not that alone a strong ground for inquiry? He could not help feeling a certain doubt as to whether there was not a want of courage on the part of the Government in not acceding to this demand. It was the duty of the Government, fearless of a perverted public opinion—fearless of the threats and menaces of any particular Colleague; fearless of what might be said of them here or there—to stand up and say—"We do now at last believe that it has been shown that a mistake has been committed; we are willing to make that admission; and with that admission we are willing to grant a proper and independent inquiry, and by all the means in our power secure that justice shall be done to the living and the dead."

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I am sorry to interpose in this debate, and for many reasons I should have been glad if the argument of this case had been left in the hands of those who, from their training and experience, are really competent to conduct that argument with a perfect balance of mind and temper, and the absolute exclusion of all feeling that might bias their judgment, and with the capacity to weigh evidence which the Members of this House in general, and which certainly I myself in particular, can make no claim to possess. But, although that is the case, there are two considerations which lead me to believe that I should not fully discharge my duty unless I made some attempt to give my opinion, and the reasons for that opinion, to the House. The first of these considerations is of very great importance to the question, which undoubtedly neither the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) nor anyone else whom I have heard has, in the slightest degree, exaggerated when they described it in the strongest terms they could command; for there can be no graver occasion than when the House of Commons should be solicited, or feel itself inclined, not merely to correct the conduct of particular persons belonging to the judicial body of the country, but to reopen a great judicial case of criminal justice which has been settled under circumstances of peculiar solemnity, and, as I think, of peculiar advantage for arriving at the truth. I will not say that there would be no case where it would be the duty of the House of Commons to search for the means for attempting an operation of that kind; I only say at present that it is one of the gravest cases that can be conceived; and I will endeavour at least to give this practical proof of my sense of its gravity, when I shall seek to avoid all imputations of motive, all exaggeration of the case, all that could give offence in any quarter; and if I cannot imitate the capacity of those who professionally investigate and conduct these questions, I will endeavour at least to conform to that judicial temper which they all strive to maintain. That is my first reason; and my second reason is that I think it due to Lord Spencer, who holds a high Office, under circumstances of peculiar anxiety, with the entire and unlimited confidence of his political Colleagues, that I should not shrink from giving him—I will not say whatever advantage he may derive—but, at all events, whatever conscientious witnesses may be brought in to support him on an occasion when not merely his judgment has been called in question, but when the severest charges have been launched against him; such charges that, if they could be proved, undoubted dismissal from Office would be no adequate notice of the acts involved in them, and nothing less than impeachment should follow. [Irish cheers.] I and the clothes and the evidence of the three witnesses. It is said that all this in the boys' depositions was withheld from the knowledge of the prisoners' counsel. The hon. Gentleman opposite has possessed himself of the brief of the counsel for the Crown. Without making an inquiry into that matter I cannot regret that he has got the brief, for I am very glad he should know everything that can be known. [Mr. BIGGAR: Oh, oh!] The hon. Member for Cavan is maintaining the consistency of his character; but if he will be kind enough to shut his ears for one moment and allow me to proceed without interruption, I will repeat that I am glad the hon. Gentleman should be in possession of everything and anything that will assist him in this investigation. It is said that the final declaration of the younger boy was not communicated as a document to the Court, or to the opposite counsel; but I believe, as a fact, that that final declaration did contain the particulars which I have mentioned about the light clothes, which particulars were not contained in the account the boy gave to the constable. The account given to the constable, however, did contain the important fact about the blackened faces—if the word used signifies blackened. Did the counsel for the defence call, or attempt to call, the boy for the sake of examining him upon that matter?

MR. HARRINGTON: The Crown produced him; but he was not allowed to be sworn by the Crown, because upon his production on the table it was found that he was not sufficiently instructed to know the nature of an oath.

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, Sir; but the hon. Gentleman's account does not draw the distinctions which are essential to the truth. The case is that the Crown suppressed this evidence, and the answer is that the Crown placed the boy upon the table to be examined. The Crown placed him upon the Table where a man is placed when he is going to be examined. What more could the Crown do?

MR. CALLAN: Teach him the nature of an oath.

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Gentleman interrupts me by an exclamation which I must call impertinent—no; I will not say impertinent. Even the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy), in the course of his remarks to-night, observed that when he heard the speech of the Home Secretary yesterday it reminded him of an answer given by the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to-day. The hon. Gentleman confuses a little the present, the future, and the past tenses. I am reminded by my right hon. Friend that it was in the power of the counsel for the defence, who had been cognizant of the statements about the blackened faces for months before, at any time to have called the surviving boy as a witness; and if he had not been examined it would have been owing to the discovery that he was not a competent witness to give evidence in Court. The Crown placed him in a position to be examined, and that was all they could do, so far as they were concerned. We have this fact before us, that the counsel for the defence did not think it any part of his duty to his clients to take any step whatever to promote the examination of the boy. Such are the grounds upon which it is attempted to disturb these remarkable verdicts, and it is an attempt to disturb them in order that there shall be a full public inquiry. What is this inquiry to be? What are its possible forms? We are to begin by shutting out the only regular and Constitutional form. The Constitution of this country knows nothing of criminal appeal, properly so called, nothing of the retrial of cases, as was explained by the Home Secretary last night. It knows of the reference to the responsible Minister, who, surrounded by the very best advisers, and acting under the deepest sense of responsibility, is entitled to exercise the Prerogative of mercy. That mode of operation you begin by excluding, because what you are asking for is not a further investigation of the question by the responsible officer of the Queen, but it is a full and public inquiry, a description to which his operation could not correspond. What kind of a public inquiry is it to be? Is it to be a Committee of this House? I remember a similar case of endeavouring to overset the verdict of a jury by a Committee of this House. It was in the case, well known at the time, of Mr. Whittle Harvey. It happened in 1833 or 1834, and I myself sat upon that Committee. I voted alone against the Report of the Committee, which attempted to overset the verdict of the jury in Mr. Whittle Harvey's case. Mr. O'Connell was Chairman of the Committee, and he conducted the case with consummate skill and ability. That all but unanimous Report was presented to the House, and, powerful as the House is when acting in its own proper province, it showed how impotent is the House when it makes an irregular use of its machinery, although it was used as well as it could be for the purpose in view. The Report was so little recognized by the public opinion of the country that the Benchers of the Inns of Court, to whom Mr. Whittle Harvey had applied for his admission to the Bar, persisted in their refusal, and beat the Committee of the House of Commons. That was not very promising for inquiry by a Committee of the House, and yet I am by no means sure, if there was to be an inquiry at all, whether that would not be as good a method as any other. What has been suggested? It has been suggested that a very eminent Judge, Lord Bramwell, should be sent to examine into the matter. Has the hon. Member who recommended this appointment satisfied himself that Lord Bramwell will accept the duty? I suspect he knows as well as I do that there is not the smallest likelihood of such an acceptance. What would he or anyone else be invited to do? He would be sent partly to correct the defence at the original trial—for that the argument on the other side distinctly includes—and partly on account of the new evidence, which we believe to be wholly without weight for the purpose in view, and virtually to upset the verdicts of three juries, given unanimously and with a universal recognition of the weight of the evidence on which they were founded. What means would he have? How would he go to work? Whom would he examine? Would he examine this child now of 11 years? [An hon. MEMBER: Certainly.] Well, we know what the child has to say; we know his statement about the faces of the men and about their garments. As to one of these statements, that the faces were blackened, we know very well that the counsel for the defence did not think it worth his while to use it on behalf of his clients. Is he to examine the convicts who pleaded guilty? Is the House to send down some great lawyer to examine these four convicts who pleaded guilty, without any direct evidence tending to show that they were innocent, and to endeavour to convict them of falsehood on that plea, and prove them to be innocent? Is he to examine the recanting approver? I hardly think anybody will recommend that. [MR. HARRINGTON: Why not?] Then there is one Gentleman who would examine him. I really thought that, throughout the debate, and especially by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and other hon. Members on that side of the House, a disposition had been shown to abandon as hopeless the statements of Casey as the foundation for any proceedings of a public and judicial character. If anyone could be found to undertake the inquiry, how is he to examine these persons? He has no power to administer an oath; he has to go to work without the sanction of an oath; and upon the strength of such evidence as he gets without the sanction of an oath he is to upset the verdicts which were arrived at in public after solemn and repeated inquiry, and covered by that solemn sanction. [MR. GRAY: The Kilmartin case.] In that case the proceeding was one known to the Constitution, and it was completely distinct from that of a Court of Justice. But the proceeding you recommend is totally unknown to the Constitution; you have no precedent; it is a new and unheard-of method of disturbing a solemn judgment. It cannot be covered by the sanction of an oath, and the issue is not to be referred even to the judgment of a jury. In these circumstances, I must express my hope that a vast majority, a large and overwhelming majority, of this House will decline to accept this most objectionable and most inefficient Motion. My last objection to the full and public inquiry, be it as full and public as it may, is that it must be totally inefficient. You cannot possibly come at a body of testimony through the medium of such an inquiry, worth for one moment to be put in competition with the testimony upon which was founded the original solemn proceeding. We do not admit that there is any substance in the new evidence. We conceive that there is the greatest danger in arguments like those of the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin McCarthy) for re-opening and retrying that which was publicly, fully, impartially, and repeatedly tried, and affirmed by a Judge and by three juries. We enter our protest against the institution of a Court of Criminal Appeal, in the first place, for a single case, and not upon the foundation of a general law; and, in the second place, against the institution of a Court of Criminal Appeal, totally inferior in all its means of action, and in all its power to investigate the truth, to the tribunals which it seeks to supersede.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that the speech of the Prime Minister was really disappointing, not only to his political foes, but also to his political friends. It was one of the weakest, the lamest, and the most halting speeches the right hon. Gentleman had ever delivered in that House. The largest part of it was taken up with questions utterly irrelevant to the points at issue; and, so far as it was relevant, it consisted of nothing but weak and flimsy arguments in support of the case of the Crown. He would just take two of the statements made by the Prime Minister as an example. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of Lord Spencer as having the respect of the general community. Surely it ought to have occurred to the right hon. Gentleman that by far the greater measure of Earl Spencer's success as an Administrator was to be found, not in the opinion of the general community over which he ruled, but of the people by whom he was sent to govern. It was as notorious as any fact in Ireland that there never had been a Representative of Her Majesty in Ireland who was more deeply and more widely loathed and despised in that country than the present Lord Lieutenant. If he were asked for a proof of this statement he need but refer to a recent tour of Earl Spencer, with the main incidents of which the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly familiar. By a consensus of opinion and action that was almost unprecedented, the loathing and the hatred in which Earl Spencer was held by the population of Ireland was then made known. He would give a second specimen of the right hon. Gentleman's statement and argument. The right hon. Gentleman asked, how could the Government convict those three men? What evidence could they produce; what tribunal could they institute to try them; what machinery had they available? That was the confession of the Prime Minister after two years of the Crimes Act—that three men, publicly accused of murder, could not be brought to justice or to trial. But he would give the right hon. Gentleman a fair chance. Let him place at the disposal of his hon. Friend the Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) the Search Clauses of the Crimes Act and the Secret Inquiry Clauses of the Crimes Act, and, if his hon. Friend would accept the loan, the services of Mr. George Bolton, and let his hon. Friend be supposed capable of imitating the jury-packing tactics of Crown Solicitors in Ireland, including the latest accession to the honourable order of Knighthood; and he promised on behalf of his hon. Friend that in three weeks he would have a case which no jury would reject for the conviction of the real murderers. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman referred to the Kilmartin case, of which, hitherto, the Government had been a little shy. The late Chief Secretary never said a word about that case until, at the end of his speech, he had to reply to an interruption. Yet that case must have been present to the right hon. Gentleman's mind. It was the Kilmartin case which kicked the right hon. Gentleman upstairs. The Prime Minister denied that there was any analogy between that case and the present. But the two cases were analogous. In each there was a crime committed, a man convicted, a statement that the conviction was unjust, and that the man was innocent, founded on a dying confession. Next, in the Kilmartin case, there was a primary inquiry held by the Government, and the then Chief Secretary brought forward that inquiry as an answer to the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). A second inquiry was refused by the Chief Secretary; but it was compelled by the action of the House, and the unhappy man was released after having undergone the horrors of penal servitude for two years. When Kilmartin was released his first thought was what would be the feeling of the Chief Secretary, who had done all he could to prevent the inquiry being held. He had thought that the late Chief Secretary's conscience would have been roused; perhaps it was, and his transfer from Ireland to the Foot-and-Mouth Disease Department was a consequence of that rousing of conscience. He remembered that when the horror which attended the execution of Myles Joyce was brought before the House the Prime Minister seemed to be greatly shocked. But the case was brought forward still more strikingly by his hon. Friend the Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) in United Ireland, in which was given the declaration of those two men from the gallows when they had the noose round their necks. But the result was that his hon. Friend was put on his trial for seditious libel. That was a test of the willingness of the Government to institute an inquiry into the matter, which they professed themselves ready to do if a proper case was shown. But the cheers which last night greeted his hon. Friend were not only an expression of the regard and esteem in which he was held by his friends, but indicated the conviction that the struggle with the powers of darkness at Dublin Castle was coming to an end, and that his hon. Friend's day of reckoning with Lord Spencer was very near. The trial of these men had been conducted with indecent haste, and the jury were only a few minutes in each case in finding their verdict. Everybody in Court, from the Judge downwards—and it was with deep concern that he included the counsel for the defence—were anxious to be rid of the case as soon as they could. [Ironical Ministerial cheers.] Well, he had not intended to refer to the counsel for the defence in these cases, as he did not wish to make it a personal matter; but, having been so directly challenged by the Prime Minister and Home Secretary, he would say that the counsel for the defence were incompetent, notoriously incompetent, to conduct it. The prisoners, as murderers, were defended by the smallest and pettiest counsel which the miserable fees of the Government would allow them. [Mr. KENNY: They were the worst on the Connaught Circuit.] The counsel for the defence were utterly incompetent. [Interruption, and "Eminent counsel."] The counsel employed could in no sense be said to be more eminent than the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), who interrupted him. He would repeat that there seemed to be a conspiracy between the Judge, counsel, and the juries to hurry the cases through the Court. Casey in his evidence stated that some time before they reached John Joyce's house they were joined by two additional men, Patrick Kelly and Michael Neale. The Judge called attention to this remarkable discrepancy in the evidence for the Crown, for it was observable that all the independent witnesses swore to there being 10 men, whereas the addition of Kelly and Neale brought the number up to 12. The mention of the two additional names afforded a clue to the whole affair; but although the chief prosecuting counsel for the Crown had declared that these men were at the root of the confederacy, no endeavour had been made to find any trace of them. He would ask the Government who Kelly and Neale were? Mr. Justice Barry remarked that it would be for the jury to say whether it was impossible or improbable that they were the instigators and concoctors of the whole affair. Yet the Government did not even condescend to make any inquiry about them. For once the counsel for the defence made a good fight. Mr. Malley tried to get a postponement, and one of his reasons for demanding it was the very point that had just been referred to; but Mr. Murphy, the counsel for the Crown, declined to accede to the request. He thought he had now clearly established the fact that there was a conspiracy to hurry on the case without a due and thorough investigation of the main and essential circumstances. In his opinion, the Government did not want to find out the true concoctors of the Maamtrasna massacre, because if the illegal murderers of Maamtrasna were discovered the legal murderers of Dublin Castle would also be discovered. With regard to the blackened faces, the Solicitor General for Ireland, in a flight of imagination, gave it as his explanation that black was white and that white was black. The explanation of the ex-Chief Secretary was that the poor boys, seeing the hellish work in which these fiends were engaged, would naturally imagine that their faces were black. This was the kind of evidence which they were asked by the Government to accept as probable and credible. The men who committed the murders were most of them relatives of and all of them well known to these two boys. Persons about to commit a crime in Ireland almost invariably disguised themselves—most commonly by blackening their faces. Almost the first thing that Casey had said when interviewed was that the men had blackened faces. The evidence was conclusive that the faces of these men were blackened.

am very glad that Gentlemen in that quarter of the House concur in my view of the gravity of the case, as far as Lord Spencer is concerned. Now, let us see what is the Motion that we have before us—what are its terms and what are its objects. The Motion prays for a full and public inquiry into the execution of Myles Joyce, and the continued imprisonment of four other persons. It aims, I think, at three objects—in the first place, it censures; in the second place, it asks for the retrial of the case; and, in the third place, for the revision of the case in consequence of new facts or evidence that is supposed to have come into our possession since the trial was concluded. Now, with regard to the censure upon Lord Spencer, that, I think, it ought to be clearly understood, is as distinctly as possible involved in the Motion itself and in its terms. The hon. Member (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) who has just sat down says we are only asked to do what was done in the Kilmartin case. I distinctly traverse that with all the courtesy that that statement will permit. In the Kilmartin case it was not even the act of this House which caused further proceedings. It was the production of facts and the discussion in this House. [Irish cheers.] I am very glad to hear those highly judicial cheers, which confirm the statement I make. It was the new facts and the discussion in this House which led the Executive Government spontaneously to refer to the Viceroy on the subject, and which led the Viceroy, from his own conviction, to arrive at a certain conclusion. But now, on the contrary, by the very terms of the Motion which are before us, the action of the Viceroy is absolutely excluded, and he is condemned, if this Motion passes, as incompetent and unworthy to perform the duties of his Office. I hope I have made it clear, even to the hon. Member who has just spoken, that there is a broad and clear distinction between this case and that of Kilmartin. It has been said, and no Gentlemen expressed their own opinion, that the motive of Lord Spencer in declining to re-open this case has been to shield official guilt and offences. I am not cheered as I was a moment ago. Well, I believe that is so now I have obtained the testimony which I should not have asked for had it not been so freely and abundantly rendered on previous occasions. Now, Gentlemen opposite think that the casting upon Lord Spencer of charges utterly destructive of his character and honour is for us a very slight matter. Who is Lord Spencer? Lord Spencer is a man of whom I will say, without fear of contradiction from any of those who differ from him more than from any who agree with him in general politics, that you cannot through the length and breadth of the country name an individual who commands a larger personal confidence. ["Oh, oh!" and loud cheers.] [An Irish MEMBER: Not in Ireland.] I am not speaking of hon. Gentlemen in that quarter of the House. I am speaking of the rest of the community. I am speaking of the general estimation in which Lord Spencer is held, and I affirm without fear of contradiction that there is not a man in this country who enjoys to the same singular degree the respect, the confidence, the veneration, and the affection of his fellow-subjects. Well, Lord Spencer does not stand alone; but I will not speak of those of whom I have less personal knowledge. I will not speak, for instance, of even so distinguished a man as Mr. Hamilton, who was sent to Ireland simply and solely because, on a survey of the whole range of choice, he was found and believed by us to be the best and ablest man whom we could send to fill a most arduous post. As I have never been in close official relations with him, I will not speak of him, and on the same ground I will not speak of the distinguished Gentleman who is now Attorney General for Ireland. But there is one person besides Lord Spencer of whom I will speak—a person who received a well-merited tribute last night from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), in the admirable speech which he made, if I may presume so to call it, and that is the Lord Chancellor of Ireland. I have known the Lord Chancellor of Ireland well; I have sat by his side in the arduous conflicts of this House; I have seen the interior and exterior qualities of the man, and I have never known a man of a mind more thoroughly judicial, or of a capacity more deserving of, or more entitled to, the absolute confidence of his friends, and of all those with whom he may come in contact. Well, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland has, of course, been the leading adviser of Lord Spencer in these transactions. It was his duty as a Member of the Government, and from no duty of his would he ever shrink. The reason I mention these things is to convey to the minds of hon. Members, if I can, what I think to be an error in their modes of procedure. I tell them plainly that a speech like the speech of the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Macfarlane), couched in terms of studied moderation, and without a word of charge or offence, is infinitely more likely to operate upon the mind of this House with respect to a Motion such as the present, than the making against a man like Lord Spencer, surrounded as he is by other men of the highest character and capacity, charges which, if true, show them to be the unworthiest of mankind. It would be well, if hon. Members desire the favourable judgment of this House, that they should speak a language understood by this House. But they have attempted to approach our hearts and minds through the medium of these sweeping condemnations of the character and motives of men whom we have been accustomed to revere and to love even more than we admire them. They speak to us in a foreign language. [Irish MEMBERS: We are foreigners!]

MR. SPEAKER: I must request hon. Members not to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman. These interruptions are very unseemly, and I hope they will not be persisted in.

MR. GLADSTONE: I, Sir, will do what I can to contribute to the peace and order of this discussion by taking no notice of what is said. I think, perhaps, a wider sense has been given to my words than they themselves convey. I say that hon. Members speak a foreign language when they make these charges against gentlemen like Earl Spencer and those by whom he is surrounded, such as the Lord Chancellor of Ireland. Of course, I do not mean to say that they really spoke in a foreign language when they argued the case now before us. But I wish to point out to them that that extravagance of speech is an impediment in the way of the object which I have no doubt they unanimously desire to attain. With regard to another class of functionaries in Ireland, I own that it appears to me that there is something very unsatisfactory in this mode of attack. There is a gentleman of the name of Bolton, in respect of whom I shall only take his name as the representative of an official person charged with certain duties. Well, what course has been taken in his case? He has been charged with offences which I understand are indictable offences, and for which, if I am rightly advised, it is in the power of those who believe them to be provable to secure his being indicted. [Laughter.] I am much obliged to the hon. Members who think that scornful laughter is one of the best modes of arguing a judicial question. It might, perhaps, be asked—"Why is not that course taken?" But I will suppose that for some reason or other it is not fit to be adopted; and, on the other hand, that the subject is fit to be treated in this House. I want to call the attention of the House to the manner in which it is treated. This House, according to every sound Constitutional doctrine, is the great inquest of the nation; and although there may be wrongs into which it is not the province even of this House to inquire, yet every one of us would desire to extend and not to contract that province. I will not, therefore, say that it is beyond the province of this House to inquire into these charges of an indictable offence which are made against Mr. Bolton; but this I will say—that the powers which the House exercises when it enters upon such a case are very great powers—powers which require to be carefully limited and checked in their use; and I must say that it is to my mind a dangerous and not altogether worthy practice—not worthy of the dignity of this House and of its Members—to present to the House Motions of great mildness in terms not directly conveying censure, and to support them in speeches involving the most tremendous charges of every kind. What is the effect? The effect is that those charges are scattered abroad to the world with the authority which they derive from having been introduced in debates in this House, but that no man is obliged to prove any of them. Now, that is a dangerous and evil state of things; and my contention is that when these grave and tremendous charges are brought forward by particular persons, these persons ought to be bound to prove them. [Hon. MEMBERS: Let us prove them. Grant the inquiry.] You wish for an inquiry. Then let him who wishes for it lay upon the Table of this House the charges which he wishes to make. That I say, not without some facts in my recollection, has been repeatedly the practice of this House when proposals were made ostensibly for an inquiry, but when the very institution of the inquiry involved at least a prima facie case of the gravest reproach, to require those who made the charges to bring them under the consideration of the House, and to pledge themselves to prove them, and only when the House has known what pledges were taken by the person making the accusation has the inquiry been granted. I remember a case not so grave as this, but yet a very grave one, in which I was myself concerned. A Notice of Motion was given by a distinguished Member of this House—the late Mr. Horsman—impugning the conduct of a very high functionary, a Bishop of this country—I forget the exact charges—but in regard to his proceeding in instituting to a particular benefice. The Motion was a vague Motion for a Committee to be appointed to inquire into the Bishop's conduct. Well, Sir, I made some investigation of the Journals of the House upon this occasion; and I found that I should be going according to precedent, as well as to principle, if I made a Motion to this effect—that the Member for Cokermonth do lay upon the Table of this House the charges to which he pledges himself, and which he pledges himself to prove before the Committee, before entertaining his Motion for a Committee.

MR. HARRINGTON: If the right hon. Gentleman will permit me, I shall be very glad to do so.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am very glad of any amendment in the form of proceedings that can be made. I am only observing upon the practice which has been adopted in the present case, which has been to place upon the Table a mild and comparatively inoffensive Motion, but, in speeches in support of it, to charge Lord Spencer with offences for which he would deserve impeachment, and to be still more liberal in accusations against other persons. I will only say one word more on this point. Were there a Motion made of direct censure upon the conduct of official functionaries, even in regard to judicial business—I mean persons connected with the Crown and Executive Government—that I should consider to be a Motion totally differing from the Motion before us, for I think it is desirable to leave the greatest latitude to accusations against persons in the Public Service; and it is not on account of its bearing on them that I would oppose this Motion at this moment, but on account of its bearing, as it appears to me, upon the judicial system of the country. Well, the first of the objects of the Motion of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Harrington) is censure, and the second is a retrial of the case. I limit myself to that proposition, because I admit that various Gentlemen in that quarter of the House have more or less declined to adopt the contention that the case ought to be retried. But a considerable portion of the arguments of hon. Members opposite is directed to what amounts to a demand for a virtual retrial of the case. For example, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) who has just sat down went over a good deal of the case with regard to the three identifying witnesses, and likewise with regard to the declarations made by the boys; and with respect to the first he raised a number of contentions as to the improbability or impossibility of their having given sound and true evidence, and in respect of their being under the influence of adverse motives, the whole of which had nothing whatever to do with the new matter which has come in since the trial, but which is a complete revival of questions involved in the original proceedings. Therefore, it is idle for the hon. Member to say, if he adheres to those arguments, that he does not ask for a retrial of the case. The hon. Member went further, because he dealt with the declarations taken from the two boys. He supposes that he has before him the fact that the counsel for the defence, having in his hands so much, at any rate, of those declarations as were given into the hands of the policemen, yet did not think fit to make them the ground of any fresh proceedings; and then the hon. Member actually says that because the counsel for the defence omitted to do for his clients what the hon. Member thinks he ought to have done, therefore there is ground for reopening the case.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY: If he had done so; I did not say he had done so. What I said was that if by some strange neglect on the part of the prisoners' counsel the case had not been put before the jury as it ought to have been, that was ground for making an inquiry.

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Member said two cases—either wilful omission or neglect. We know that the defendants' counsel did not proceed upon this evidence; the hon. Member says that he ought to have proceeded upon it; and his contention is that on account of this neglect on the part of the counsel for the defence there ought to be a retrial of the case. Therefore, let us not conceal from ourselves that this is not a contention for a retrial on account of any new evidence which has come out since the original trial; but it is a contention that there should be a new trial because the prisoners' counsel may not have taken a certain course which the hon. Member thinks he ought to have taken. If we have come to that, that we are to retry a great judicial case, not simply on account of errors committed by the Crown, but on account of errors which we rather think may have been committed by other people whom the prisoners charged had for their defenders, then, indeed, there is an end of the settled administration of justice in this country—then, indeed, it is high time that you should set about devising a totally new set of provisions for the purpose. There is no question at all as to many important facts in the case. I shall not attempt to speak of them with authority; but I will point to what I think is a reasonable view which might be taken of them by a lay and untutored mind who regards them from without. In the first place, it is impossible to put out of view that we are dealing here with the verdict not of one jury, but of three. In the second place, it is impossible, I think, for any reasonably-minded person to omit from his consideration something of great importance in connection with the topic I have just touched on—namely, possible error on the part of the counsel for the defence. Was there ever so fine an opportunity, supposing that some error was committed by the counsel for the defence in the first of these trials, for the counsel in the following trial to notice that defect? [MR. HARRINGTON: They were the same counsel.] Very well; it is identically the same thing; it is rather stronger. If he was the same counsel, assuredly there never was an opportunity so favourable for a man to consider in the second trial whether he had done his best for his client in the first, and, if he found he had not, to correct it in the second; and, again, in the third trial, to consider whether he had done his best in the first and second, and in the third to supply the defect. These are circumstances which certainly appear to me to give a remarkable solidity to the judgment and the sentence which we have before us. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in his, as I think, very temperate and very dignified speech yesterday, observed on the remarkable strength of the evidence upon which those verdicts were given. I think he said—and even an uninstructed person might well believe that there was something most remarkable in the fact—that you have in this case no less than three distinct identifying witnesses. It was one of those cases in which, as I understand it, the identification amounted to everything; because although the identifying witnesses did not see the deed done, yet they saw the persons charged place themselves in the position which brought them within the guilt of murder. And there were three distinct witnesses to this fact; there were also the confessions of guilt, and there was the evidence of the approvers. With respect to the evidence of the approvers—and it has been one of the most satisfactory features in the debate—there has been no great disposition to rely upon it, on the one side of the House or the other. Several Gentlemen on that side told us they were willing to part with the second deposition of Casey, and I do not think that there is any great disposition on this side to place undue reliance on the first. With respect to the plea of guilt, I know of no reason why it should be invalidated. But with respect to the evidence of the three witnesses, that is a point of such importance that I wish to ask the House to observe some of the particulars affecting that evidence and those witnesses. These witnesses had to go through three trials. There were three opportunities of testing their consistency, each with himself, and their consistency one with another. Not in a single particular in any one of the three was that consistency in the slightest degree impaired or broken down. Next, they were corroborated, up to a certain point, by the daughter; because a fact, very strange in itself, which is not now doubted or questioned, of their having—labouring men—given up the night to an excursion from their dwellings, is placed beyond all doubt whatever. As the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Gibson) observed last night, a large part of this identification remains practically undisputed—it is only as to a portion that there is a subject of contest. Next, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman observed, out of 10 persons found guilty, nine have, at one period or another, distinctly and formally admitted their own guilt; and there is only one, and he is dead, with respect to whom that admission is not forthcoming. There is another point which I have not heard noticed—at any rate, it is one that strikes me—it is this—that this evidence of the three identifying witnesses is not wholesale evidence given hand over head; but it is evidence given with discrimination. Two of the three identifying witnesses speak to the identity of all the 10 men; one of them speaks to the identity of nine, and says, with regard to the tenth, he did not know him. That is certainly a circumstance of care and apparent fidelity, which goes to support the evidence of those witnesses. But is not this a very extraordinary fact, upon the showing of hon. Gentlemen in that quarter of the House, that whereas 10 persons were charged with being out of their homes in a particular place engaged in committing a particular crime in the middle of the night, no single attempt has ever been made during the trial, or during the subsequent period, to prove an alibi for any of those 10 men? Is it possible to conceive, if those 10 men had not been the guilty persons, it should not have been practicable for some of them to show that they were at home in bed at the time when the murder was charged to have been committed; or, if not in bed, that they were, at least, in some other place than this? [Mr. HARRINGTON: Wives are not admissible witnesses.] But if their wives are not able to give evidence, there are not so many houses in Ireland where there are not children. I understand that there were actually two witnesses paid for by the Crown for Myles Joyce who were not called; and I am not aware that there could be any difficulty in proving that point. Another point that ought to be considered is that we are not dealing with an error of judgment on the part of those three identifying witnesses. They do not say—"I think it was so and so; to the best of my belief it was so and so." They did not give an opinion; they swore to a fact; they bound themselves as absolutely as men could do to the fact of the identity. The consequence is that if they did not speak the truth they were evidently perjurers. Then the House is asked to come to the conclusion that after three juries approved of their evidence, that evidence is to be rejected, and the men are to be treated as guilty of perjury. And does any one of those Gentlemen think that a jury would be found to convict any one of those persons? I do not hear a reply. [Several Irish MEMBERS: That is not the question.] There are ways of treating this question, undoubtedly, which are extremely short and easy. The oaths of the three men thus affirmatively and thus negatively corroborated, and the tale they tell, is dismissed by the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) as a wild and impudent fabrication. Undoubtedly, if we, sitting here as Members of Parliament, sent for other purposes than to go into judicial decisions, and finding this mass of evidence given by these three men, whose testimony is woven, as it were, one in the other, making a threefold strand hard to break—if with our knowledge of the contour of the country and the circumstances of the case, and with the opinion formed here by us as Members of Parliament, we are to disturb the most solemn judicial proceedings; then, indeed, the position is one of very great peril, and I trust the House will pause before consenting to assume it. Then there are three points that are taken—the evidence of the boys, the dying declarations of the two men, and the recantations of the approvers. So far, I believe, as is known to us, it is the recantation of one approver only—namely, Casey. [An hon. MEMBER: Two.] That is alleged; but we have not facts of that kind in our possession, and I must say I do not regard the matter as of any great importance. Whether there were one or two, it appears to me that such evidence is of very little value; and I believe hon. Gentlemen from Ireland are as well as aware as we are of the absolute impossibility of founding anything upon such evidence if it were to be applied to finding any person guilty of a criminal offence. But I dismiss the evidence of the approver, as I do not avail myself of the evidence of the approver. With regard to the two dying declarations, I would only speak of them as they appear from the statements of hon. Gentlemen opposite. The nature of these declarations is such that I believe in a legal sense they never can be treated as evidence. But I understand it also to be the case that they may present circumstances entitling them to moral weight; and in such a case they ought to be taken notice of and even acted upon by the responsible Minister in the exercise of the Prerogative of mercy. I am only going to offer an unprofessional remark—an extraneous remark—and it is this. It appears to me that if any moral weight is to be attached to such declarations, clearly the very first condition which you must absolutely require is that they should be conceived in the spirit and language of men who, conscious of the grievous offence they have committed against their laws and against their kind, seek at the last moment to make the best atonement in their power by telling the whole truth they know, and doing everything in their power, on the one hand, to exempt the innocent from punishment, and, on the other hand, to bring the criminals to justice. I take the statement of the declarations as it appears from the accounts given by hon. Gentlemen opposite who plead the force of it, and who tell us that these dying men pointed out the persons by whom they said the crime had been committed.

MR. HARRINGTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman produce the declarations?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have been tolerably patient of the hon. Gentleman's interruptions. I am not availing myself of anything in the declarations known to me. I am arguing upon what is shown, or stated, of them by those who plead them; and I say that upon their own plea they do not possess the very first qualification for entitling them to assume moral weight, and that qualification is that they shall be declarations of men desirous to atone for their, in this instance, horrible offence, by endeavouring to procure the full and effectual administration of justice. Then it is said that there is great importance in the evidence of the two boys, and here the charge is made of the suppression of the evidence of the boy who survived. Subject to all the reserves I have made as to the value of evidence, I entirely contest the statement made more than once that the declarations of the boys were contradictory to the evidence of the three identifying witnesses. There is no contradiction whatever in my opinion. [Laughter.] I regret that there are Gentlemen in this House who think that contempt, and the free expression of contempt, is the best mode of arriving at the truth in a difficult investigation carefully requiring the exclusion of all such elements. I differ from them, and I am very sorry, partly for my own sake, which is a trifling consideration, much more for their own sakes, and very much more still for the sake of their country, to which, I think, they are not doing justice when they are not able to conduct their operations in this House in modes more agreeable and more consistent with prudence and right feeling. I am of opinion, subject to their better judgment, that there is no contradiction whatever between the statements of the boys, and particularly of the surviving boy, which is the most important, and the allegations of the three witnesses. The points are whether the upper parts of the vestments were light or dark, and whether the faces were dirty or blackened, or in their ordinary and natural condition. I am not an Irish scholar, and it does not appear clear whether the boy who survived declared the faces to be merely dark and dirty, or actually blackened; and I will suppose he declared them blackened. Well, it was observed by my right hon. Friend that they might have been blackened when the men were in the cottage; it does not follow that they were blackened when they were made objects of identification by the three witnesses. And as to the upper vestments, what could be more easy and more simple than upon entering the cottage, or about it, they should strip themselves of the dark clothes they ordinarily wore, and should go into the cottage exhibiting a lightness of colour in their vestments? There is nothing approaching to a contradiction between the statements about the blackened faces and the clothes and the evidence of the three witnesses. It is said that all this in the boys' depositions was withheld from the knowledge of the prisoners' counsel. The hon. Gentleman opposite has possessed himself of the brief of the counsel for the Crown. Without making an inquiry into that matter I cannot regret that he has got the brief, for I am very glad he should know everything that can be known. [Mr. BIGGAR: Oh, oh!] The hon. Member for Cavan is maintaining the consistency of his character; but if he will be kind enough to shut his ears for one moment and allow me to proceed without interruption, I will repeat that I am glad the hon. Gentleman should be in possession of everything and anything that will assist him in this investigation. It is said that the final declaration of the younger boy was not communicated as a document to the Court, or to the opposite counsel; but I believe, as a fact, that that final declaration did contain the particulars which I have mentioned about the light clothes, which particulars were not contained in the account the boy gave to the constable. The account given to the constable, however, did contain the important fact about the blackened faces—if the word used signifies blackened. Did the counsel for the defence call, or attempt to call, the boy for the sake of examining him upon that matter?

Mr. HARRINGTON: The Crown produced him; but he was not allowed to be sworn by the Crown, because upon his production on the table it was found that he was not sufficiently instructed to know the nature of an oath.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Yes, Sir; but the hon. Gentleman's account does not draw the distinctions which are essential to the truth. The case is that the Crown suppressed this evidence, and the answer is that the Crown placed the boy upon the table to be examined. The Crown placed him upon the Table where a man is placed when he is going to be examined. What more could the Crown do?

Mr. CALLAN: Teach him the nature of an oath.

M'Carthy), in the course of his remarks to-night, observed that when he heard the speech of the Home Secretary yesterday it reminded him of an answer given by the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to-day. The hon. Gentleman confuses a little the present, the future, and the past tenses. I am reminded by my right hon. Friend that it was in the power of the counsel for the defence, who had been cognizant of the statements about the blackened faces for months before, at any time to have called the surviving boy as a witness; and if he had not been examined it would have been owing to the discovery that he was not a competent witness to give evidence in Court. The Crown placed him in a position to be examined, and that was all they could do, so far as they were concerned. We have this fact before us, that the counsel for the defence did not think it any part of his duty to his clients to take any step whatever to promote the examination of the boy. Such are the grounds upon which it is attempted to disturb these remarkable verdicts, and it is an attempt to disturb them in order that there shall be a full public inquiry. What is this inquiry to be? What are its possible forms? We are to begin by shutting out the only regular and Constitutional form. The Constitution of this country knows nothing of criminal appeal, properly so called, nothing of the retrial of cases, as was explained by the Home Secretary last night. It knows of the reference to the responsible Minister, who, surrounded by the very best advisers, and acting under the deepest sense of responsibility, is entitled to exercise the Prerogative of mercy. That mode of operation you begin by excluding, because what you are asking for is not a further investigation of the question by the responsible officer of the Queen, but it is a full and public inquiry, a description to which his operation could not correspond. What kind of a public inquiry is it to be? Is it to be a Committee of this House? I remember a similar case of endeavouring to overset the verdict of a jury by a Committee of this House. It was in the case, well known at the time, of Mr. Whittle Harvey. It happened in 1833 or 1834, and I myself sat upon that Committee. I voted alone against the Report of the Committee, which attempted to overset the verdict of the jury in Mr. Whittle Harvey's case. Mr. O'Connell was Chairman of the Committee, and he conducted the case with consummate skill and ability. That all but unanimous Report was presented to the House, and, powerful as the House is when acting in its own proper province, it showed how impotent is the House when it makes an irregular use of its machinery, although it was used as well as it could be for the purpose in view. The Report was so little recognized by the public opinion of the country that the Benchers of the Inns of Court, to whom Mr. Whittle Harvey had applied for his admission to the Bar, persisted in their refusal, and beat the Committee of the House of Commons. That was not very promising for inquiry by a Committee of the House, and yet I am by no means sure, if there was to be an inquiry at all, whether that would not be as good a method as any other. What has been suggested? It has been suggested that a very eminent Judge, Lord Bramwell, should be sent to examine into the matter. Has the hon. Member who recommended this appointment satisfied himself that Lord Bramwell will accept the duty? I suspect he knows as well as I do that there is not the smallest likelihood of such an acceptance. What would he or anyone else be invited to do? He would be sent partly to correct the defence at the original trial—for that the argument on the other side distinctly includes—and partly on account of the new evidence, which we believe to be wholly without weight for the purpose in view, and virtually to upset the verdicts of three juries, given unanimously and with a universal recognition of the weight of the evidence on which they were founded. What means would he have? How would he go to work? Whom would he examine? Would he examine this child now of 11 years? [An hon. MEMBER: Certainly.] Well, we know what the child has to say; we know his statement about the faces of the men and about their garments. As to one of these statements, that the faces were blackened, we know very well that the counsel for the defence did not think it worth his while to use it on behalf of his clients. Is he to examine the convicts who pleaded guilty? Is the House to send down some great lawyer to examine these four convicts who pleaded guilty, without any direct evidence tending to show that they were innocent, and to endeavour to convict them of falsehood on that plea, and prove them to be innocent? Is he to examine the recanting approver? I hardly think anybody will recommend that. [Mr. HARRINGTON: Why not?] Then there is one Gentleman who would examine him. I really thought that, throughout the debate, and especially by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and other hon. Members on that side of the House, a disposition had been shown to abandon as hopeless the statements of Casey as the foundation for any proceedings of a public and judicial character. If anyone could be found to undertake the inquiry, how is he to examine these persons? He has no power to administer an oath; he has to go to work without the sanction of an oath; and upon the strength of such evidence as he gets without the sanction of an oath he is to upset the verdicts which were arrived at in public after solemn and repeated inquiry, and covered by that solemn sanction. [Mr. GRAY: The Kilmartin case.] In that case the proceeding was one known to the Constitution, and it was completely distinct from that of a Court of Justice. But the proceeding you recommend is totally unknown to the Constitution; you have no precedent; it is a new and unheard-of method of disturbing a solemn judgment. It cannot be covered by the sanction of an oath, and the issue is not to be referred even to the judgment of a jury. In these circumstances, I must express my hope that a vast majority, a large and overwhelming majority, of this House will decline to accept this most objectionable and most inefficient Motion. My last objection to the full and public inquiry, be it as full and public as it may, is that it must be totally inefficient. You cannot possibly come at a body of testimony through the medium of such an inquiry, worth for one moment to be put in competition with the testimony upon which was founded the original solemn proceeding. We do not admit that there is any substance in the new evidence. We conceive that there is the greatest danger in arguments like those of the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) for re-opening and retrying that which was publicly, fully, impartially, and repeatedly tried, and affirmed by a Judge and by three juries. We enter our protest against the institution of a Court of Criminal Appeal, in the first place, for a single case, and not upon the foundation of a general law; and, in the second place, against the institution of a Court of Criminal Appeal, totally inferior in all its means of action, and in all its power to investigate the truth, to the tribunals which it seeks to supersede.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that the speech of the Prime Minister was really disappointing, not only to his political foes, but also to his political friends. It was one of the weakest, the lamest, and the most halting speeches the right hon. Gentleman had ever delivered in that House. The largest part of it was taken up with questions utterly irrelevant to the points at issue; and, so far as it was relevant, it consisted of nothing but weak and flimsy arguments in support of the case of the Crown. He would just take two of the statements made by the Prime Minister as an example. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of Lord Spencer as having the respect of the general community. Surely it ought to have occurred to the right hon. Gentleman that by far the greater measure of Earl Spencer's success as an Administrator was to be found, not in the opinion of the general community over which he ruled, but of the people by whom he was sent to govern. It was as notorious as any fact in Ireland that there never had been a Representative of Her Majesty in Ireland who was more deeply and more widely loathed and despised in that country than the present Lord Lieutenant. If he were asked for a proof of this statement he need but refer to a recent tour of Earl Spencer, with the main incidents of which the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly familiar. By a consensus of opinion and action that was almost unprecedented, the loathing and the hatred in which Earl Spencer was held by the population of Ireland was then made known. He would give a second specimen of the right hon. Gentleman's statement and argument. The right hon. Gentleman asked, how could the Government convict those three men? What evidence could they produce; what tribunal could they institute to try them; what machinery had they available? That was the confession of the Prime Minister after two years of the Crimes Act—that three men, publicly accused of murder, could not be brought to justice or to trial. But he would give the right hon. Gentleman a fair chance. Let him place at the disposal of his hon. Friend the Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) the Search Clauses of the Crimes Act and the Secret Inquiry Clauses of the Crimes Act, and, if his hon. Friend would accept the loan, the services of Mr. George Bolton, and let his hon. Friend be supposed capable of imitating the jury-packing tactics of Crown Solicitors in Ireland, including the latest accession to the honourable order of Knighthood; and he promised on behalf of his hon. Friend that in three weeks he would have a case which no jury would reject for the conviction of the real murderers. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman referred to the Kilmartin case, of which, hitherto, the Government had been a little shy. The late Chief Secretary never said a word about that case until, at the end of his speech, he had to reply to an interruption. Yet that case must have been present to the right hon. Gentleman's mind. It was the Kilmartin case which kicked the right hon. Gentleman upstairs. The Prime Minister denied that there was any analogy between that case and the present. But the two cases were analogous. In each there was a crime committed, a man convicted, a statement that the conviction was unjust, and that the man was innocent, founded on a dying confession. Next, in the Kilmartin case, there was a primary inquiry held by the Government, and the then Chief Secretary brought forward that inquiry as an answer to the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). A second inquiry was refused by the Chief Secretary; but it was compelled by the action of the House, and the unhappy man was released after having undergone the horrors of penal servitude for two years. When Kilmartin was released his first thought was what would be the feeling of the Chief Secretary, who had done all he could to prevent the inquiry being held. He had thought that the late Chief Secretary's conscience would have been roused; perhaps it was, and his transfer from Ireland to the Foot-and-Mouth Disease Department was a consequence of that rousing of conscience. He remembered that when the horror which attended the execution of Myles Joyce was brought before the House the Prime Minister seemed to be greatly shocked. But the case was brought forward still more strikingly by his hon. Friend the Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) in United Ireland, in which was given the declaration of those two men from the gallows when they had the noose round their necks. But the result was that his hon. Friend was put on his trial for seditious libel. That was a test of the willingness of the Government to institute an inquiry into the matter, which they professed themselves ready to do if a proper case was shown. But the cheers which last night greeted his hon. Friend were not only an expression of the regard and esteem in which he was held by his friends, but indicated the conviction that the struggle with the powers of darkness at Dublin Castle was coming to an end, and that his hon. Friend's day of reckoning with Lord Spencer was very near. The trial of these men had been conducted with indecent haste, and the jury were only a few minutes in each case in finding their verdict. Everybody in Court, from the Judge downwards—and it was with deep concern that he included the counsel for the defence—were anxious to be rid of the case as soon as they could. [Ironical Ministerial cheers.] Well, he had not intended to refer to the counsel for the defence in these cases, as he did not wish to make it a personal matter; but, having been so directly challenged by the Prime Minister and Home Secretary, he would say that the counsel for the defence were incompetent, notoriously incompetent, to conduct it. The prisoners, as murderers, were defended by the smallest and pettiest counsel which the miserable fees of the Government would allow them. [Mr. KENNY: They were the worst on the Connaught Circuit.] The counsel for the defence were utterly incompetent. [Interruption, and "Eminent counsel."] The counsel employed could in no sense be said to be more eminent than the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), who interrupted him. He would repeat that there seemed to be a conspiracy between the Judge, counsel, and the juries to hurry the cases through the Court. Casey in his evidence stated that some time before they reached John Joyce's house they were joined by two additional men, Patrick Kelly and Michael Neale. The Judge called attention to this remarkable discrepancy in the evidence for the Crown, for it was observable that all the independent witnesses swore to there being 10 men, whereas the addition of Kelly and Neale brought the number up to 12. The mention of the two additional names afforded a clue to the whole affair; but although the chief prosecuting counsel for the Crown had declared that these men were at the root of the confederacy, no endeavour had been made to find any trace of them. He would ask the Government who Kelly and Neale were? Mr. Justice Barry remarked that it would be for the jury to say whether it was impossible or improbable that they were the instigators and concoctors of the whole affair. Yet the Government did not even condescend to make any inquiry about them. For once the counsel for the defence made a good fight. Mr. Malley tried to get a postponement, and one of his reasons for demanding it was the very point that had just been referred to; but Mr. Murphy, the counsel for the Crown, declined to accede to the request. He thought he had now clearly established the fact that there was a conspiracy to hurry on the case without a due and thorough investigation of the main and essential circumstances. In his opinion, the Government did not want to find out the true concoctors of the Maamtrasna massacre, because if the illegal murderers of Maamtrasna were discovered the legal murderers of Dublin Castle would also be discovered. With regard to the blackened faces, the Solicitor General for Ireland, in a flight of imagination, gave it as his explanation that black was white and that white was black. The explanation of the ex-Chief Secretary was that the poor boys, seeing the hellish work in which these fiends were engaged, would naturally imagine that their faces were black. This was the kind of evidence which they were asked by the Government to accept as probable and credible. The men who committed the murders were most of them relatives of and all of them well known to these two boys. Persons about to commit a crime in Ireland almost invariably disguised themselves—most commonly by blackening their faces. Almost the first thing that Casey had said when interviewed was that the men had blackened faces. The evidence was conclusive that the faces of these men were blackened.

[Fourth Night.]

If the two boys were unable to identify the men, who were stated to be their first cousins, when they were standing over them beating their lives out, because the men's faces were blackened, how was it possible that the witnesses for the Crown could have identified them at a distance of 50 yards in the night time? He submitted that there was no pretence for the course which the Crown had adopted of holding back the fact that the boys had stated that the men's faces were blackened. It had been stated by learned counsel of great ability that the practice at the English Bar was that all facts of importance were communicated by the counsel for the prosecution to the counsel for the defence. But was that done in this case? Would the Attorney General for England dare to say it was? He dared not do so. It had been said by the Home Secretary that it was notorious that the boys had said that the men's faces were blackened. But was it notorious that the boys had stated that fact in their dying depositions? Such depositions were perfectly legal documents, and they were wilfully kept back by either the solicitor or the counsel for the prosecution from the counsel for the defence. The Home Secretary had further said that one of the boys was placed in the witness-box in order that he might be examined by the prisoners' counsel, but that it was proved that the lad did not know the nature of an oath. But this boy had been for three months in the care of the police; and could not they in that long period have educated him sufficiently to let him know the consequences of giving false testimony? It must be remembered that the boy was nine years of age, and was stated to be an intelligent lad, who could easily have been taught such a simple matter as that. The police did not train the boy because they did not want his evidence. The note inserted in the Crown brief by Mr. Bolton that the boy's evidence was unimportant was a deliberate lie, because his evidence would have been most important and pertinent. The inference was indisputable that the evidence was kept back wilfully and fraudulently. The Government had refused this inquiry on the ground that to grant it would be to interfere with law and order in Ireland, which was a paraphrase for saying that if it were granted they would lose the inestimable services of Lord Spencer. He, however, asked that this inquiry should be granted in the interests of law and order, and in the interests of Lord Spencer himself. Lord Spencer had, in the minds of the Irish people, as odious and as terrible a stigma upon his character as ever attached to any man. He was believed by the overwhelming majority of the Irish people to have been guilty of a cruel judicial murder; and the belief went further, because it was believed that he had been guilty of that murder in pursuance of a general policy of attempting to strike terror by indiscriminate cruelty and executions. It was believed that Lord Spencer had in his possession documents which would show his guilt in the matter; if, on the contrary, they would show his innocence, let him produce them. The Government had had the meanness to declare that the documents could not be produced, because to produce them would be contrary to precedent. But if there was anything in the world that was in accordance with immemorial precedent, it was that dying declarations of criminals should be made public. The impression, however, would be left upon the minds of the Irish people that Lord Spencer was afraid to produce these documents. He was, therefore, justified in saying that this inquiry ought to be granted in the interests of Lord Spencer himself, and of his own personal repute and his own mental tranquillity. It was one of the highest attributes of the law that all men should be equal before it; and in this case he demanded that the poor peasant, Myles Joyce, and the wealthy, distinguished, and eminent Peer, Lord Spencer, should be placed upon an equality. In the name of the majesty of the law he demanded that the life of the poor peasant should be deemed of equal value with the official career of Lord Spencer. The Prime Minister had said that no Irish policy could be complete unless it won over the hearts of the Irish people; but it seemed to be the favourite theory of successive Administrations that to solve the Irish problem they had only to put sufficient Irishmen in prison, and to put enough Irish bodies under ground. That was not true statesmanship. By refusing this inquiry the Ministry might retain the services of Lord Spencer, but they would lose what was of far greater importance to them

—they would lose the sympathy of Ireland. They might obtain a momentary advantage for their policy; but they would deprive law and order in Ireland of its surest, highest, and safest guarantee—the confidence and respect of the people.

MR. HOPWOOD, in opposing the Amendment, said, that such a demand as that put forward by hon. Members opposite would not for a moment be listened to if it related to some case in England. He (Mr. Hopwood) contended that it was absurd to say there was any difference in the administration of justice in Ireland and England. He was surprised that two of his hon. and learned Friends opposite thought fit to reprove the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland for having shown a little warmth in defending the conduct of his colleagues at the Bar in Ireland acting for the Crown in this case. When he heard the spouting declamation that the poorest peasant should be secured the same justice as the Peer, his (Mr. Hopwood's) answer was that it was secured. They were not accustomed to that sort of bravado in the administration of justice in England. The same course was pursued in the two countries with regard to the treatment of criminals, and he could call to mind several cases in England in which the same course had been pursued as had been pursued in this case. It was now desired to establish, for the purposes of this case, a Court of Criminal Appeal in the House of Commons itself; but he would remind the House that when his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, with the support of himself (Mr. Hopwood) and other hon. Friends, was doing his best the Session before last to obtain a Court of Criminal Appeal, hon. Members opposite gave him little assistance at any stage of the Bill? And it was the same with the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), who, in this case, it appeared, had now taken the Irish Party under his patronage. Had the noble Lord in any way assisted them? Nothing of the kind.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: The hon. and learned Member, I am sure, does not wish to misrepresent me. He will not deny me the same justice he is claiming for himself. I supported the Attorney General in every Division on his Motion.

MR. HOPWOOD: I should say that that was a ready answer in the extent of its audacity.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: It is quite true.

MR. HOPWOOD said, it was not for him to bandy words with the noble Lord. His impression was rather different to that of the noble Lord. A reference to the proceedings of the Committee would not bear out the noble Lord's statement. A trial had taken place in this case, and the most sweeping accusations had been made against the Judge and jurors who had tried the case. Hon. Gentlemen opposite from Ireland seemed to think that the Judge had acted wickedly, that the jury had acted wickedly, and that everybody had acted wickedly. ["No, no!"] Then, who had? [MR. HEALY: George Bolton.] Why, on their own showing, George Bolton had nothing to do with keeping back the two depositions. It was further said that there were singular circumstances connected with the case; but did hon. Gentlemen think that they were more capable of dealing with the case now than the jurors who had given so much attention to it? It was desired now to retry the case; but if their real wish was to inflame the hatred of the people of Ireland for this country, that was the way to do it. They had heard a great deal about the alleged suppression of the depositions; but he thought that their production or non-production was altogether a matter of discretion. He, himself, would have shown them to the defending counsel, and left it to him if he thought fit to comment on them; but the Crown counsel, no doubt, considered that they did full justice by producing the surviving boy for examination. The boy, however, turned out to be ineligible as a witness, owing to his not understanding the nature of an oath. Some suggestion had been made that the case should have been postponed, and the boy in the meantime educated. But such an application, when made in a well-known English case, had very rightly been scouted by the Judge. After careful consideration, he had come to the conclusion that what were called the dying declarations did not in the least affect the soundness of the verdict of the jury, and the best proof was that the men most concerned showed their own appreciation of their guilt by pleading guilty. Yet, a new investigation into their case was demanded. Well, he was in favour of inquiry; but there had been an inquiry already, and if any further evidence was forthcoming, he felt sure that Lord Spencer would hold a further inquiry. The present outcry was, he believed, due to a political motive. ["Oh, oh!"] It was simply a handle on which to hang an amount of cruel denunciation of Lord Spencer, that Gentlemen who used it would be ashamed, apart from politics, to apply to any fish-wife, or anybody in any other situation in life. Remonstrance, however, seemed to be useless; and he therefore hoped that those who sat on his side of the House, and who were determined to maintain the honour and character of Lord Spencer, would never submit to the present demands made upon them for the passing of this Resolution as a test of political triumph.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he was strongly interested in the preservation of law and order in Ireland, and he would rather thrust his hand into the fire and burn it off, than stand up and defend men whom he believed to be guilty. He thought this was a very similar case to that of Kilmartin, who had recently been released. He wished particularly to call the attention of the House to the fact that the case now awaited revision in circumstances wholly different from those which were presented to the jury. When these men were found guilty, he believed in their guilt, and that belief was never shaken until the two fellow-prisoners of Myles Joyce, on the eve of their parting from this world, spent some of the short time left for them to make their peace with God in inculcating themselves, and exculpating Myles Joyce. These men who made that declaration might have been as abandoned as the thieves on the Cross; but they should recollect that one of those thieves was, in his last moments, deemed worthy of acceptance. He also considered that Myles Joyce, in his denial of the crime, was worthy of all credence. The evidence of the independent witnesses would not of itself have compelled any jury to convict the prisoners, and the testimony of the informers, which made their statements good evidence, did not now stand in confirmation of it. Although he admitted that the three independent witnesses were honest, yet he thought they had jumped too readily to conclusions, and had described the men from a distance which seemed to him to be too great for the purposes of recognition. If they could have supposed the exculpation made by these two informers who admitted their own guilt, to reach Dublin Castle at the same time as the communication which subsequently came from the Archbishop of Tuam, he did not believe that it would have been possible for Lord Spencer to have sent Myles Joyce to his death. If Lord Spencer, at the eleventh hour, now ordered this inquiry, and placed the case in the hands of some Queen's Counsel to carry on an independent inquiry, as in the case of Kilmartin, he believed a just conclusion would be arrived at with respect to those men now in prison. The Prime Minister had asked, who could be examined at the proposed inquiry? Were they to examine the informers? And he (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) had interrupted by asking "Why not?" Was not their evidence as good and as trustworthy now as when they were purchasing their lives by their evidence, and as when the Crown accepted it for the conviction of the men who had been hanged and those sent to penal servitude? What was there to tempt them to come forward now but the workings of their own conscience? Was it to be believed that those men had been so crafty and deceitful as to succeed in imposing upon the Archbishop of Tuam? He maintained that this was a case for such an inquiry as had been given in Kilmartin's case, and if that were granted he should be satisfied. There was no legal difficulty in the way of a further inquiry in the case, and therefore he would strongly support the demand that was made upon the Government.

MR. T. O. THOMPSON said, that no vote he had ever recorded had caused him more anxiety than that which he would be called upon to give that night. During the last few days he had been considering very seriously the course he should take, and he must say that the exciting language that had been used on both sides of the question made it very difficult to form a calm judgment upon. He had, however, endeavoured to eliminate from his mind everything but what bore strictly on the legal view of the question; and when he said it was his intention to vote in favour of the Amendment, which was couched in very simple and plain language, not in any way calculated to excite their passions, he hoped he should not be looked upon as being a lukewarm supporter of the Ministry. It must be remembered that a grave responsibility rested on the prosecution in calling upon men as witnesses who would otherwise have been found guilty. It was only to be done when absolutely necessary, and in 99 cases out of 100 such witnesses were the principal witnesses. Here, on the other hand, they had been called to confirm the principal witnesses. They had been told that this was an attack on the Government in Ireland. He could not see that it was in any way a question affecting the Government; but he would ask the House to eliminate from their minds any such question. He did not see that granting such an inquiry as was demanded would involve any degradation to Lord Spencer. He exonerated Lord Spencer from all blame; but there had been, in his opinion, a slight miscarriage of justice. On the other hand, he did not blame very much the conduct which had been pursued on the other side. The prosecution evidently felt that no jury would convict on the evidence alone of men who swore that they identified the murderers on that dark night, and to back up that story it was necessary that approvers should appear. Since these had appeared—and their evidence doubtless contributed to the finding of the jury—one of these approvers went to his Bishop, admitted that he had done wrong, prayed to withdraw his former statements, and asked for inquiry. It must be borne in mind that if the Bill which the Government brought forward last year had been passed, then these men whose guilt was now in question would have been entitled by law to that which they now asked for as a favour. How, then, could the granting of an inquiry be a degradation of justice? He thought they were entitled to further inquiry. The testimony on which the whole case rested had been shaken in consequence of the confession of one of the approvers. He did not know—for no explanation had been given—why the Judge had not asked for the declaration of the dying boy, or why it had not been used by the counsel. If that declaration had been admitted, it would have thrown a doubt on the approver's evidence; it was not offered by the Crown; and now the approver's evidence was contradicted by the approver himself. The evidence for the Crown might have been sufficient without calling the approver; but if the Crown thought it necessary to call an approver, and after the trial there had arisen cause to discredit his evidence, should further inquiry be refused? He would ask any fair Englishman could he say that that was just? What did the existence of the best Government they had ever seen matter when compared with the importance of a question such as this, and with their solemn duty as regarded it? The noblest Administration that ever sat in this land would weigh but as a feather in the balance in comparison with the lives of these poor peasants in Galway. Had this case been so critically examined that there was no flaw in it whatever? If there was a flaw, then let them have a further examination. It was said also that to grant a fresh inquiry would be contrary to the Constitution. Was it really so? Was there no instance of that? Many of them must remember, as he did, the case of a man who was supposed to have committed a fraud upon the Bank of England. In that case an inquiry was refused again and again; but after the man had been transported for several years, he was brought back again by the judgment of the country, and compensated for the wrong that had been done to him. He maintained that it was not contrary to the Constitution to grant such an inquiry, as there was no time in a man's life when restitution could not be made to him under the law of England if it was found wrong had been done. He therefore earnestly trusted that the Government would grant an inquiry in the case, for, in his opinion, there had certainly been a clear and evident case made out for it.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT, in supporting the Amendment, said, that having been for 20 years Recorder of the borough of which the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair was the Representative in that House, and having, therefore, had a long experience in the Criminal Law and in the conducting of criminal cases, he had had ample opportunity of considering subjects such as those which were involved in the present case, and he had, therefore, endeavoured to come to a just conclusion concerning it. Before going any further, however, he wished to have a matter cleared up as to what took place at the end of last Session, when the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington), having been appealed to on the matter, had given a promise that it should be further inquired into. He (Sir Eardley Wilmot) understood that that promise had been redeemed; but in what manner had it been done? Why, the matter was referred back to the Lord Lieutenant, who referred it back to Messrs. Bolton and Brady, whose conduct to a certain extent was impeached.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: No, no. The only thing that Bolton or Brady had to say in the matter was to answer the charges made against them by this particular informer. The inquiry by the Lord Lieutenant was by the advice and with the aid of all the highest legal authorities he had around him.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he simply wanted to know, was it in consequence of the representations of the Irish Members that the noble Marquess did refer it to the Lord Lieutenant; and whether the Lord Lieutenant held the inquiry; and that the result was that he determined that any further steps were inexpedient? He was, therefore, glad to hear the explanation that the inquiry had been conducted by the proper authorities. For his own part, he had listened carefully, and he hoped with impartiality, to most of the speeches which had been delivered, and especially to that of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker), and the one proceeding from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department; he had waited in the House night after night with the most patient attention; and, bringing to bear his judicial experience of many years upon the matter, he had come to the conclusion that there had been a great wrong done to men, one of whom underwent the sentence of death, and others of whom were now in prison. But, while saying that, and that the wrong done was of such a character as to demand inquiry, he entirely repudiated the charges that had been made against the Lord Lieutenant, who, he thought, had done his duty most fairly and ably as far as his lights went. The noble Lord, however, had not sufficient light to enable him to judge of such a case; and he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) considered—without for a moment blaming him—that he had made a mistake. If, indeed, he could conceive that the charges made by hon. Members below the Gangway were true—that the Lord Lieutenant had entered into a conspiracy to defeat the administration of justice—all he could say was that the just indignation of the people of Ireland should sweep the Castle of Dublin and the whole of those connected with it off the face of the earth. But he did not attach the slightest credit to the suggestion that there was any foundation for such a charge, and he did not believe it for a moment. His own experience of the Legal Profession enabled him to know that there was not unfrequently a desire and a wish on the part of prosecuting counsel to press home a conviction, and to make that their chief and leading object. He had seen that himself in small cases, at the Sessions and on Circuit. A consideration of the two pre-eminent facts of the case had led him to the conclusion that the case was one for further inquiry. The first was to be found in the declarations made by two of the condemned men before their execution. Here they had two of the men on their way to execution, and almost in sight of eternity, declaring before two magistrates the justice of their own punishment, the innocence of the third man, Myles Joyce, and the innocence also of the four men who were now undergoing penal servitude for life. He confessed he was struck with the utmost astonishment that the confession, made at such a time and under such circumstances, had not been made the subject of immediate inquiry. He would remind hon. Members of the case of Edmund Galley, condemned to death at Exeter many years ago, but reprieved on inquiry induced by the statement of the man condemned with him that he had nothing to do with the crime, although the reprieve was followed by a transportation of 40 years, at the end of which Galley was freed, and granted £1,000 compensation on a Vote passed by that House. He also remembered the case of the Winchester pirates who were condemned to death, one of their number being a boy of 15. They were to be executed on a Monday, and on the previous Saturday, the convicted men sent for the chaplain of the gaol in which they were, and said that the boy was innocent of the crime with which he had been charged, as he had only acted under duress, having been threatened with death if he would not join with the others. This confession of the prisoners was not suppressed. The chaplain at once proceeded with it to London to show to the Home Secretary; but unfortunately that official was away at Balmoral, and as he could not be communicated with in time, there being neither railway nor telegraph at that time to that part of the country, the prisoners were all executed. He had never felt convinced of the justice of the execution in the case of that boy, and consequently, since the trial of the Winchester pirates, he had always advocated the establishment of a Court of Criminal Appeal. In fact, he was so convinced of the necessity of a reform in our criminal system that it had led him, although unsuccessfully, on three occasions to bring in a Bill for that purpose. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in his speech the other night, had pointed out that, in the absence of such a tribunal, this case could not now be reopened; but whose fault was it that there was not a Court of Criminal Appeal? It was the fault of the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was a Member, seeing that it was promised in the Queen's Speech two years ago. He dismissed from his consideration of the case the whole of the secondary evidence of Thomas Casey. With his antecedents, no jury would for a moment credit it. But he repudiated altogether the doctrine which had been raised in the course of the debate, and which had surprised him very much—namely, that the prosecuting counsel had it in their discretion to say whether depositions might be withheld from counsel for the defence which might or might not affect the evidence against a prisoner on trial. In investigations which had for their object the elucidation of truth, that doctrine could not be admitted. It was also well worthy of consideration that if the young Joyces did not recognize their own cousin among the murderers, there was little chance of the independent witnesses being able to identify the whole of the 10 men. The hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) had presented the case very ably in his book, and he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) had studied the matter carefully. After 30 years' experience of Criminal Law, he should say that he had never heard of such a thing as depositions being suppressed, as appeared to have been done in that case. In his opinion, the suppression of the confessions made by the men before execution, and the withholding of the depositions of the boys from the knowledge of counsel at the time of the trial, were quite sufficient to justify a call for inquiry. He would, therefore, cheerfully support the Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had spoken of the inconvenience which a reopening of the question would involve; but he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) had never heard that if a wrong was done to any one of our fellow-countrymen it could possibly be without a remedy. He could not help thinking that the present case was an illustration of the evils arising from a system of double Administration. He would remind them of the saying of that eminent patriot and statesman, Grattan, that with a united Legislature a separate Government would never succeed or prosper. With a united Legislature there ought to be united Government, and he believed that the time had come when a thorough alteration should take place in the administration of justice in Ireland. They should have equal laws for both nations—Paribus se legibus ambo atema in federa jurisgant—and if they wanted turbulence and discontent to be discontinued, he believed that this was a very good opportunity for the Government to devise and consider whether they could not place the Administration in Ireland upon a better footing and in such a manner as to tranquillize the country and give satisfaction and contentment to the Irish people.

MR. BULWER said, that, like his hon. and learned Friend who had just spoken (Sir Eardley Wilmot), he (Mr. Bulwer) had been connected for more than 30 years with the administration of the Criminal Law, and having some little acquaintance with the mode in which that law was administered in this country, he wished to make a few observations. He should not in the least be influenced by the intemperate and unbecoming language used in that debate by hon. Members below the Gangway, though that might be an inducement to some men of impulsive temperament to vote against them. Neither, on the other hand, should he be inclined to support the Government on the ground of the rubbish which had been uttered both in and out of the House to the effect that if the Amendment were carried Lord Spencer, and probably the Home Secretary, would have to retire. That would not influence him in the least in the consideration of the question before the House, which was whether four or five men should be left in penal servitude for the remainder of their lives. He would also pass over all the talk in and out of the House about the conversion of Casey, and would make only one or two remarks on the points urged by his hon. Friend below him (Sir Eardley Wilmot). As to the observation that the Government had not given due consideration to the statements made by the culprits on the scaffold, everybody who had any acquaintance with Courts of Justice, or criminals, knew that it was far from unusual for guilty men on the scaffold to declare their innocence, or, where four or five men had been engaged in the commission of a crime, for some of them who had no hope of escape to try to do something for the others. The other point, which he confessed had impressed him to some extent, was that the counsel for the prosecution were said to have withheld from the counsel for the defence some evidence which ought to have been made known to them. On the night of the murder the two young Joyces were wounded; they were expected to die; it was said that they were sworn; and if that was the case it gave their declarations some additional solemnity. But then they were not cross-examined. It seemed to have been entirely forgotten in this discussion that a dying declaration could only be given in evidence, if it was evidence at all, in a case where the death of the person making the declaration was the subject of inquiry. Every lawyer knew that the declaration of the boy who died could not have been put before the jury on these trials by any regular process; and, in the case of the boy who survived, he was tendered as a witness; but it turned out that he was incompetent to give evidence, because of his want of that education which the law required that a witness should possess. It was suggested that the counsel for the Crown ought to have handed to the counsel for the defence documents—miscalled depositions—which he himself could not have made use of on behalf of the Crown, and which the prisoners' counsel could not have used if he had had them in his possession.

Mr. Bulwer

The documents could not have been used before the jury by any regular process; and it was, therefore, absurd to say that the counsel for the Crown ought to have handed to the counsel for the defence documents which neither of them could have made use of.

MR. HARRINGTON: It could have been made use of in cross-examination.

MR. BULWER said, the hon. Member who interrupted him knew nothing about the matter. Did the hon. Member mean to tell lawyers in that House, or out of it, that a counsel could cross-examine about the contents of a written document which was not admissible in evidence? [MR. E. CLARKE: He could.] He maintained that the declarations could not have been brought before the jury, except in an irregular way. ["Oh, oh!"] He must protest against the indecorous and personal observations made by those indecent Irishmen sitting below the Gangway. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. KENNY rose to Order. He wished to ask whether the hon. and learned Member was in Order in alluding to Irish Members sitting below the Gangway as indecent Irishmen?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Member complained, as I understood, of indecorous conduct on the part of some Irish Members; but he himself is quite out of Order in speaking of hon. Members as indecent Irishmen.

MR. BULWER said, he begged hon. Members' pardon if he had applied the word "indecent" in too wide a sense. He had merely intended it to apply to the repeated indecent interruptions he had met with from some Irish Members. He considered them to be indecent at the time, and he thought so still. He wished to point out that the constable who said he had heard one of the boys say that the men had blackened faces could have been questioned upon the point, and in that way the boy's statement might have been brought before the jury; but he repeated that neither of the so-called dying declarations could, by any regular means, have been given to the jury, and he had yet to learn it was the duty of counsel for the prosecution to place documents, which he could make no use of himself, in the hands of counsel for the prisoner, when he knew that he could make no use of them either.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, that if the Amendment had remained in its original form he should have taken no part in the discussion; and he desired at the outset emphatically to say that he did not intend to support any of the general charges which had been advanced on the other side of the House. He declined to believe in the justice of the wholesale accusations which had been launched against several distinguished persons connected with the administration of the law in Ireland. He had not ever constituted, and did not then, constitute himself an apologist for the Irish Executive. He had again and again found fault with acts of their administration; but he declined to believe that Lord Spencer, or the Lord Chancellor, or the ex-Chief Secretary, could any one of them knowingly be parties to any dishonourable act. It was said that although the Amendment did not in words convey this, that in substance it was a condemnation of those official persons. What the Amendment asserted, and what he, after painful and anxious consideration, had come to the conclusion was true, was merely this—that it would insure greater confidence in the administration of the law if an inquiry were granted into the execution of Myles Joyce, and into the case of the prisoners who were still incarcerated. He knew that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, after whom he had been anxious but was unable to speak, laid great stress on a "public" inquiry; but the pith and substance of the Amendment was that further inquiry was needed. If the Amendment did involve blame on Lord Spencer, the Lord Chancellor, and the ex-Chief Secretary, he could not help it, because he believed it contained a statement which was emphatically true. He began the consideration of this case with the very strongest feeling that an unanswerable case had been made out on the part of the Crown, proving the guilt of the men convicted and of the men who had pleaded guilty. He had that feeling in his mind so strongly that he expressed it in conversation with distinguished persons in Ireland. It was only by slow and painful steps that he had come to the conclusion that there did exist very grave doubt, to put it no higher, of the guilt of the man, Myles Joyce, who had gone to his last account, and the guilt of four of the men who remained in prison. He begged to point out that it was not necessary for those who were supporting the Amendment to make it clear that Myles Joyce was innocent, or that the four men now suffering penal servitude were innocent. If a serious doubt were raised, as, in fact, it had been, as to the character of the evidence, those who entertained that honest conviction were bound to make every legitimate effort until the matter had been thoroughly investigated, even though Administration after Administration, Chief Secretary after Chief Secretary, and Lord Lieutenant after Lord Lieutenant, were supposed to be involved in the case. The opinion he originally formed was decidedly against those as to whom it was now alleged that there were grave doubts of their guilt. He should like to be allowed to point out what struck him as being the strength of the case for the Crown, and the circumstances which, to his mind, seemed to sap and to undermine a great part of that case. The first thing which struck one was that the guilt of the three men executed was proved by three witnesses who had been called "independent witnesses." Now, it was a remarkable circumstance that in the course of the trial, with the exception of a passing question, no serious attempt seemed to have been made on the part of the counsel for the prisoners to disprove the apparent independence of those witnesses. He severed himself entirely from the suggestion which had been made by the hon. Member for Galway, and which he was sorry to hear—that the learned counsel who appeared for the prisoners were wilfully neglectful of their duty, or else were in a conspiracy. [Mr. HARRINGTON: No, no.] He dissociated himself entirely from expressions of that kind.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he certainly did make use of the word "conspiracy." But what he meant to say was that there was a conspiracy on the part of those who were engaged in the prosecution, and he was led by the jeering cheers of the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary to add that that was combined with incompetence on the part of the counsel for the defence, and that the trial was conducted with indecent haste.

Mr. CHARLES RUSSELL went on to remark that, as the men were brought from different parts of the country, and as few of them could speak English, it was difficult to get up the defence of the prisoners. But who were those so-called independent witnesses? It turned out that they were only Anthony Joyce, John Joyce, his brother, and Patrick Joyce, his nephew. Were these persons independent witnesses against any of the prisoners? He referred to a statement which was vouched for as having been made by the informer Thomas Casey to the hon. Member for Westmeath. He placed no reliance on a statement of an informer as such; but he did place reliance on it in so far as it was capable of corroboration, and in so far as it suggested further means of inquiry. Thomas Casey said that Myles Joyce was in constant quarrel with Anthony Joyce and with Anthony Joyce's friends and family, and he mentioned a fact which was capable of instant contradiction if untrue—namely, that a comparatively short time before the occurrence of the 17th of August, 1882, Myles Joyce had been sent to Galway Gaol for a month for an assault upon this so-called independent witness. It was asked, however, how it happened, if the story of the independent witnesses was untrue, that they hit upon some of the right men? That was an observation of great weight, and he would try to answer it. First of all, it should be remembered that they were dealing with a sparsely-populated district, where everybody knew all about everybody else. One little bit of the informer's evidence was significant as to how he, not having had any quarrel with Anthony Joyce or Anthony Joyce's family, came to be included among the persons incriminated. Thomas Casey stated that at the examination before the magistrates he asked Anthony Joyce in Irish why he made a charge against him, and the reply was—"You hold your tongue. I saw Pat Casey going over for you in the evening." Pat Casey admitted his guilt on the scaffold. That notorious character went across to see Thomas Casey, and thereupon Anthony Joyce came to the conclusion that they were both implicated. A great point on the part of the Crown was that some of the prisoners pleaded guilty. But how did they come to plead guilty? The circumstances were these. A batch of men were awaiting their trial for the same murders upon the same evidence as had been given in the first, second, and third trials. They knew that three men had been found guilty on the same evidence which would be forthcoming in order to fix criminality upon them. In these circumstances he could understand the advice given by the priest, although he quite concurred in the remarks of the Home Secretary with regard to it. Could those who were still in suspense doubt that, however innocent they might be, the same evidence must inevitably send them also to the scaffold? No doubt that was the consideration which influenced the mind of the priest when he advised them to plead guilty. He (Mr. C. Russell) had tried to examine all the evidence in this case in as judicial and as calm a spirit as he could assume; and he found that his original opinion was gradually slipping from him, and that he was haunted with doubts from which he could not free himself. He would now look at the other side of the question. He believed that if anyone read the description of the country where this murder occurred, he must come to the conclusion that a more extraordinary account than that given by the so-called three independent witnesses of their identification of the accused men had never been given before in a Court of Justice. The Attorney General (now Mr. Justice Johnson), in opening the case to the jury, stated that the murders were committed on the 17th of August, and the fourth day of the moon, and that, therefore, there was very little light. Anthony Joyce said that he was disturbed by the barking of a dog; he opened the door, and he went out; and it was a curious point what became of the dog, which would hardly stop barking when his master went out, and which would certainly attract attention to Anthony Joyce's house. He went out, he said, and joined the three men, and went along the road at such a distance from the party they were following that he could identify them, and, therefore, within such a distance that they could have identified him. Could he go for two miles or more so near to these men in an open country on murderous errand bent, and they, naturally looking round to see whether they were watched, not observe him? It was strange that he should do so without being seen or heard. There was a police station about a mile distant; and yet these men, who followed the murderers and heard the murder being committed, went home to their beds without going to the police station. If it was said it was the last place an Irish peasant would go to, the answer was that the next day, after the man now charged with being the primary offender was arrested—namely, “Big” Casey, information was given by these men, who had probably some idea of a reward being offered. The Prime Minister made a point of the discrimination of the independent witness who identified only nine men; but that point told with great force as regarded the statement of the informer Casey; he discriminated, too, in his declaration as to the men who were guilty and the men who were not guilty, because it was admitted by him that guilt attached to two of the men executed, and to one of the men in penal servitude. The counsel for the defence would have increased difficulty in meeting the case of Myles Joyce after the other two men had been tried and condemned, and application was made for a postponement of the trial; but the Judge did not think the grounds stated were sufficient. After the second trial, it came to the knowledge of the defending counsel for the first time that Philbin and Casey had turned approvers; but up to that time no intimation of the fact had been given. He did not understand it to be alleged that any statement either by Philbin or by Casey was furnished to the counsel for the prisoners. The English practice was that the defending counsel should be furnished with the statement of every witness. An examination of the statements made by the approvers on the 9th and the 10th August showed considerable differences, which would attract the attention of anyone who had carefully read the evidence of the independent witnesses. The changes in the second statements brought them more closely into accord with the evidence of the independent witnesses. These statements ought to have been at once handed to the counsel for the prisoners. As to the declarations of the dying men, he understood the principle to be that a dying declaration was admissible if, in the opinion of the Judge, it was made by a person under the apprehension of death, and bore on the question of the death then being inquired into of the person making it. There was a decision in a case in which A and B were poisoned on the same occasion, though not by one act; and the Judges held that, the transaction being one, as the murders were in this case, the declarations of A and B were admissible in each other's cases. In this case the charges took the murdered persons seriatim, beginning with the head of the family, and the accused seriatim, each prisoner being charged with a different murder; and, therefore, if a declaration were not admissible in one trial it would be in another. Wholly apart from such a question of admissibility, it was incumbent on the counsel for the prosecution; whether they intended to use the declarations or not, whether strictly admissible or there was a doubt about it, to communicate such documents to the counsel for the prisoners. He challenged his hon. and learned Friends in that House to say whether, as prosecuting counsel, they would not have communicated such dying declarations? He knew that no one had done more to maintain the honour of the Bar and the good character of the Criminal Judicature than the Attorney General (Sir Henry James); and he was perfectly confident that if the Attorney General asked himself the question whether, if he had been the prosecuting counsel in the case, he would have withheld this evidence, he would feel that he would not have done so. Prosecuting counsel were not bound to make as part of their own case a piece of evidence which they had strong reasons to believe was unreliable; but there was no manner of justification for setting up their own judgment as to the character of those documents and withholding them from the opposing counsel; they were bound to hand them to the counsel for the defence. Then the Home Secretary asked what was the effect of this omission. But he carefully expressed no opinion as to what he himself would have done in that case. But he had asked what harm was done, as a statement had been made by two police-constables that the boys had told them in the one case that the men's faces were dirty, and in the other that they were black. But, as had been shown by his hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. Bulwer), who had just sat down, that would have been a case of indirect evidence upon which the cross-examination must have been necessarily lame. Could anyone say—could any lawyer say—that the value of such an indirect piece of evidence was to be compared with the solemn declaration of these boys? Of course, it was said that it would not have made any difference. But who could tell, who could judge of that? Who knew how far the solemn fact that such a dying declaration had been made might have suggested to the prisoners' counsel questions as to the locality, distance, and circumstances which might have thrown doubts upon the apparently coherent evidence of these so-called independent witnesses? With respect to the other boy who made a dying declaration, but happily survived, he made an accusation against those who conducted the trial to this extent—that they failed to give that information to the prisoners' counsel. Next, as to this boy, if the prosecution was anxious to examine him, the objection to his examination ought not to be made by those who tendered him for examination. The objection ought to be taken by the Judge. But it was remarkable that the objection in this case came from the interpreter. But by whom was it suggested to the interpreter? If the boy imperfectly understood the nature of an oath, he ought to have been instructed, as he had no possible motive to say anything but the simple truth. It seemed to him, therefore, incumbent on the Government as regarded the trial of Myles Joyce, though it was too late to do anything except to clear his reputation, to leave no stone unturned in order to exhaust all possible information. Then it was asked what value could be attached to the next set of declarations, the declarations of the two men who suffered death, and of Myles Joyce himself, whose last breath was a declaration of his innocence? It was not as if they had concerted a statement to relieve others from a fate similar to their own. Each of them, from his separate cell, sent for the magistrate, and before the magistrate each made his separate statement. Now, the Prime Minister had observed that if the declaration had been one that not only exculpated Myles Joyce, but pointed out the true criminals, the case would have been widely different. But what right had the Prime Minister to speculate on what was or was not contained in the declarations? Why were they not produced? He agreed that, according to the circumstances of the declarations, they might attach greater or less weight to them; but in this case each of the declarations was the independent and spontaneous act of each man.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have not done so. What I said was, that I took the statements of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and my answer was good as against their plea.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, that hon. Members opposite had dealt with the admission only so far as it affected the guilt or the innocence of Myles Joyce. They had assumed that it contained nothing else. No one had a right to speculate as to what was or was not in that document if the inexorable rule of the Home Secretary was to prevail. But the argument of Lord Spencer in the famous Memorandum of August, 1884, was not that of the Prime Minister. Lord Spencer's argument was that when these men said they were guilty and Myles Joyce was innocent, all they meant was that it was not Joyce's hand that did the deed. How did Lord Spencer know what they meant? But if there was a doubt upon his mind as to the nature of these declarations, surely that was a matter of sufficient solemnity and importance to demand a further inquiry then and there. He attached much greater importance to those declarations than the Home Secretary. The law allowed dying declarations to be admitted as evidence without oath and without cross-examination, because it was believed that human nature was so constituted that the solemn approach of death, with its awful sensations, was at least as powerful as binding the conscience than any formal oath taken in a Court of Law. If that influence was powerful upon any minds, he claimed that it was exceptionally powerful upon the mind of the Irish peasant, who, however debased he might be, however low his moral standard, however imperfect his education, did believe earnestly in a future state. He believed in an awful Judge, and in future rewards and punishments. Such men were not likely to have a damning lie on their lips when they were about to be launched into eternity. If that was true in the case of Myles Joyce, how much more likely was it to be true in the case of the two men who, while exculpating Myles Joyce, admitted their own guilt? What motive could be suggested save that they were desirous of saving the life of an innocent man? These were the reasons why he thought that a further inquiry into this matter ought to be granted. He then came to the difficulties which had been stated by the Prime Minister to render it impossible to grant the inquiry asked for. The Prime Minister had said that there was no analogy between the present case and that of Kilmartin. Why not? The Prime Minister had said that the inquiry in the Kilmartin case was what he termed a spontaneous act proceeding from the Executive authority. So it had been undoubtedly in one sense, and the fact that it had been instituted was highly creditable to Lord Spencer; but it was only spontaneous after the matter had been discussed over and over again, and after the late Chief Secretary, acting perfectly bond fide upon information furnished him by others, had declined to institute the inquiry. He trusted that in that sense there would be another spontaneous inquiry in the present case. There would be no more difficulty in this case than in the other. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] He saw that the Prime Minister shook his head; but he was at a loss to understand what insuperable difficulties were in the way of an inquiry in the present case which did not exist in the other. He entirely agreed with the Home Secretary that there existed in law no machinery by which either he or the House of Commons could be constituted a legal tribunal that could take fresh evidence and could review the former trial. The law was curious upon this, for all that the Chief Secretary could do in case he was satisfied that a man was undergoing punishment for an offence of which he was not guilty would be to advise the Queen graciously to forgive the man for the offence which he had not committed. Was it not the fact, however, that the records of the Home Office furnished numbers of examples of inquiries such as that now asked for? He would recall to the mind of the Home Secretary Smethurst's case, in which Sir George C. Lewis, acting upon the advice of Sir Benjamin Brodie, in effect reversed the judgment of the jury finding Smethurst guilty. In other words, where there was a will there was always a way. He was not concerned in this matter with what hon. Members below the Gangway opposite thought of his remarks; what he was concerned with was what would quiet the conscience of the country. Hon. Members opposite, by the course they had taken, had rendered it very difficult for him to meddle in this matter and to explain why he was speaking as he was doing, and why he should vote in favour of this inquiry being granted. He could tell the House that it was not only among hon. Members opposite that the opinion was held—it was an opinion that was growing and was gathering strength day by day throughout the country—that Myles Joyce was innocent, and that four of the men who were now in prison for these murders were innocent. He said that there should be no limits to the way of inquiry, although whether or not it would satisfy the country or satisfy hon. Members below the Gangway he did not know. An inquiry conducted somewhat on the lines of the Kilmartin inquiry would go a long way towards quieting the minds of the Irish people in reference to this matter. And let him point out one means of testing the truth of the story now told by the informer Casey. The informer Casey, in his evidence, made a statement as to the persons whom he joined and accompanied to the scene of the murders. Among those persons was a man named Michael Casey, who had pleaded guilty, and who was now undergoing penal servitude, and whose guilt was admitted. That man had, therefore, no means of communicating with the informer Casey, and he would have no motive for speaking other than the truth. Let him be asked as to the truth of the story now told by the informer. He was afraid, however, from the course this debate had taken, that for the Government to grant this inquiry would be regarded as a triumph for hon. Members opposite, and that that would increase the difficulty in the way of the Government making this concession. He appealed to the Government, however, to let no such fear stand in the way of an act of justice being done. He admitted that the demand had been made in intemperate, rash, and offensive language; but he contended that if there was a doubt in the matter, the Government were bound to grant an inquiry, no matter what Party or what section would triumph thereby. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had said that to grant this inquiry would be to shake the foundations of justice in Ireland; but those foundations must indeed be rotten if they could be shaken by an act of justice being done. If there were truth in the suggestions which had been made, an inquiry would strengthen them; if there were no truth

If there were truth in the suggestions which had been made, an inquiry would strengthen them; if there were no truth

obtained by the improper action of the Crown officials, and I hope the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) will forgive me for saying I wondered when I heard his speech whether at the moment he was bearing in mind the great responsibility which fell on him in adding the great weight of his authority to the charges which were made against the administration of justice. The hon. and learned Member stated that much depended upon whether these men were or were not induced by the officials of the Crown to plead guilty, and the senior Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) has stated as a fact that the men had been visited in prison for the purpose.

MR. HARRINGTON: With the permission of the Home Office.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I can only say on authority that there is not the slightest foundation for that statement. The charge does not appear even in the pamphlet of the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington), and I give the hon. Member full credit for having done the best for the cause he has undertaken; but even he does not suggest that any Crown official ever saw one of these men.

MR. HARRINGTON: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman allow me to interrupt him? I may not have, stated the fact; but I have it on the authority of their own solicitor, that on the day of the trial they were all visited in gaol by the Crown Solicitor, Mr. Bolton.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I have to say that I am informed that is not the fact, and it has not been stated before. I say distinctly, on the part of those who were intrusted with the prosecution, that they held out no hope whatever to any of the prisoners; but they told their counsel that whatever might be done would depend upon the judgment of the Lord Lieutenant. But it is said that these men knew that the same evidence which had been given against the three men who had been tried and convicted would be repeated against them. According to the case now put forward, these men knew that they were innocent, that they had not been near the spot of the murder in question, and that they had peaceably slept in their own homes. Will hon. Members endeavour to realize what this means? We have to deal with the fact that those who knew these men knew that they were not only innocent, but they had not been near the scene of the murder—that they had passed their hours elsewhere; that they had slept, it might be, in their own homes; or that they had been, during some period of the night, elsewhere, and that they had never been near the spot at all. Is it credible, I would ask any person of common sense, whether anyone, be he priest or anyone else, knowing this, could have said—"Tell your own tale of guilt, although it may lead you to the scaffold, or to the mitigated sentence of penal servitude for life?" Would none of these men have said at once—"I know where I was on that night, and there are others who know where I was too"—others who would be the witnesses of truth, who would be able to give that evidence which is known as an alibi; who would at once have been forthcoming, for some of these men, at least, would have had that evidence, which every honest man is likely to have at his command, of proving where he was? I admit it is said that in the case of Myles Joyce his only evidence was that of his own wife, and, unfortunately, a wife's evidence being excluded, a difficulty might have been experienced in proving an alibi. But there were five men with different alibis living under different roofs. Each case must have been upon a different footing to the rest; but was there one among them advised by priest or no priest, with wife or no wife, who attempted to establish his innocence? Not a single one. It must have been difficult for the Lord Lieutenant to believe that by some process or other five men had been induced to state falsely that they were guilty of murder, when, as a matter of fact, they had never been near the scene of the murder, and when it was in the power of every one of them to raise his voice and say—"I was elsewhere at the time." Is it conceivable that not one man among them to save his liberty, his life, or his character, had the courage to say—"I will stake my all on calling witnesses who can prove where I was." None of these men did that; and yet we are asked to come to the conclusion that five men consented to record a plea of "Guilty," and undertook to bear a sentence of penal servitude for life, and that they did so without one of them making an effort to establish his innocence.

three men were guilty, and they came to that conclusion mainly upon the evidence of three men who have been termed in this debate "independent witnesses." They came on to the table in open Court to give their testimony after every opportunity had been afforded of gauging their position towards the men whom they accused. Under the Prevention of Crime Act, every witness whose presence is deemed necessary is provided to the prisoners at the expense of the Crown. In this case, a solicitor of experience in criminal cases was allotted to the prisoners, and counsel, of whom I shall have to say a word by-and-bye, of their own selection, was allotted for their defence. Three months elapsed between the commission of the offence and the trial, and these three witnesses, who are now alleged in the pamphlet of the hon. Member for Westmeath to have been prejudiced witnesses, and to have had cause of anger and cause of hatred sufficient to have induced them to give false testimony, had been subjected to every test in reference to the truth of their story. If any hon. Member will take the trouble to read the shorthand writers' notes of the trial; if my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell), who, with the great powers of his advocacy, has dealt with certain facts, will do so, it will be found that the evidence of these witnesses was subjected to the test of a Judge and a jury, many of whom individually asked questions in order that they might arrive at a right conclusion as to the truth of the evidence, and, further, that the prisoners had the aid of counsel whose ability was most conspicuous. The case having passed through all that ordeal, the result was that three juries came to the same conclusion—namely, that the evidence established the guilt of these men. The Lord Lieutenant had this full admission, that the learned counsel intrusted by the solicitor of the prisoners with their defence, had shown great devotion to the case of their clients, had visited the spot, and had traversed every portion of the journey of that night between the 17th and 18th of August, and had tested by their own observation whether the statement of the three independent witnesses was probable or improbable. Yet these two counsel, whose qualifications were so great, in terms which I can read to the House if it be necessary to enter into detail, gave these witnesses the same credit the prosecuting counsel did of having been present, of having tracked the murderers, of having dogged their footsteps, and of having witnessed what took place. These able counsel could only present to the jury that the witnesses had been mistaken in their identification, and in the conclusion they had arrived at. The Lord Lieutenant, charged as he is by the majority of the Irish people with judicial murder, had these facts before him, and he had one additional fact, which I cannot conceive any just man in the House would hold to be insufficient to exculpate Earl Spencer from this grave charge. It is said now that the Lord Lieutenant knew, or ought to have known, that these men who confessed gave their evidence—for their plea is the strongest evidence—falsely. Where is the evidence against the Lord Lieutenant? The testimony of these three men was confirmed by that of the two approvers—that there were 10 men present at the murder—and on the day when the Lord Lieutenant had to determine whether these three men were witnesses on whom he could place reliance, nine out of the 10 accused men had, with their own lips, affirmed their guilt. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), with greater force than I can command, brought this subject before the House last night, although the House was not then constituted as it is now. I may, however, be allowed to add this one fact to what the right hon. and learned Gentleman then stated—namely, that when the Lord Lieutenant knew that nine out of the 10 men had confessed their guilt, when he knew that the counsel for the defence admitted that the three men who gave their testimony had been present at the scene of the murder, the fact must be taken into consideration that the only man about whom the Lord Lieutenant could now have any doubt was a relative of the three witnesses. How, then, could the Lord Lieutenant disbelieve the statement of these witnesses, confirmed as it was by a confession of guilt by nine out of the 10 men, and when it was only suggested that a mistake had been made as to a man whom these witnesses would know better than anyone else? There is one other general observation which I would like to make. It is said that the confessions of these men had been obtained by the improper action of the Crown officials, and I hope the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) will forgive me for saying I wondered when I heard his speech whether at the moment he was bearing in mind the great responsibility which fell on him in adding the great weight of his authority to the charges which were made against the administration of justice. The hon. and learned Member stated that much depended upon whether these men were or were not induced by the officials of the Crown to plead guilty, and the senior Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) has stated as a fact that the men had been visited in prison for the purpose.

I say distinctly, on the part of those who were intrusted with the prosecution, that they held out no hope whatever to any of the prisoners; but they told their counsel that whatever might be done would depend upon the judgment of the Lord Lieutenant. But it is said that these men knew that the same evidence which had been given against the three men who had been tried and convicted would be repeated against them. According to the case now put forward, these men knew that they were innocent, that they had not been near the spot of the murder in question, and that they had peaceably slept in their own homes. Will hon. Members endeavour to realize what this means? We have to deal with the fact that those who knew these men knew that they were not only innocent, but they had not been near the scene of the murder—that they had passed their hours elsewhere; that they had slept, it might be, in their own homes; or that they had been, during some period of the night, elsewhere, and that they had never been near the spot at all. Is it credible, I would ask any person of common sense, whether anyone, be he priest or anyone else, knowing this, could have said—"Tell your own tale of guilt, although it may lead you to the scaffold, or to the mitigated sentence of penal servitude for life?" Would none of these men have said at once—"I know where I was on that night, and there are others who know where I was too"—others who would be the witnesses of truth, who would be able to give that evidence which is known as an alibi; who would at once have been forthcoming, for some of these men, at least, would have had that evidence, which every honest man is likely to have at his command, of proving where he was? I admit it is said that in the case of Myles Joyce his only evidence was that of his own wife, and, unfortunately, a wife's evidence being excluded, a difficulty might have been experienced in proving an alibi. But there were five men with different alibis living under different roofs. Each case must have been upon a different footing to the rest; but was there one among them advised by priest or no priest, with wife or no wife, who attempted to establish his innocence? Not a single one. It must have been difficult for the Lord Lieutenant to believe that by some process or other five men had been induced to state falsely that they were guilty of murder, when, as a matter of fact, they had never been near the scene of the murder, and when it was in the power of every one of them to raise his voice and say—"I was elsewhere at the time." Is it conceivable that not one man among them to save his liberty, his life, or his character, had the courage to say—"I will stake my all on calling witnesses who can prove where I was." None of these men did that; and yet we are asked to come to the conclusion that five men consented to record a plea of "Guilty," and undertook to bear a sentence of penal servitude for life, and that they did so without one of them making an effort to establish his innocence.

Under these circumstances, I must appeal to the feeling that must actuate Irish Gentlemen, and ask them whether, if they had to bear the responsibility of administering justice, and if they had to bear the responsibility of so administering it as to save the peasantry of the country from being murdered in their homes, whether, with all this combination of circumstances—the evidence given before a just Judge, verdicts given by three separate juries, and nine out of the 10 prisoners admitting their guilt—is it possible to conceive that any man with all these facts before him could come to any other conclusion than Earl Spencer did—namely, that the verdict of the jury was correct, and that the pleas of guilty were true admissions of guilt? As to the conduct of the rev. gentleman who advised these men to plead guilty, I will not criticize it. I know how cruel it is to judge others whose manner of thought we may not be able to follow. As the Home Secretary said, let us give credit to him for having acted from the best motives; but I must say this—that if there ever was a person who did an act unintentionally, which sealed the fate of Myles Joyce, and made him suffer the extreme penalty of the law, it was the course pursued by this rev. gentleman. [Laughter from the Irish Members.] Let hon. Gentlemen laugh as they may; they cannot help reflecting upon what I say. I do not know what the motive of the rev. gentleman was. I give him full credit for acting as he thought for the best; but he caused these five persons to plead guilty, and that fact made them corroborative witnesses to the truth of the evidence against Myles Joyce, who had been previously convicted. In all this combination of circumstances, and knowing that the guidance likely to be given to men in this condition by their priest would be directed to obtaining the acquittal of innocent men, the Lord Lieutenant could not have supposed that any act on the part of the priest could have the effect of bringing an undue penalty of guilt upon innocent men. Under all the circumstances of the case, I cannot conceive the most liberal and humane man coming to any conclusion but that arrived at by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. Having dealt with these general subjects, and traversed the ground which others have traversed much more ably than I have, I will now, with the permission of the House, turn to other matters. I have been subjected to categorical appeals from many hon. Gentlemen opposite in the course of the debate. I have been asked what is the rule of conduct which ought to affect prosecuting counsel in criminal cases, and I have been asked whether I approve of all that has been done by the counsel who conducted this prosecution. I have also been warned in almost minatory language by the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) to be careful what I say, and I have been warned by the junior Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Deasy) that whatever view I express there are those in reserve who will answer them. With these appeals before me, my attention has been directed principally to the consideration of the conduct of counsel prosecuting in criminal cases. In much which has been stated in principle I entirely concur. The counsel who conducts the prosecution in a criminal case stands in a very different position from he who is conducting a civil suit. The counsel who conducts a criminal case has but one client, and that is the public interest. He represents the Crown, and when he represents the Crown he must take care that the fountain of justice is purely represented. He should never seek to win a verdict. These are general rules in which I am certain everyone will concur; but it is useless for me to state those general rules without applying them to the particular circumstances which have occurred in this case. As a deduction from the general rule, it is said that it is the duty of a counsel prosecuting in a criminal case to place in the possession of the advocate of the accused every fact which is in the possession of the counsel who prosecutes. I do not quite agree with that view stated so broadly as it is here stated; but I agree with the substance of it. I agree with the substance to the extent of saying that the counsel who is prosecuting ought to take care that all substantial facts in the opinion of the prosecuting counsel necessary to elicit the truth should in some way be called to the attention of the prisoner's advocate. The prosecuting counsel is bound to lay before the jury what, in his judgment, represents the case against the prisoner, and he is also bound to bring out those things which, in his judgment, will elicit the truth. But it is impossible, when you are laying down a rule to affect the action of an advocate, or speaking of one who is absent and is not able to speak for himself—it is impossible to speak too guardedly when we are applying our judgment to the conduct of such a man. I must confess that if, in this case, I thought there had been conduct which had not been guided by such rules in substance, I believe I should have the courage to say so. But, Sir, admitting as I do the difference between the advocate who represents the Crown, and the position of the advocate who represents the civil suitor, I once more depart from the general statement of opinion I have given to apply that more general view to the particular incidents which occurred in this case, and I think when I have so done I shall have mainly discharged the duty I owe to the House. The charge which is made of the improper conduct of the evidence in this case is, if I understand it rightly, applied to a statement of facts relating to the two statements made by the lads, Michael Joyce and Patrick Joyce, and it is stated that it was the duty of the Crown counsel to have placed in the possession of the counsel for the prisoners the two statements made by those boys. Now, let me at once say on whom I think the responsibility, for good or for evil, in this matter rested. Charges have been made over and over again against Mr. Bolton and against the other Crown officials. I know nothing of Mr. Bolton except what I have read. I have nothing to say of Mr. Bolton, or his conduct in any circumstances in his general relation towards the Irish Executive; but let no man bear a burden he ought not to bear. This is not a question in which the responsibility falls on Mr. Bolton or on any solicitor. The responsibility must fall on the counsel. I know, and the experience of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) will tell him, that it is not the custom for solicitors at an early stage to make any such communication without the sanction of counsel, and if, later on in the trial, it appears that such information ought to have been communicated, the responsibility for withholding it must fall on the counsel. I hope, therefore, that hon. Members, in considering what is right or wrong in this matter, will regard it as a matter affecting the conduct of the Bar, and not the conduct of the Crown officials. It is a matter worthy of consideration that, from the first to the last in this trial, great moderation was exercised by the counsel for the Crown, and I might read an eloquent tribute to that fact which was paid in the course of the trial by the counsel for the prisoners. Therefore, from first to last, the whole charge of what is said to have been an undue exercise of responsibility in the conduct of the case on the part of the Crown is simplified and reduced to this one fact—the treatment of those depositions. I have said that, to my mind, what was material to elicit the truth, if unknown to the prisoners' advocate, should be communicated to him in substance. But my view is that it was so communicated in this case, and I think I shall be able to convince the House that it was. The matter affects the statement of the two boys—one Michael Joyce and the other Patrick Joyce. I think that some misapprehension prevails in the minds of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) and the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) in reference to the statement of Michael Joyce. On the 28th of August, Michael Joyce made what was apparently a dying deposition; but, as my hon. and learned Friends know, a deposition is a statement made on oath in the presence of the accused. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell), in the eloquent speech he has just delivered, appeared to be under the impression that the statement of Michael Joyce was made on oath.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL: I do not recollect that I said it was taken on oath; but to my mind that was not at all essential.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I have no doubt my hon. and learned Friend said what was in his mind; but, at any rate, it was so stated by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke).

MR. EDWARD CLARKE: No; I did not say so.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): My hon. and learned Friend has been so reported. I do not, however, care who stated it. The fact is, that on the morning of the 28th of August, at 9 o'clock, Collins went to the cottage where the murder had been committed, and at about 10 o'clock Constable Johnson arrived there. At 3 o'clock on that day Michael Joyce was dead. It is, therefore, apparent that all these statements of this boy were made between 10 o'clock and 3 o'clock. He made a statement to Constable Johnson, from which, with the permission of the House, I will read a few words, and I propose to go later on to the statement afterwards made to Mr. Brady; but there is no more legal effect in the statement made to Mr. Brady, and put in writing, than in the statement made to Constable Johnson. Do not let us quibble about words—whether they were declarations or depositions—they were statements—statements made, no doubt, in the belief that Michael Joyce was dying. I assume all that, and any statement made by a person in the belief that he is dying is evidence, no doubt—a dying declaration or a statement relating to the case.

MR. HARRINGTON: In one case the statement was in writing, and in the other it was only verbal.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): The statement was made verbally to Constable Johnson at 10 o'clock in the morning, and later on it was taken down in writing by Mr. Brady; but the legal effect of both is the same. Now, let me read to the House what it was the boy stated, both to Mr. Brady and Constable Johnson—

"We then saw Pat Joyce and Michael Joyce. They were in bed. We spoke to them. We asked them what happened then. Michael Joyce then told us that he saw three men in the house. We then asked Michael Joyce if he knew the men. He said he did not know them, as they had their faces dirty. I did not speak to Pat Joyce."

This is the evidence of Constable Johnson—

"I asked Michael Joyce how many men did he see, and if he knew them. He said 'No; that their faces were black, and that there were three or four men.' I then asked Pat Joyce what happened to him last night, but got no reply. I then asked him did he know them, and he said 'No; that their faces were black.'"

The only statement that he made to Mr. Brady, who took it down in writing, in relation to this point, was—

"Two or three men came in; they had blacked their faces."

Not one word more was stated to Mr. Brady, and it was the identical statement which had been made to Collins and Constable Johnson—in the one case that the men's faces were dirty, and in the other that he did not know them because their faces were black. I admit that you have the statement made to Mr. Brady in writing; but Johnson and Collins went before the Coroner, by whom their statement was put into writing, and they signed their depositions. Those depositions contained what I have above read. Consequently, the statement of Johnson and Collins, identical as it is with that taken down by Mr. Brady as to what the boy said, was in writing before the Coroner, and was signed both by Johnson and Collins, and one day in the month of September the prisoners' attorney obtained those depositions of Johnson and Collins before the Coroner from the Crown Office. They were obtained from the Crown Office for the special purpose of being placed in the hands of the prisoners' counsel, and the prisoners' counsel, with the full knowledge of the Attorney General for Ireland and the prosecuting counsel, had the statements of Collins and Johnson signed by them in their possession. They, therefore, knew that these two witnesses had heard, as Mr. Brady had heard, from the boy exactly the same statement. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) says there were depositions which were never put in. There were no such depositions.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE: I never said there were depositions which could have been put in evidence.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): My hon. and learned Friend has been so reported.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE: Where have I been so reported?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): My hon. and learned Friend denies the statement. I, of course, accept his denial; and I am glad to find that my hon. and learned Friend did not make that point. I have pointed out that the statement made to Johnson and Collins was exactly the same statement as that afterwards taken down in writing by Mr. Brady, and that that statement to Johnson and Collins was given before the Coroner, who put down in writing what it was the boy had said.

AN HON. MEMBER: White jackets.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): An hon. Member says "white jackets." This boy never said anything about white jackets. I am going to point out that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) distinctly spoke of the term "white jackets" being mentioned in the depositions.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE: I can assure my hon. and learned Friend that I did not do so. What I said was that only the younger boy mentioned the "bawneens."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): This boy I am speaking about is the dead boy, who never mentioned the "bawneens." He was altogether silent upon that. He simply said they were men with their faces black. The Attorney General for Ireland called both Johnson and Collins into the witness-box, so as to give the counsel for the prisoners, who had knowledge that they had heard this boy's evidence, an opportunity of putting questions to them. Not only did the Attorney General for Ireland put both of those men into the witness-box, but I can, if necessary, give from a shorthand writer's notes the exact questions he put to each of them, and their answers. He put these questions—

"Did you see young Michael Joyce? Did you speak to Michael Joyce? Did Michael Joyce make a statement to you?"

So he led up to this very point, apparently purposely, and he gave every opportunity to the counsel for the prisoners to ask what that statement was; and the counsel for the prisoners, being so invited by the prosecuting counsel to ask what the statement was, and knowing what the statement was, for he had a copy of the evidence signed by Collins and Johnson at the inquest in his possession, nevertheless thought it right not to ask that question.

MR. HARRINGTON: The Judge stopped him.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): If I am asked why the prisoners' counsel did not put the question, the answer is clear and distinct—this poor boy had sustained severe injuries, and his statement was made only a short time before his death. He had already passed that stage which might have enabled him to give an intelligible story. He was lightheaded at the time, and when he made his statement to Mr. Brady there was no doubt that he was wandering and incoherent, if not raving. He said—

The Attorney General

"I was at Mass yesterday at Finney. John O'Brien told me not to tell, and Michael Malley. It was last night when they told me not to tell. They swore me on the Book not to tell. It is John O'Brien of the Wood; I am sure of it."

Some comment has been made upon the fact that Mr. Brady would not have taken the deposition of a witness who was raving. Now, it was Mr. Brady's duty not to take a deposition which he could not produce in Court, but to take any statement; and that is what he did. There is no proof whatever in the statement that the boy went to Mass on the day before, and the fact that it was untrue was known to the Attorney General for Ireland.

MR. HARRINGTON: Who says it was not true? His priest does not say so.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): An inquiry was made, and it was found that there had been no Mass at all.

MR. HARRINGTON: May I remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that the statement marked on the brief, intimating that that statement was not true, was put in by the same gentleman, George Bolton, whose conduct we object to.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I have good authority for stating that the boy was found not to have been at Mass. The boy further said—

"John O'Brien told me not to tell, and Michael Malley. They swore me on a book not to tell."

Now, John O'Brien was never near the place; Michael Malley was never near the place; and all this was entirely imaginative. Therefore, we have the fact that these incoherent statements were tested and found not to be true; and yet it is contended that the statements themselves ought to have been put in evidence. But the matter does not rest there; there is other important evidence on this point. The surgeon who arrived on the scene early on the morning of the 18th examined the boy. He was called before the jury with a view of showing how far the statement of the boy could be relied upon, and what did he say? He said—

"He appeared to me at some moments to be rational, but taking it all in all I think he was irrational. He appeared to have lucid moments, but on the whole he appeared to be wandering."

Three statements out of the four made by the boy proved to be untrue; he gave the names of persons who had never been present at all, and his statements were so unreliable that the medical man said he was wandering and irrational, and only seemed to have lucid intervals. And that was the document which it is said was to be put in evidence, for good or for evil, to convict or acquit men charged with murder. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) talked about depositions that ought to be put in in evidence.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE: Will my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General allow me for the second time to deny having stated that these depositions ought to have been put in in evidence?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): I am sorry if I misunderstood my hon. and learned Friend. Would anybody have thought that this was the document charged to be held back, and upon which so much reliance has been placed by hon. Members opposite? I ask, in justice to my right hon. and learned Friend the late Attorney General for Ireland, who was conducting the case, whether he was not entitled to arrive at the conclusion that the evidence was altogether worthless? After hearing the medical testimony, no doubt the Judge intervened and said—"Why, the boy was wandering and raving." Under such circumstances, is it fair that counsel should have imputations cast upon them for withholding this evidence, or that my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland should be laughed at for having said the boy was raving? There is one other matter I ought to deal with, and that is the facts affecting the other statement—namely, that of Patrick Joyce. The statement of Patrick Joyce was, up to a certain point, identically the same as that made to Collins and Johnson by Michael Joyce. He had told Johnson that he did not know the men, but that their faces were black, and there is a slight difference in this witness's statement, which was referred to by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), because in the statement Patrick Joyce made to Mr. Brady, which was taken down in writing, he stated—"I think they had no coats, but bawneens." I have endeavoured to discover on what ground the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. O. Russell) had for the strange charge he made against the Attorney General for Ireland of conduct no English barrister would have been guilty of, and which only an Irish barrister would have resorted to. The charge is now narrowed down to this one fact—that in this statement of Patrick Joyce to Mr. Brady this statement is made—"I think they had no coats, but bawneens." That was added to the statement that they had also blackened faces. It has been said that the boy ought to have been taught the nature of an oath. It must be remembered that this poor boy had been recovering slowly from his wounds during the autumn months, and if there had been any teaching of that boy for any purpose—if he had been educated in order to enable him to understand the nature of an oath, or for any other purpose, I fancy that we should have heard some strong statements made about it before this. Knowing that the counsel for the prisoners were aware that the boy could repeat what he had stated to Johnson and Collins—evidence of which had been given by those men and signed by them and was in the possession of the prisoners' counsel—the counsel for the Crown put that boy upon the table, affording every opportunity for converting him into a credible witness. With these facts before him, I must confess that I listened with regret to the speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke). I needed no warning from him. I know that I have received from my Predecessors a great inheritance—a legacy which represents the duty of conducting criminal prosecutions with humanity, and of aiding in the pure administration of justice. I will say nothing of what has occurred during the last four years; but I will say this—that, appealed to, as I have been, bearing in mind the rules I have laid down as to the duties of counsel, I really cannot believe in my conscience—and I am not induced to say so from any feeling that I am supporting the action of a Colleague—I cannot bring myself to think that my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland acted in any way unworthy of the high character enjoyed by the members of the Irish Bar. I may go further and say that, while it is difficult indeed for one man to place himself in the position of another, and to invest himself with all the minute incidents of the trial, to weigh in his mind what would be effective in their results, and what was material for the jury to know—while I hesitate to judge for one moment of the conduct of another, I cannot bring myself to say that in this instance I should have acted otherwise than the Attorney General for Ireland acted. I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House will not think that I have spoken hastily. I have not done so. I have spoken with a sense of responsibility, after having carefully read the shorthand writer's notes of the trial, and have gone carefully through them, with a desire to come to a right conclusion as to what answer I should give to the appeal which has been made to me. There is one other testimony I must bear during the course of this discussion. Many names have been mentioned, and many persons have been accused, from Earl Spencer himself down to the Police Magistrate, the Crown counsel, and the Crown officials. To-night two other names have been added to the indictment. No doubt, as the Prime Minister has pointed out, much of the responsibility in this case rested upon the counsel for the prisoners. A reply had to be made to that argument, so it was left for the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), bringing his judgment to bear upon these facts, to declare, in language by no means doubtful, but clear and definite, that the counsel for the prisoners were grossly incompetent to conduct the trial. It must be remembered that these gentlemen were not counsel selected by the Crown. The view taken by the Government and by the House was that it would be a mitigation of the power of the Prevention of Crime Act, which placed prisoners in such an exceptional position, if witnesses, solicitors, and counsel were found for them at the expense of the Crown. But they do not select the counsel. On the contrary, the prisoners' solicitor, Mr. Concannon, selected the two men whom he believed to be the best for the purpose he could find in the Irish Bar. Is it suggested that the selective power of the solicitor was deficient? Well, it is not only on the bare and prima facie fact that the solicitor found the prisoners' counsel that I would put the case; but let any man take the record of the trial in his hand, and let him read the defence—the searching cross-examination of the witnesses, and the eloquent appeal to the jury; let him read that trial from beginning to end, and he will soon see whether there is one word of truth in the assertion that these gentlemen misconducted the trial. On the contrary, it will at once be said that the efforts of the prisoners' counsel were worthy of the high reputation which the Irish Bar enjoys. I very much regret that it has been thought necessary to make such a charge, and I am satisfied that those who read the cross-examination of the witnesses, and the speeches delivered by the prisoners' counsel at the trial will at once say that in their opinion there is no trace to be found in the conduct of the trial of the action of incompetent men. I will go further, and I will say that the case appears to have been conducted in a manner that reflected great credit upon the administration of justice. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has defended the action of the Executive in the matter, and my right hon. Friend is able to speak from great experience. Let me further remind hon. Members that no suggestion even now is made that the trial was an unfair one. Then, what has occurred since that such a demand for inquiry is made? My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) says that it would quiet the public mind in Ireland. If that is to be the principle upon which an inquiry is to be conceded into every case of a criminal trial, I can only say that it would greatly disturb public opinion in relation to the administration of justice, instead of tending to quiet it. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) said that they could put aside all that has happened since the trial, and yet still be entitled to the inquiry now demanded. The hon. Member said that he need not rely on the subsequent statement of Casey published in the pamphlet of the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington), and all that has been brought to light since. The hon. Member said that, putting aside all that, Earl Spencer might fairly concede an inquiry into the circumstances of the case as they were laid before the Court. But what does that represent but a new trial, and a new trial against the judgment of three verdicts given by three different juries? What is to be the nature of the inquiry? Is it to be an irresponsible examination of the evidence? Any tribunal that could be selected must be one with very great responsibility as to its methods and as to its results. Is it proposed to examine the five men who are now, in consequence of their own confession of guilt, suffering penal servitude? Do I understand that that is what is asked for? [Mr. HARRINGTON: Yea.] Will the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), if he is in the House, give me his attention for one moment? I would ask him whether, in the interests of Ireland, he considers that would be a right course to take?—because I must remind the hon. Member that he strenuously resisted a Bill the object of which was to enable men upon their trial to establish their innocence upon their own statement. We thought that, under proper conditions, the Judge who tried a criminal case might be allowed to administer an oath to a prisoner upon his trial; but that Bill met with great resistance from hon. Members from Ireland, and the view entertained by the hon. Member for Monaghan was that such testimony could not be trusted, and that it would be detrimental to the interests of justice, especially in Ireland. In that way the sincere effort, which was made to prevent an innocent man from being convicted, was frustrated. Yet the very men who frustrated it, and who said that a prisoner should not be allowed to give evidence on his own trial, who would not allow those nearest to him to give evidence, or permit him any examination and cross-examination, or to tell his own story, are now urging that men who have been convicted upon their own admission of guilt, who cannot be cross-examined, against whom there would be no consequences if they failed to tell the truth, should be invited to make statements in their own behalf, which are in effect to upset the deliberate and solemn verdict of an impartial jury as well as to discredit their own pleas. I owe much to the indulgence of the House in listening to the very inefficient statement I have made. [Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Irish Members.] Notwithstanding that rebuke, I will say that I have made that statement from no desire to screen facts or men who ought not to be screened. I felt that those who were intrusted with the protection of life and property, which can be protected alone by the due administration of justice, would be acting unworthily and disloyally if they allowed the administration of justice to be shaken by granting this inquiry, and allowing a trial already adjudicated upon to be superseded by a mere popular demand for a fresh investigation. I therefore trust that the House will not listen to the insidious advice of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), who tells the Government that they will incur the loss of the Irish vote by refusing to agree to the Amendment. I believe it would be far better to lose that vote than for us to allow political considerations to interfere with the due administration of justice.

THE O'GORMAN MAHON said, that he was by no means insensible to the disadvantages under which he laboured at that hour of the night, especially after the address they had heard from the eloquent Gentleman who had preceded him—a learned Gentleman connected with the law, of which he professed to have very little knowledge—but, above all, after having heard the address of the Prime Minister, from whose mind he wished at once to dis sever the idea that there was any intention on his part, in the few observations he proposed to submit to the House—and they should be very few, in order that he might obtain something like a patient hearing—the idea that he felt in the slightest degree anything like prejudice against the noble Earl who filled the high Office of Viceroy of Ireland. The very reverse was the case. In fact, when first Earl Spencer went over to Ireland, a ray of hope—which, unfortunately, had vanished since—glanced across his mind; for he had a distinct recollection of the father of the noble Earl, and from his father's son he had anticipated that something like good would result to Ireland. He remembered that, 54 years ago, the father of Earl Spencer, as a Minister of the Crown, stated in his place in Parliament that if the Irish Party at that period were capable of demonstrating to him, as Minister of the Crown, that the great majority of the Irish people were desirous of dissolving the infamous Union which had been forced upon them, in direct opposition to the will of the people, and by bribery and corruption of the worst type, he would consider it his duty to make a favourable representation of their case to his King. Such a statement, emanating from a man filling so important a position, necessarily prepossessed him (The O'Gorman Mahon) in favour of the son; and he rejoiced when Earl Spencer arrived in Ireland, being convinced that at last something like justice would be accorded to the Irish people. Therefore, he begged Earl Spencer, and those immediately connected with him, to be satisfied that there was nothing like prejudice in his mind excited against the noble Earl, but that, on the contrary, there was a strong prepossession in his favour. Necessarily, at that late hour of the night, he was obliged to be precise in his observations; and he would only mention one or two circumstances, the first of which bore a species of analogy to the case now under consideration. It related to a man in his county, who was condemned to an ignominious death after the most suspicious evidence had been recorded against him. The statements were very interesting. An unfortunate man was shot in the head, some pellets of lead had penetrated his skull; and while he lay on the ground, gasping for life, the clergyman of the parish—his own clergyman—found himself unable to administer the Sacrament to him. Now, this Last Sacrament was one of the most sacred rites connected with the Roman Catholic Church; and in this case the priest declined to administer it, because of the man's utter incapacity to comprehend what was taking place. The clergyman, who was ever desirous to strain a point in favour of a dying penitent, found him quite unfit to receive the Sacrament; but, nevertheless, after the clergyman had refused to administer it, in his sight and his presence a stipendiary magistrate, or some such animal as that, stepped forward. ["Oh!"] If he had made use of an unfortunate phrase he regretted it. Stipendiary magistrates in Ireland were an invention which he believed English Members knew very little about; but they were a class whose very existence depended on the detection of what they conceived to be crime, and their efforts were invariably directed towards the obtaining of a conviction, whether the person accused was innocent or guilty.

The O'Gorman Mahon.

He asked the House to listen to the sequel. In the presence of that clergyman so restrained—he would not use an offensive word again, and when he did make use of the term, "animal" he had merely meant it in a kindly sense—but this person insisted upon extracting information from the dying man. Stooping down, he put his ear to his mouth, and said—"Was it Francis Hynes who shot you?" And the unfortunate man repeated the words "Francis Hynes." To a question of who made the sun, moon, and stars, he would, doubtless, have given a similar answer. Upon that kind of evidence the accused was hanged. He saw that the Secretary of State listened with astonishment to such a statement; but these facts were duly brought before the Lord Lieutenant. The Members for the county, the clergy of the county—clergymen of all persuasions—Grand Jurors, magistrates, Deputy Lieutenants, and many others, signed a Memorial, which was presented to His Excellency, and after considerable consideration and delay the prayer of that Memorial was refused, and the man was hanged—hanged notwithstanding the conviction of thousands of persons in the county in which the crime was committed, and millions of Irishmen generally, who believed Francis Hynes to be perfectly innocent. It might be asked, what had this to do with the present case? It had this analogy in connection with it—it proved the existence of a deep-rooted objection and reluctance on the part of the Viceroy to hear anything like a remonstrance from anybody except the paid officers of the Crown. Notwithstanding the Memorial of the clergy, the gentry, and the people generally, Francis Hynes was executed; and up to this moment he was believed by the united voice of Ireland to have been innocently executed. How many Irishmen believed that Myles Joyce, who was executed the other day, was also innocent? How many believed that the four or five men now suffering the penalty of penal servitude were innocent? He might here mention that he was indebted to his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) for information to the effect that a distinct alibi could have been established for those poor men, but that the evidence of their wives would not be permitted, and their children were too young to afford any. There were millions of Irishmen who, having investigated the case dispassionately, and examined it in every particular, believed in the innocence of Myles Joyce; and, far from attempting or wishing to go into anything like a fresh recital of the circumstances of the case, which had been canvassed by so many legal Gentlemen, he would only say that there was no intention on the part of the Irish Party to offer any insult to the Lord Lieutenant. All that they asked for was a simple investigation, but not a mock investigation. When they spoke of investigation, they meant a fair, an open, and a public one—such a one as Englishmen would require for their own countrymen if Englishmen happened to be similarly circumstanced; and any Minister of the Crown who attempted to refuse an investigation would have shame cried upon him. The honour of a House which they all respected seemed to him to be implicated in the matter. It was alleged, and capable of proof, that a member of the house of Cavendish, holding a high position in Her Majesty's Government, had pledged his word that, under certain circumstances, an investigation into the case should be granted. All who had taken the trouble to read Irish history were fully aware that English faith had often been broken by English Ministers; but he had yet to learn that the house of Cavendish was so lost and degraded as to condescend to resort to the measures of the trader, who would substitute a miserable partial inquiry for the one which the public demanded, and for which he had pledged his word. He believed the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) was absent at that moment; but he would put it to the noble Marquess, and he would put it to his Colleagues, whether it was fitting or proper to expose an English gentleman to the imputation of having trifled with the House of Commons, of having trifled with his own good faith, and of having trifled with the people of Ireland, by holding out the hope of a free, a fair, and a just investigation, and now turning round and saying that one had been given, because there had been something like an inquiry by persons who were themselves implicated in the matter? That he trusted was not what the noble house of Cavendish would ever lend itself to; and, until he received better proof than now existed, he would not believe that that was the course which Her Majesty's Government proposed to adopt.

MR. CALLAN said, that to-morrow the speech of the Attorney General would be read, and it would be universally felt that it was one of the ablest speeches he had ever made since the memorable occasion on which he first made his mark in that House when he delivered an address upon Judge Keogh. The present speech was even still more remarkable than that in which the hon. and learned Gentleman defended Judge Keogh. He had been engaged in a similar task of defending a learned Judge, but a Judge whose conduct was not impugned, and who did not require any eulogy at the hands of the hon. and learned Gentleman; but not one word had been uttered by the hon. and learned Gentleman to defend or explain the conduct of His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant. It was as difficult to ask the House to listen calmly to argument after the impassioned speech of the Attorney General, as it was for a jury to calmly try Myles Joyce after the declaration made by the Judge in sentencing the prisoner who had just previously been convicted. What were the facts which had been laid before the House? A fearful murder—indeed a massacre—was committed in the month of August, 1882, in a remote part of the county of Galway. It was well known that a thrill of horror pervaded the country on the announcement of the fact. He had been present in Dublin during the trial, and he had mixed with the jurors who tried the case; and he was able to say that no stronger feeling was excited anywhere than among the jurors of that City. No one had impugned the verdict, and not a word had been said against its impartiality. It was not until the execution had taken place, on the 15th of December, that any doubt appeared to be entertained in regard to the case. No effort had been made by anybody to secure a commutation of the sentence; there was no effort of that kind by any gentleman in the City of Dublin; but when it was announced that two of the prisoners on the day but one before, and on the day before the execution, had made what were called

"dying declarations," intense feeling, no doubt, was invoked as to what were the grounds upon which those declarations had been made. The interest, however, died away until last summer, when the Crown informers made their confessions, and the case was brought before the House of Commons. Then, again, the subject of the suppressed declarations was mooted. He would ask what were the circumstances under which the matter was brought before the House? On the 11th of August his hon. Friend—he thought the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton)—brought the case forward. He would not discuss the circumstances under which the conditional promise of an inquiry was made on the part of the Government; but the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien), who was not generally accused of being a very moderate or an extremely timid Member, and himself (Mr. Callan) both recommended the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) to be content with the satisfactory pledge then given by the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War. In compliance with the wish then expressed by the noble Marquess for information, one of the highest and most respected dignitaries of the Catholic Church of Ireland wrote a letter to the Lord Lieutenant, which he regretted had not been included in the pamphlet published by the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington). He presumed it had not been so included by accident. What was it that His Grace the Archbishop of Tuam wrote? Now, the Archbishop of Tuam was not an extreme politician—if, indeed, he was a politician at all. He had never given any assistance to the National movement in Ireland, and but for the honesty of his character, and his well-known fearlessness and independence of judgment, he would have been reckoned what was called a Whig official; but the honesty of his character and his independence had saved His Grace from that obloquy. What did the Archbishop of Tuam say in his letter of the 13th of August, from Ballinrobe to the Lord Lieutenant? After recapitulating the circumstances that had arisen, Dr. McEvilly went on to say—

"Taking all the circumstances into account, my own conviction is that this latter statement of the wretched man is truthful and sincere—that is, that as an evidence of his sincerity he declared that he was ready, in the interests of justice, to suffer any pain, even death itself, if necessary, on account of having been instrumental in taking away the life of an innocent man. And I may add that since then I am reliably informed that this statement has been fully corroborated by another man named Philbin—one of the leading approvers in the case—and who is, I am informed, prepared to make a similar public declaration. In conclusion, I would ask Your Excellency, in order to allay public feeling, so much excited in this neighbourhood, to direct a sworn inquiry into the case."

That letter was addressed to the Lord Lieutenant by the Archbishop of Tuam, and on the 28th of August the Archbishop addressed a further letter to the Lord Lieutenant, pressing for an inquiry, and giving his reasons for pressing it. His Grace said—

"I have the honour to acknowledge Your Excellency's letter with accompanying Memorandum of the 24th instant. Notwithstanding the statements and the arguments so ably and so powerfully put forward in the Memorandum, I still feel that nothing short of a public inquiry can satisfy a discerning and expectant public, for they feel that the circumstances of the case are very much altered since the trial; and they, therefore, naturally expect that the Government would take advantage of those circumstances to arrive at an exact knowledge of the actual condition of things. The absence of any conceivably adequate motive on the latter occasion, while he had obviously the most powerful motive on the former—namely, the saving of his own neck from the halter, deeply impressed all who were present as to the truthful sincerity of his statement. Add to this, apart from the strong universal feeling then, as well as now, prevailing throughout Joyce's country respecting Myles Joyce's innocence, the dying declaration of the two men executed with him as to his innocence, as reported in the public Press at the time, it is hardly conceivable how, in the very jaws of death, they would allow themselves to be launched into eternity with a lie on their lips, or an equivocation amounting to a lie, for there are very few—far fewer than seems to be supposed—who are ignorant of this obvious point of Christian morality—namely, that the abettor of, and participator in, murder, are morally just as guilty as the man who strikes the blow or fires the fatal bullet. The exceptional nature of the case as it now stands, with all its circumstances, would seem to call for exceptional consideration on the part of the Government by instituting a public inquiry. As regards the official incriminated, towards whom I can have no feeling one way or the other, being neither advocate nor accuser in the case, but simply laying before Your Excellency the statements publicly made to me, and my impressions, not lightly entertained—one could not help thinking that at the inquiry referred to in the Memorandum, he (the solicitor, Bolton) was witness in his own case; and it might seem more satisfactory, if not necessary in order to satisfy reasonable public expectations if, at a public inquiry, where there could be an opportunity afforded of questioning all parties connected with the prison, it was fully proved that he had not seen Casey on any other occasions than those referred to in the Memorandum."

To that moderate letter an insolent reply was sent. The first letter in reply to the Archbishop, and sent from Dublin Castle, contained nine paragraphs, in which 10 times over the Archbishop was spoken of as "Your Grace." It might have been thought that the Assistant Under Secretary must have been animated at the time by a spirit of flunkeyism when that letter was addressed to "His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. McEvilly, Archbishop of Tuam." But when the Archbishop would not accept the Lord Lieutenant's Memorandum as conclusive, and it became necessary to write to him again, he was curtly addressed as "you," and his territorial title was thrown on one side, the letter being simply directed to "Archbishop McEvilly." He (Mr. Callan) had now to refer to another matter—namely, the speech of the Attorney General. The hon. and learned Gentleman had made no reference whatever to the charge against Mr. Bolton of visiting the prisoners in gaol. It had not been denied by the Solicitor General for Ireland, by the Attorney General for England, by the Home Secretary, or by the Prime Minister; but not one single word of explanation had been given, notwithstanding that no one ventured to deny the visits of Bolton to the prisoners while they were in confinement. He would not refer to those visits in any other language than that of Judge Barry at the Belfast Assizes, when that learned Judge held that if Mr. Bolton had been in the habit of gliding from cell to cell, he had acted far in excess of his duty, and had been doing that which was not only beneath the position he occupied, but most censurable. Fair play ought to characterize all criminal prosecutions in a free country. Earl Spencer had referred to the Home Secretary as to what should guide him in this matter; but had he referred to Mr. Justice Barry as in the Kilmartin case he had referred to Judge Lawson? Why had he not followed the precedent he had established himself in the Kilmartin case? In the Kilmartin case Earl Spencer well knew that he had a Judge who would back him up in anything; but that in Judge Barry he had a Judge who would carefully weigh all the circumstances which had arisen, and give his conscientious advice upon them. Then, why did not the noble Earl consult Judge Barry when the dying declarations first came before him? The impression existed in Ireland that something in the nature of a judicial murder had been perpetrated, and that the dying declarations, which conclusively established the innocence of Myles Joyce, had been carefully suppressed. He believed that if the declarations of the two men on the eve of execution were published, it would be found they confirmed the innocence of Myles Joyce, and that they contained the admission of their own guilt. They would, therefore, have the effect of relieving the memory of Myles Joyce from the stigma of guilt, and also the character of the men now in prison. Moreover, the declarations would, he believed, be found to agree with the statement of the informer with whom these men had no possible means of communication; and, further, that they would name Casey amongst the murderers. He did not attach so much importance as was attached by some hon. Members to the depositions of the boys which were suppressed. With regard to the boy of nine years of age who survived, and who had been for months in the custody of the Government, he thought it would have been much better had the Government, through some Christian Brother, Catholic priest, or other religious person, instructed him in the rudiments of the Catechism, so that he might have known the penalty that would accrue to the perjurer, rather than have confided him to the tender mercies of Mr. George Bolton. With reference to Patrick Casey, he had made a remark, in the course of the Prime Minister's speech that day, with regard to which he wished to remark that it had been misapprehended, inasmuch as he had made it in answer to what he believed at the time to have been a question asked by the right hon. Gentleman. He wished to make this observation, because the reply he gave at the time had the effect of bringing down upon him the wrath of almost the entire House. Finally, he would ask whether the Government would afford pecuniary aid, as they had done in the case of Mr. Bolton and French, when they thought to immolate the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien)—would they afford material assistance to Casey against the hon. Member for Mallow, who had charged Casey with murder? Would the Attorney General give his fiat to a criminal prosecution against that hon. Member, who, he undertook to say, would prove the charge he had made? If that were done, Irish Members would be able to get the depositions out of the desk of Earl Spencer. Before resuming his seat, he would say that the elevation of Sir Samuel Anderson would be regarded by the Irish public as an endorsement by Earl Spencer of the system of jury packing which for years had been going on in Ireland.

MR. HARRINGTON: Sir, before the House proceeds to divide on the Amendment—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not entitled to reply, but will doubtless be permitted, by the indulgence of the House, to make an explanation.

MR. HARRINGTON said, he rose to make a correction which he believed would be acceptable to the Attorney General. The hon. and learned Gentleman had stated that John O'Brien was never near the place in question; but he would find, on reference to the statement of Johnson, that that was incorrect. He thought the Prime Minister was entitled to apologies from hon. Members on those Benches for the interruptions that came from them during his speech, which, on his own part, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman to accept.

Question put.

QUESTIONS.

AFRICA (SOUTH)—BECHUANALAND.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he can state to the House the contents of telegrams sent by the Transvaal Government to the High Commissioner, or to Her Majesty's Government, on September 16th and 19th, 1884; and whether Her Majesty's Government telegraphed any reply; and, if so, on what date and to what effect? In putting the Question, the right hon. Gentleman said—I wish to say a few words in explanation of this Question. On the 10th of October a telegram from South Africa appeared, I think, in The Times newspaper, purporting to give the text of a message sent by Mr. Krüger to Lord Derby in these words—"No reply received to urgent telegrams of September 16 and 19, sent in the interest of humanity," and then referring to the reasons which had induced President Krüger to issue his Proclamation of annexation of Bechuanaland. These are the two telegrams to which my Question relates.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: I am very happy to give the right hon. Gentleman an abstract of the telegrams to which his Question refers. On the 6th of September we received at the Colonial Office a telegram from the State Secretary of the South African Republic, in which he said that their Commander, Joubert, had brought about peace on the Western Border, and that all parties had laid down their arms on the Transvaal Government taking them under their protection and jurisdiction. He said—

"If Her Majesty's responsibility be handed over to us, effective measures will promptly be taken to restore and maintain permanent peace, subject to Her Majesty's approval, and the rights of all Native Chiefs being respected. Matter urgent."

On the 8th of September the Secretary of State sent the contents of that telegram to Sir Hercules Robinson, and begged him to make his observations, in reply, by telegram. This was the first information we had of the action of the Transvaal Government on that Border. Sir Hercules Robinson telegraphed back on the 9th of September, saying he was still without information from Mr. Rhodes as to his negotiations with Commander Joubert and Commander Nicholas Gey, and also as to the results of the meeting of Stellalanders which was to have taken place on the 5th, and he said—"As soon as I have ascertained the position in Bechuanaland I will telegraph my observation." On the 12th we had a long telegram from Sir Hercules Robinson, in which he gave an account of the state of affairs there from what he had gathered from Mr. Rhodes's Report, and concluded by saying—

"Mr. Rhodes is now on his way to Cape Town to place the whole position before me. He will arrive on Sunday. Meanwhile, I would suggest that your answer to the Pretoria telegram should be delayed."

That was on the 12th. On the 17th of September the State Secretary of the South African Republic telegraphed to the Colonial Office—"Being implored by Montsioa, the Government have taken him under their protection." We then telegraphed on the 21st to Sir Hercules Robinson, saying—

"Having carefully considered his communications on this subject, Her Majesty's Government considered it desirable that they should have a clear expression of the Cape Minister's recommendation, and should understand, before coming to a decision in the matter, as to the extent of co-operation to be given to the Colony on account of the trade route and otherwise if active measures are taken."

Then Sir Hercules Robinson sent on the 24th of September a reply to that, conveying the opinions and the Minutes of the Cape Ministry. On the 7th of October the Cabinet, having come to a decision, sent an answer first of all to the South African Republic, saying—"You will receive a communication from the High Commissioner;" and on the same day telegraphing to the High Commissioner, saying that the Government desired him, on receiving the concurrence of his Ministry, to call upon the Government of the South African Republic to disallow the recent Acts by which the South African Republic assumed jurisdiction over Montsioa and the violation of the Convention of 1884, and asking him to advise as to the means to be taken to maintain the Protectorate. This is the tenour of the telegrams that passed between the Government and the South African Republic. With reference to the answer which I gave the other day, the House will allow me to explain to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) that I was in error in saying, in answer to a Question whether we received any other official communication about Mr. Bethell's mode of death, that none had been received except the document I referred to as having been received last Thursday. I was correct in my memory in saying that we had received no communication except from Mr. Wright; but it appears, on looking at the Papers carefully, that a few days previously, on the 15th of October, we had received a document from Sir Hercules Robinson, forwarding a long document from Mr. Wright, giving a statement of a long series of outrages that had been committed on Montsioa by the freebooters. In the eighth paragraph of that Report the names of the murderers of Mr. Bethell were given; but we did not act on it for this reason, because in the covering despatch from Sir Hercules Robinson, which arrived the same day, he said—

"I have forwarded a copy of your Lordship's despatch to Mr. Wright, and asking for a full account of the circumstances attending the death of Mr. Bethell ;"

so we were waiting until the answer came from Mr. Wright to the despatch, and that arrived only on Thursday.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I have to thank my hon. Friend for his explanation. I think he also must have received a despatch from Sir Hercules Robinson containing Mr. Bower's despatch to him. I wish to ask whether the despatch from Sir Hercules Robinson on the 24th of September, I think it was, to which that answer was given on the 7th of October, came by telegraph or post?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: It came by telegraph. It was received on the 24th of September. With reference to what the right hon. Gentleman says about Commander Bower's Report, I have to say that his Report was received by us on the 15th of October, forwarded by Sir Hercules Robinson. What I want to point out to my right hon. Friend is that Mr. Bower's Report merely gave a general account of the murder of Mr. Bethell, and did not give us what is an important matter—namely, the fact that the names of the murderers were known, and that there was an eye-witness who could depose to the identity of the criminals.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: With reference to the answer of the hon. Gentleman, I should like to ask whether I am right in understanding that the despatch sent to Sir Hercules Robinson by Her Majesty's Government on the 21st of September is to be taken as having intimated that the Government were not prepared to carry out their direct engagements to those Bechuana Chiefs whom they had undertaken to protect, and to repudiate this Proclamation of the Transvaal, unless they received the co-operation of the Cape Government?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: No, Sir; I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not make any inference of that sort. If he recalls what took place last year, or in the early part of this year, between Sir Thomas Scanlen and the delegates of the Transvaal, he will recollect that it was pointed out that Her Majesty's Government would take a very different view of what the ultimate settlement of Bechuanaland might be according as the Cape Government made it a point that the trade route should be kept open or not. Accordingly, if the Cape Government made it an important point, as they did, that the trade route was to be kept open, a much larger measure of extension of jurisdiction would have to be taken than if merely the interests of Montsioa and Mankoroane were to be considered; but if the Cape Government desired to have measures taken in order to save the trade route, it was right that they should also take part of the responsibility and expense.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I observe that my hon. Friend is quoting from the late despatches. I beg to ask him, as they are printed, how soon they can be in the hands of Members? It is impossible to exaggerate the inconvenience in which the House is placed by the fact that the most important Papers are, although printed, not in our hands. Can we be informed when they will be in the possession of Members? I also wish to ask whether pressure could not be put on the printers to take on extra workpeople in such a case as this? The House and the Government are immensely inconvenienced, and probably a great deal of time will be lost in debate, in consequence of no one being able really to go into the question as it ought to be gone into.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Considering who it is who asks me the Question, I cannot resist the temptation to give the answer which came to me from the printers, that they employed a large number of women and children in the work, and that they were checked by the operation of the Factory Acts. I can only say that I have done my best to press the printing forward; but I must, at the same time, point out that the difficulties are great when you carry the Papers down to the last day. The last despatch only came to the Colonial Office on Thursday, and I hope the Papers will be in the hands of Members on Friday or Saturday morning.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I wish to ask my hon. Friend whether, on receiving this information with regard to the Factory Acts, he did not state to the printers that in a matter of this kind they ought to employ extra men, so as to get the work done more rapidly. If the bargain which the country has made does not yield a price sufficient for that purpose, surely it is a case in which we might fairly say another bargain should be made. The time of the House is wasted, the Government is inconvenienced, the question comes badly before the public, and the public interest is injured simply because by our bargain with the printers we are unable to get done what any private firm would undertake to do.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.] [FIFTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [23rd October,] "That, &c."—[See page. 69.]

Original Question again proposed.

AFFAIRS OF SOUTH AFRICA.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, that, after the very full and frank explanation of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) as to the reasons for the delay in the production of the Bechuana-land Papers, he should not do more than reiterate his expression of regret that the Papers promised so long ago as the 7th of July last were only distributed that morning. He must, however, express his regret and unbounded astonishment—a regret and an astonishment which would be felt on both sides of the House by hon. Members who had interested themselves in this question—that the Papers now presented only came down to the 14th of August. Nothing could be more inconvenient, as had been just pointed out by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), because the discussion must now be incomplete owing to that fact. The House had no information about the recall of Mr. Mackenzie; none about the mission of Mr. Rhodes; none as to the murder of Mr. Bethell; none as to the steps which had been taken by Her Majesty's Government to bring to justice the perpetrators of that murder; they had no information as to the outrages that had been committed by the Boers on Montsion, or as to the sham Treaty that had been wrung out of him after he had been reduced to extremities. He could not understand, nor would the country be able to understand, why, although some of the Correspondence might be incomplete, some further Papers could not have been published, some despatches, or some telegrams, bringing the matter down to a later date. But even upon the Papers presented, however incomplete, there was quite sufficient evidence, in his opinion, to show that the policy of Her Majesty's Government had been most unsatisfactory; and he must add that the words which had been put in the Speech from the Throne did not tend to throw any clear light on the question what their policy would be in the future. He could not help entertaining serious doubts whether, even now, Her Majesty's Government realized the gravity of the position, and whether they were even now prepared to fulfil the obligations which they had incurred. Before dealing with the Papers which had been presented, he desired, however, to clear the ground for discussion by a few preliminary observations. In the first place, it should not be understood that he, or anyone who criticized the action of the Government, underrated in any way the difficulties of the case. No one who had studied the affairs of South Africa, and the proceedings that had taken place there, could doubt the gravity and importance of those difficulties; but he must observe that those difficulties had, in the present case, been enormously increased and aggravated by the policy of drift and concession pursued by Her Majesty's Government. What was the main difficulty with which they had had to contend? It had been the Boer element—how to deal with the freebooting Boers, as well as with the Transvaal Government. Now, it appeared to him that the policy of Her Majesty's Government had been such as to justify the Boers in believing that, if we were not actually afraid of them, at all events Her Majesty's Government were afraid of incurring the expense and trouble which must be incurred in holding our own against the Boers, and that we were ready to make any concession rather than incur that expense and trouble. If they were to believe all that appeared in the Colonial papers, and there was no reason to disbelieve such statements, the Boers openly avowed that they had conquered this country, and could conquer it again; they advised the Native Chiefs to put no trust in the honour and protection of this country, or in our fulfilment of pledges of protection; they had not hesitated to attack our protected Ally, and to wring from him a sham Treaty; they had not hesitated to murder a British officer in the execution of his duty, and to insult the British flag. He regretted to say that the speeches of Members of Her Majesty's Government had strongly tended, in his opinion, to confirm the Boers in their view. He would refer to one of those speeches now, and he would deal with another speech later on. On the 6th of February, last Session, he had put a plain Question to the Government, and asked for a plain answer. He asked them to assure the House and the country that, if the Convention then under discussion was broken by the Transvaal Government, they would be prepared to enforce the observance of it. It surely was not too much to assume that there was a probability, a strong probability, that those who had with impunity and profit to themselves broken the former Convention would break the new Convention also, unless assured that the Government meant to act firmly and insist upon an observance of it. Indeed, as was said in the course of that debate by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster)—

"Judging from the past, they would be perfectly blind and perfectly foolish if they were satisfied that the Convention would maintain itself."—(3 Hansard, [284] 142.)

Now, what answer did the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) give to that plain Question? He said it was a most unusual request; that it would hardly be becoming to anticipate a breach of the Convention by the other contracting party, and to say what the Government would do in that event. That, he (Sir Henry Holland) ventured to think, was a most evasive and unsatisfactory answer. He had not asked the Government to assume, or express their belief, that the Boers would break the new Convention; but it was most reasonable and important to know what the Government would do in such a case. The speeches of Members of the Government were perfectly well known to, and noted by, the Transvaal Government, and the Boers; and an evasive answer like that given by the President of the Board of Trade would confirm the Boers in their belief that the Government did not intend to depart from the policy of inaction, which, much to the benefit of the Boers, they had hitherto maintained. Another point to which he desired to call the attention of the House was this. The present state of affairs in Bechuanaland, and our responsibilities there now, even from the Government point of view, differed materially from the former state of things in Bechuanaland or in Zululand. He said from the Government point of view, because the view of himself and of many hon. Members on both sides of the House had always been that, as by the policy of the Government we had incurred grave responsibilities to the people and Chiefs in Zululand, amongst whom we had partitioned that country, so we had in Bechuanaland incurred responsibilities to our "Native Allies," Montsioa and Mankoroane. The Government, on the other hand, as the House was aware, had disputed the extent of that responsibility, and had dissented from the term "Native Allies," as applied to these Bechuana Chiefs. Upon this latter point, he would only observe that he thought no one who had carefully read the former debates, the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford and other hon. Members, and the despatches of Sir Hercules Robinson, could doubt that those Chiefs were fairly ranked as our Allies. He would venture to quote a few words from one of the despatches of Sir Hercules Robinson in support of this view—

"Montsioa and Mankoroane are now on the point of being exterminated, in consequence of their fidelity to the British Government, and because of the assistance they gave to British subjects in the Transvaal War."

But whether the Government were then right or wrong, whatever their responsibility was on former occasions, there could be no question now as to our obligations to Montsioa and Mankoroane, and as to our engagements to protect them and their territory against the Boers. The last point he desired to notice was as follows:—Hitherto a distinction had always been attempted to be drawn between the action of the free-booting Boers, though subjects of the Transvaal Government, and the action of the Transvaal Government itself. But without holding the Transvaal Government directly liable for all the outrages committed by their subjects in Bechuanaland, there could be no doubt now, upon the facts stated in the Papers which had been presented—and further Papers, he believed, would only confirm this view—that that Government had connived at these outrages; that they had not bond fide endeavoured to restrain them, and that they had attempted to profit by them. It was clear, from the Papers and the telegrams of Sir Hercules Robinson, that recruiting for this commando was carried on at and near Pretoria, and that the Proclamation of Nicholas Gey, declaring war against Montsioa, and promising booty, by a distribution of that Chief's land, to those who would fight against him, was openly published in The Volksstem newspaper in Pretoria. It is true that, after pressure put upon them by Mr. Rutherford, the Resident, under orders from Sir Hercules Robinson, the Transvaal Government did publish a Proclamation forbidding their subjects to cross the frontier. But the true value of that Proclamation was well understood; and it was not worth the paper it was printed on, as it was not followed up, so far as they could judge from the Papers, by any restraining action on the part of that Government. But that was not all the case against that Government, though it was all they could learn from the Papers presented by the Colonial Office. Unless they had been misinformed, they learnt from the Colonial newspapers and letters that after all the outrages had been committed, after Montsioa, owing to our neglect of duty and inaction, had been reduced to the last extremity, there appeared upon the scene a deputation from the Transvaal Government, who offered to Montsioa, if he would submit and make a Treaty with them, to clear his territory of Boers, and withdraw the commando. Those who could withdraw could have prevented, had they been so inclined, the invasion. The mention of this Treaty brought him to the other speech of a Member of the Government to which he had before referred, and which he thought as unfortunate as the speech of the President of the Board of Trade. He confessed he was astonished at the defence of the Transvaal Government put forward by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney). Unless his speech to his constituents was wrongly reported, he appeared to have argued that the Transvaal Government had shown that they were sensible of their obligations under the Convention, and their desire to act up to it, by their proposal to submit this so-called Treaty to Her Majesty for her sanction or disapproval. In other words, after having connived at these outrages committed by their own subjects; after our protected Ally, Montsioa, had been reduced to the last extremity; and after they had wrung this shameful Treaty out of him, they proposed, forsooth, to satisfy the letter of the Convention of 1834, by submitting the Treaty to Her Majesty! Such a course appeared to him (Sir Henry Holland) to be simply adding insult to injury. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury was willing, in a true Christian-like spirit, to pocket both insult and injury; but even he must have doubted whether he had not been too hasty in doing this, when he learnt that even Mr. Joubert—a Boer of Boers and a Leader of the Transvaal Government—was so shocked at the action of that Government that he retired from Office. But here, again, a speech like this from an important Member of the Government could not but have had a very bad effect in the Transvaal. He (Sir Henry Holland) had begun by saying that the policy of Her Majesty's Government had been most unsatisfactory. Of course, there could not be now a full discussion upon this question, owing to the incompleteness of the Papers, and it must be deferred until the further Papers were presented, which he hoped might, in spite of the Factory Acts to which the Under Secretary of State had referred, be pressed forward with all speed. But, even upon the Papers before the House, there was sufficient to show that up to the 14th of August their policy had been most half-hearted and unsatisfactory. Their first step was to send out Mr. Mackenzie to Bechuanaland. He (Sir Henry Holland) had himself always doubted the fitness of Mr. Mackenzie for that post. Not that he doubted Mr. Mackenzie's zeal and energy; but Mr. Mackenzie was a missionary, and he had taken a very active part—he did not say wrongly—on behalf of Montsioa in the quarrels and disputes which had arisen in that country. His impartiality, therefore, might well be doubted, in a position in which it was above all things necessary that a man of absolute impartiality should be employed. But whether he was, or was not, the right man, one thing was clear—that whoever was sent out should have been backed up by a strong police force. He (Sir Henry Holland), and others, had constantly pressed upon the Government the necessity of employing a police force to guard the frontier of Bechuana-land; but the Government had always opposed the suggestion, and held that such a step, would lead, if not to annexation, at all events to increased danger of disturbances and, perhaps, war. He had always contended that the very reverse would be the result of such a step, if taken in time. He had always contended that if we provided, not a military, but a strong police force, on the frontier, we should not have to meet incursions of freebooting Boers. If the Boers had known that there was on our side of the frontier a strong body of men to keep them in check, they would have hesitated to advance. It had been because we had allowed the Boers to assemble in increasing numbers close to the frontier, and to cross over in small parties with impunity, that the extremely difficult and dangerous state of things had arisen, which might, after all, lead us into war, and which certainly would now entail upon us increased expenditure and possible loss of life. And the result had proved the correctness of his view. Well, the Government had, at a late hour, adopted his suggestion; but, unfortunately, they had done so in a half-hearted manner, and had not realized the increased difficulties of the case. What did they find? Why, as late as June 27, after full knowledge of what had passed, after full knowledge of what was threatened, Major Lowe had only 50 police under his command, and had earnestly to press for an increased force. Now, he contended that the Government, when they learned that fact in June last, should at once have telegraphed to Sir Hercules Robinson, and ordered him to recruit more police in the Cape, or elsewhere, at Imperial expense, and send them up to Bechuana-land. Anyone who studied the Papers would see that the difficulty under which Sir Hercules Robinson laboured was that he had no authority from the Government to incur any expense, and that he was not able to get the Cape Government to incur any expenditure or render any assistance. Her Majesty's Government should at once have authorized the expenditure necessary to increase the police force. But nothing had been done since June 26 by the Government, so far as they could judge by the Papers. On June 26 two telegrams were received by Lord Derby from Sir Hercules Robinson. In the first telegram, which would be found at page 33, Sir Hercules Robinson, after stating that a British Protectorate had been announced over Montsioa's territory, and that the Goshenites had been warned of this fact, and after stating the fact of Nicholas Gey's Proclamation of War having been published in The Volksstem newspaper and of the recruiting from near Pretoria, went on to say—

"I at once telegraphed Acting Resident to warn Transvaal Government that Montsioa is now under British protection, and that if a publicly advertised expedition against that Chief is organized by persons living within the Transvaal, and the marauders with their plunder are allowed to return to the Transvaal, Her Majesty's Government will assuredly hold the Transvaal Government responsible for such proceedings."

And at the end of the telegram, after stating that he had authorized Mr. Mackenzie to organize, if necessary, a temporary force of burghers and police sufficient to expel the marauders, he says—

"The invasion, if it takes place, will be an act of impudent defiance of British authority, and the invaders should, I think, be expelled and punished at any risk or cost. Do you concur?"

This was a most important and pressing question; but the House would be surprised to hear that no answer was given to that question until the 4th July, and then only in very ambiguous terms. They learnt from Lord Derby's despatch of the 4th July, which would be found at page 35 of the Papers, that he had on that day despatched a telegram approving the communication to the Transvaal Government, and the instructions given to Mr. Mackenzie on the subject, and in that telegram he had—

"Observed that any attack upon the protected territory must, of course, be repelled, and that Her Majesty's Government were confident that you fully appreciated the importance of not risking a reverse in the absence of reinforcements."

That answer, he submitted to the House, was most unsatisfactory and uncertain. What had Sir Hercules Robinson asked? He had asked what was the policy of Her Majesty's Government with respect to the threatened invasion of Bechuanaland, and he was told that it was to be repelled if he had sufficient force, though the Government were perfectly aware, from his telegram, that he had not that force. It was, no doubt, difficult to give full instructions in a telegram; but they should have given him some orders about raising a force at once at Imperial expense, and that telegram should have been followed up by a despatch going fully into the case, and explaining their views of the position. But nothing further had been given—no orders, no directions, no intimation of their policy. What could Sir Hercules Robinson conclude from this but that Her Majesty's Government were prepared to abide by the same policy of inaction which they had hitherto maintained? He ventured to think that this reticence was not fair towards a Governor placed in so responsible and difficult a position as Sir Hercules Robinson was placed in. But the case against the Government was even stronger than that, because, on the 2nd July—that was, two days before the telegram of the 4th July was despatched—Lord Derby had received a third telegram of the 2nd July from Sir Hercules Robinson, which would be found at page 34. The first paragraph ran as follows:—

"Rutherford telegraphs June 26, Transvaal Republic issuing strong Proclamation, forbidding burghers taking part in hostilities against Montsioa. I have directed him to urge that restraining steps be taken, as some stronger measure than mere paper proclamation necessary to relieve Transvaal from responsibility for raids publicly advertised and organized within Transvaal."

And then, after stating the increase of marauders, and the danger of allowing them to settle in Montsioa's country, he ends by saying—

"Please authorize Treasury Chest to supply another five thousand pounds, if required."

Now, he (Sir Henry Holland) thought the House would be surprised to learn that the only answer sent to that pressing and important telegram was that Lord Derby "would reply to it as soon as possible," and that, in fact, so far as appeared from the Papers, no further answer was sent, at all events, up to the 14th August, when the Papers end. Here was a telegram, practically asking for an approval of the stronger message sent to the Transvaal Government, and asking for £5,000, and yet no answer was given to it, except the promise of a reply as soon as possible. So that the matter stands thus—that no answer, except the ambiguous answer given in the telegram of 4th July, had been sent to the question as to the policy of Her Majesty's Government; no approval or disapproval had been given as to the stronger message ordered to be pressed upon the Transvaal Government; and no answer as to the request to be allowed to expend £5,000. The only other despatch from Lord Derby was one dated 14th August, which merely approved the proceedings which had been approved by his Lordship's telegram of the 4th July. This despatch ended the Papers presented—a most lame and impotent, indeed, he thought a discreditable conclusion. So much for the Papers. But now let the House observe what had happened since the 14th August. Mr. Mackenzie had been recalled. Mr. Rhodes had been sent up to Bechuanaland, and returned; and he (Sir Henry Holland) would now venture to trouble the House with a few extracts from Mr. Rhodes's Report, of which he presumed the Colonial Office had a copy, as it was stated to have been sent to the High Commissioner, and appeared in The Times so long ago as the 23rd September, from which newspaper he had taken these extracts. It was stated that—

"Messrs. Rhodes and Bower report to the High Commissioner that they are satisfied that the Transvaal has the power, but never will use it, to stop the violation of the Western border. That Goshen freebooters fell upon Montsioa, but an armistice of 14 hours was gained. The Boers demand compensation for the war, and the recognition of Goshen as an independent Republic, with right to the Queen to place a Resident there. The Commissioner would not accede to these terms, and warned them of the consequences of carrying on war against protected British subjects. Montsioa sent messages that he was reduced to the last extremity, but, having faith in the Queen, had refused all the Boer overtures to submit. He would only do so to save the lives of the women and children. Mr. Rhodes replied Montsioa must not consider himself abandoned, for the Queen's Government would fulfil their obligations."

He would only say, in passing, that he should like to know when and how Her Majesty's Government intended to fulfil these obligations? The Report then goes on to state that—

"When the Commissioner left, the Goshenites resumed the war on Montsioa, who had to succumb. Mr. Joubert was called in and concluded a Treaty on similar conditions to those rejected by Mr. Rhodes. Messrs. Bower and Rhodes warned Mr. Joubert of the serious responsibility of such proceedings."

The report in the paper adds that the Commissioner had inquired into the revolting circumstances of Mr. Bethell's death—

"Mr. Bethell, an acting officer of police, was wounded in a conflict with the freebooters, and afterwards killed in cold blood, his body being subjected to indignity."

Now, he (Sir Henry Holland) could not doubt that Mr. Rhodes must have made a Report about Mr. Bethell's death to the Colonial Office, although no mention had been made of it. He did not propose to go into that painful case. He would leave it to be dealt with by those hon. Members who were more directly connected with Mr. Bethell. But he could not help expressing his astonishment that the Government had only really taken the matter in hand, and issued instructions, some three days ago. Even now the House did not know the contents of the telegram to Sir Hercules Robinson, whether he was to act and take steps at once to bring these murderers to justice, or whether he was only "to advise and report," which seemed to be the usual form of instructions given by the present Government. Before they considered what the Government were going to do, they had a right, and the country had a right, to ask— "Why has action been taken so late? Why has the Government waited till just before Parliament met?" Why had action been taken so late as to ruin our character in South Africa for an honourable performance of our engagements, and to lead Colonists and Natives to believe that we were unable or unwilling to act up to those engagements? Why so late as to call forth indignant protests at the Cape, for one could read between the lines, and see that, while offering us support, the Colonists were indignant at our inaction? Why so late as to cause greater expenditure of money, if not of life, than if we had acted firmly before these outrages had been committed? What was to be the action of the Government now? Looking at the past, it was only fair to ask whether it was to be real and effectual, whether the Government were really alive to the gravity of the case and prepared to deal with it, or whether the Micawber policy was to be continued of waiting to see what would turn up? The paragraph in Her Majesty's Gracious Speech was far from satisfactory. It began—

If the Government had acted with proper vigour, that sentence should have run somewhat as follows:—

"Circumstances have occurred which have received my vigilant attention, and which have necessitated the adoption of active measures to secure peace and the due protection of the Native Chiefs, in accordance with my pledges to them."

The Speech went on—

"In conjunction with the Government of the Cape Colony I am engaged in considering the means which may be required to secure the faithful observance of the Convention of the present year."

He, for one, heartily hailed the co-operation of the Cape Government and Colonists. He had never doubted their readiness to assist us, if they saw we were determined to act; but our inaction had encouraged those Colonists, and there was a considerable number of them, who were in their hearts favourable to the Boers and to the Africander policy, while it had discouraged our friends, who viewed the Boer proceedings with distrust and alarm. He would, therefore, seek the co-operation of the Cape Government, and would press for it. But it must be remembered that the Imperial Government had duties and obligations of its own, which the Cape Government had not; and we were bound to meet those responsibilities, and to act up to them at once, without waste of time or delay in negotiating and making arrangements with the Cape Government as to the exact amount and mode of assistance they would give. Our duty in this respect was well stated by the hon. Member who moved the Address with so much eloquence and ability—

"If peace is ever to reign in South Africa, if respect for the British name is to continue there, and if South Africa is to remain an integral portion of Her Majesty's Dominions, we shall have to deal with the matters arising there with a firm and steady hand."

The Speech from the Throne was not comforting; but he could not but think that since that Speech was composed, Her Majesty's Government had had to reconsider their position, in face of the feeling in the country, and had seen the necessity of more decided action. He was glad to learn that Sir Charles Warren was to be supported by a strong force. He had feared lest Sir Charles Warren should be sent out as General Gordon was sent out, alone, as a scapegoat into the wilderness, to bear the sins of the Government upon him, or, as Lord Northbrook had been sent out, "to advise and report." He trusted that the force would be a sufficient force. He trusted, moreover, that if, as was not unlikely, upon the report of this force going up into Bechuanaland, some kind of peace was established there, the Government would not be satisfied with this, and adopt a retrograde policy. Such a peace could only be temporary, and would be broken again if the Government resumed their former policy. Some exhibition of force must be shown in Bechuanaland; and, peace or no peace, Sir Charles Warren, backed up by some force, should go up and endeavour to establish a firm and lasting peace there, and once for all impose some lasting check upon the Boers. Without some such show of power, the Transvaal Government would soon renew their policy of aggression. He thanked the House for having listened to him with such patience, and he felt that an apology for the length of his speech was the more necessary, because it was clear that the discussion must be renewed at some later date when further Papers had been presented.

MR. WODEHOUSE said, it would be unnecessary for him to follow the hon. Member who had just sat down over the whole ground traversed in his speech; but he would make a few observations on some of the topics to which it referred. They were obviously at a disadvantage in discussing these events which had taken place on the South-Western Frontier of the Transvaal without Papers up to a recent date; and he had no desire to prejudge questions or proceedings on which further Papers would give authentic information. But the House knew, from Papers already in their hands, that, after concluding a Convention with the South African Republic, Her Majesty's Government decided to establish a British Protectorate in Bechuanaland, the expenses of which were to be jointly borne by the Imperial and Cape Governments. They accordingly appointed Mr. Mackenzie to be the Agent and Representative of British authority in the new Protectorate, and, as was pointed out by the hon. Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland), that appointment was a peculiar one. He did not condemn it; it was made on the strong recommendation of Sir Hercules Robinson. He only said that it was peculiar, and that Mr. Mackenzie's personality alone had a marked significance, because, from the time of the Anti-Slavery movement down to the present hour, the Missionary had been the type and incarnation of principles as to the treatment of Natives which irritated the Dutch Boers of South Africa. Moreover, this particular Missionary, Mr. Mackenzie, was known to be the eager advocate of a far-reaching policy of Native administration by European officers, and the central idea of his policy was the expansion of such a Native administration under Imperial, and not under Colonial control. Mr. Mackenzie, however, soon vacated office, apparently in deference to the suspicions and ill-will of our partner in the Protectorate, the Cape Government, and his place was taken by Mr. Rhodes, a Cape politician. Now, Mr. Rhodes was also a man with a policy; but the central idea of his policy was to exclude what he called the Imperial factor from Bechuanaland. If, then, the very divergent policies of the two Imperial Agents afforded any clue to the aims and intentions of Her Majesty's Government, there would seem to have been some change of view on their part, when Mr. Mackenzie gave way to Mr. Rhodes. To judge from the Papers distributed that morning, Mr. Mackenzie did not appear to have had a very clear insight into the situation with which he had to deal; but in estimating his success, every allowance should be made for the miserably inadequate resources at his command to vindicate authority amidst hands of reckless and desperate men. An officer sent up to establish a Protectorate in the name of a great Power should at least be armed with the means of rendering the protection which he offered a reality and not a mockery. All our world-wide experience taught us that a great Power in contact with turbulent and barbarous communities could seldom, if ever, conduct affairs with credit and success on a rigid adherence to the limited liability principle. The House knew so little at present about the circumstances in which Sir Charles Warren was being despatched to South Africa, that he would only express a hope that that officer would not be denied a sufficiency either of men or of money to insure the success of his mission. At the present moment an attempt was being made to settle matters in Bechuanaland by the combined action of the Imperial and Cape Governments; and he (Mr. Wodehouse) must own that this partnership with the Cape Government filled him with misgivings. The observance of the Convention by the Transvaal Government, the execution of justice on the murderers of Mr. Bethell, the expulsion of freebooters from Montsioa's territory, and our general obligations towards the Natives were Imperial matters; and, while admitting the advantages of Colonial co-operation, he would decline to confide Imperial obligations towards the Natives or Imperial honour to the keeping of a Cape Government. He would explain why he said so. The late Cape Ministry—the Ministry of Sir Thomas Scanlan—lent cannon to the Transvaal Government for the subjugation of Mapoch and his tribe, but would never give facilities for the Natives to obtain arms and ammunition for their own defence, and when they were asked by Her Majesty's Government to lend a few policemen for service in Bechuanaland, they refused to do so. But matters were worse now under the auspices of the present Cape Ministry, whose very existence depended upon the support of that extreme Africander Party, whose scarcely veiled object was to thrust British Sovereignty out of South Africa, or at least to reduce it to a mere empty name. He hoped, therefore, that Her Majesty's Government and that House, as guardians of British interests and the national honour, would narrowly examine all proposals for the settlement of Bechuanaland issuing from such a source; and he would beg Her Majesty's Government not to feel too confident that, after all, the Cape Government would take Bechuanaland off their hands. He was aware that both Houses of the Cape Legislature had passed Resolutions favourable to the annexation of Bechuanaland to the Colony; but Cape politicians were seldom hampered in their movements by any austere and pedantic consistency, and he believed that the extreme Africander Party would rather have Bechuanaland annexed to the Transvaal than to their own Colony. No doubt, if everything were smooth and peaceful in Bechuanaland, the Cape Government and Parliament might be willing to annex it; but while there were any risks to be run, while there was any occasion for the forcible assertion of authority, we should look altogether in vain for substantial help from that quarter. Now, turning to the opposite border of the Transvaal, he must express the regret with which he read the despatch of the Secretary of State of the 19th of August with regard to the Zulu Chief, Usibepu. That Chief was described by the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, only a few weeks ago, as a brave man and a good friend of England; and now his overthrow had been shamefully accomplished by filibustering Boers without a finger being lifted to save him. The Secretary of State said that whatever risk or inconvenience there might have been in rendering him assistance, it would have been rendered, had there been any obligation on the part of the Government to aid him. But was there no obligation? To his (Mr. Wodehouse's) mind, nothing could efface the obligations imposed on us towards the Zulu people by the cruel wrong of the Zulu War. Moreover, we knew, on the authority of Lord Wolseley himself, that none of the 13 Chiefs appointed by the Imperial Government would have accepted their positions, had they had the slightest expectation of the restoration of Cetewayo, and it was the acceptance of this position which especially drew upon Usibepu the implacable animosity of the Usutus. Most emphatic testimony had been repeatedly borne by Sir Henry Bulwer to the loyalty of this Chief, and his habitual deference to the advice of Sir Henry Bulwer and the Resident Commissioner, and, considering that his one or two so-called offensive operations were really defensive, in spirit and purpose, it seemed hardly generous to fling them in his face as excuses for leaving him a victim to Boers whom he had never wronged. He was at least entitled to something more than a bare refuge in the Reserve, coupled with a lecture and a warning that if he did not behave himself there, he would be turned out. Lord Derby said that opinion was hopelessly divided as to the degree of blame to be assigned to each Chief and Party; but as regards Usibepu, the witnesses in his favour were Sir Henry Bulwer and Mr. Osborn, while the only witnesses against him were entirely irresponsible persons. Surely, then, Her Majesty's Government might attach the most weight to the testimony of their own officers, especially when one of them was a gentleman of such high character and so much experience as Sir Henry Bulwer. Next, as to the question of appointing Commissioners on the Eastern border of the Transvaal, the 2nd Article of the new Convention stipulated that the South African Republic should appoint Commissioners, whose duties should be to guard against trespassing over the border. Whether such Commissioners had been appointed he did not know, nor did it matter much, for the Boer Commissioners would be pretty certain to ignore their duties. But the 2nd Article of the Convention also provided that, if necessary, Commissioners were to be appointed by Her Majesty's Government, to maintain order and prevent encroachments. If, then, disorder and anarchy constituted necessity, surely there had been more than enough of both to justify the appointment of Commissioners. Again, the 12th Article of the Convention recognized the independence of the Swazis; and he believed their territory to be in imminent danger of absorption by the Boers. In the spring of the present year, Sir Hercules Robinson and the Resident at Pretoria had pressed on the Secretary of State the need and advantages of a British Agency among the Swazis. Lord Derby admitted that there might be advantages in such an Agency, and directed that the King of the Swazis should be asked whether he would defray the cost of it. If the Secretary of State meant to do nothing, why did he put that question to the Swazi King? Why raise false hopes? On the other hand, if the establishment of a British Agency in the Swazi territory was a good thing, why was it not done? What were they waiting for? Waiting till it was too late? With regard to the consequences of postponing action, he would remind the House that in the middle of last July the Under Secretary stated, in reply to a Question, that such an event as the establishment of a new Boer Republic in Zululand was a thing of the future. That was a reason for doing nothing. But the sequel proved it to be a thing of an exceedingly near future, and it was now a thing of the past—an accomplished fact. That, he supposed, was an equally cogent reason for doing nothing. The creation of this new Republic in Zululand raised considerations of vital importance for the future of South Africa. He understood it to be the view of Her Majesty's Government that this Republic was set up, as it were, at the invitation of the Zulus; that the Boer adventurers were invited to come and were given a vast tract of country as the price of Usibepu's destruction. We might be sure, however, that if the establishment of this Boer Republic in Zululand were contemplated by us with tacit acquiescence, other Republics of similar character would spring into life, with the open or secret encouragement of the Transvaal authorities. No one could cling any longer to the belief that the Transvaal Government would ever take honest measures to prevent trespassing; and Boer marauders had never had the slightest difficulty in trumping up these so-called invitations, because, if the actual Chief of a district objected to their presence, they set up a rival and pretender, from whom they professed to have received grants of land in return for their recognition of him as paramount Chief. The Boers created a disturbance, and then they announced that the disturbance demanded their intervention in the interests of humanity and peace. Let us realize that acquiescence in the establishment of these Republics was virtually the surrender of South Africa to the Boers. They wanted to get down to the sea, and they would soon seize the Amatonga country as well as the Swazi country. With the Boers on the sea in the East, and the German Settlement at Angra Pequena in the West, he apprehended that, difficult as had been the management of South African affairs in the past, it would be a good deal more difficult in the future. There were some in this country, he knew, who looked upon the expansion of the Boers in South Africa with indifference, if not with positive satisfaction, and who seemed to think that their rule was beneficial rather than otherwise to the Natives. Those views, he, for one, could not share, and he still leaned to the hope that the policy of Her Majesty's Government in South Africa would be inspired by a desire to maintain there the Sovereign authority and supremacy of the British Power.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER said, it seemed to him that Her Majesty's Government were to be subjected to a very severe cross-fire from both sides of the House. It was difficult for an Englishman to speak of South African affairs without a feeling of intense bitterness and contempt for those who were responsible for their present unsatisfactory condition. It would be his object, in dealing with this question, to avoid all bitterness and partizanship. His object in rising was to draw the attention of the House to the murder of Mr. Bethell; but, before doing so, he desired to allude to what the Prime Minister the other night, in reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, said with regard to South Africa. He said—

"The right hon. Gentleman has referred with a just reserve to the subject of South Africa. My hon. Friend the Mover of the Address aimed, I think, at depicting what he deemed to be a just position on this subject—namely, that we ought to make up our own minds as to that which we deem to be necessary, either for the honour or for the just interests of the country; and, having made up our minds, to adhere firmly to the intention so formed. That is, I believe, a perfectly accurate description of the present position. In framing the Convention of 1884, we certainly endeavoured to proceed on the lines of moderation; but that was with the view that, having proceeded on those lines, the stipulations contained in that Convention must be respected, and it would be our duty both ourselves to adhere to them, and likewise to expect, and if necessary require, that they should be adhered to by others."

He thought the House would agree with him that these were noble sentiments, and, if strictly acted up to, he had no doubt that they might speedily anticipate a satisfactory settlement of the present chaos in South Africa. But he ventured, with all due deference, to assert that the Prime Minister had enunciated many noble sentiments in his time which had, alas! remained sentiments only to the present day, and they could only hope most sincerely that he really did mean business this time. It seemed to him that if the Government had only made up their minds in 1881, after the disgraceful truce following the defeat of our troops at Majuba Hill—if they had only made up their minds as to what they deemed necessary for the honour and just interests of the country, and having done so, if they had adhered to the intention so formed, the Convention of 1884 would never have been required; but, on the contrary, the original Convention would have been enforced to the letter, the rights of the loyal Natives would have been respected, and South Africa would have been spared the horrors of the past three years. He trusted he was right in thinking that the Government had at length realized the necessity for prompt and vigorous action; but he confessed he, like the hon. Member who introduced the debate, had read with regret the paragraph in Her Majesty's Speech dealing with the affairs in the Transvaal, and instead of reading that Her Majesty was engaged in considering the means which might be required to secure the faithful observance of the Convention of the present year, he wished they could have read that Her Majesty had decided to send out Sir Charles Warren as High Commissioner to insure that the terms of the Convention of 1884 were rigorously carried out. He was sick of hearing what the Government were going to do; he longed to see the time when they would act with promptitude and vigour. It seemed to him a great pity that Her Majesty's Government, having once decided the line to be taken, should not have left it more to competent men on the spot to carry out, in the best possible way, what they had decided to be necessary for the honour and just interests of the country. He was very much struck by an extract he read in a Radical paper the other day, which bore him out strongly in this view by saying—

"Three-fourths of our difficulties all the world over arise from our ignoring the self-evident fact that any sensible man on the spot, in a position of responsibility, is much more likely to be right than a dozen gentlemen sitting round a green table in Downing Street, who are preoccupied with other affairs, and know next to nothing about the local conditions of the case with which they are called upon to deal."

Turning to the object for which he rose, and about which he put a Question in the House on Monday last—the murder of Mr. Bethell—as a representative of his family, he had been requested to bring the subject to the notice of Parliament, and place before the House and the Government what he hoped they would consider the most reasonable demands of his family. He had got the facts supplied from a letter by Mr. Bethell's brother. Mr. Christopher Bethell went to South Africa in the early part of 1878, and soon after his arrival joined the Diamond Field Force under Sir Charles, then Colonel, Warren. He served through the operations in Griqualand West and Bechuanaland, and was then sent by Sir Charles Warren to Bechuanaland, as Intelligence Officer, to reside with Montsioa, Chief of the Baralongs, and Sir Charles Warren had borne testimony to his services and his abilities. Early in 1880 the post of Intelligence Officer was abolished; but Mr. Bethell remained with Montsioa, and became his agent and adviser. It was hardly necessary for him to remind the House that Montsioa had long been a faithful ally of ours. Before 1880 he was actually protected by us. In our Transvaal troubles in 1881 he not only protected our friends who escaped from the Boers, but offered Sir George Colley material assistance. The Convention of 1881 made him an immediate neighbour of the Transvaal Republic; but he was assured by our Government that the boundary should be respected, and that we should not forget the rights of our faithful allies. Mr. Bethell remained with Montsioa, as he had said, to the interest of Montsioa and the welfare of the Native tribes. As Montsioa's agent, it became his duty to report to the authorities that the Boers were not observing the Convention, but raiding across the borders and stealing cattle. The aggressions went on unceasingly, and it was mainly owing to his support that Montsioa and his people were enabled in some degree to keep off his robber neighbours. This was no exaggerated statement, as was known to anyone who was conversant with the affairs of Bechuanaland. They knew that Montsioa, immediately after Mr. Bethell's death, succumbed in despair to his foes. The Boer filibusters had an intense dread of Mr. Bethell, and regarded him with almost superstitious awe in consequence of his miraculous escapes. He knew for a fact that for some 12 months before Mr. Bethell's death a price of 5,000 dollars was set on his head by the Boers. Towards the end of last July the filibusters crossed the boundary in force, and collected a quantity of cattle. On July 31, anxious to bring on a battle, they drove their capture in sight of Montsioa's kraal. Mr. Bethell led the Natives, who went out to recapture the cattle. In the fight that took place he was badly wounded, and left lying on the ground, the Natives being defeated with great loss. He was found by two or more Boers, who taunted him with having at last fallen into their hands, and presently shot him dead—murdered him as he lay. Shortly before his death Mr. Bethell was appointed by Mr. Mackenzie Acting Chief of the Frontier Police, and was recommended to the proper authorities for the regular appointment. He was thus a Government officer in the execution of his duty when he was murdered. He was also an Englishman, who fought to uphold British faith—who fought, in short, as most of his countrymen would admit, for the honour of our Flag. From another account supplied him by Bethell's brother, now at the Cape, it appeared that he was wounded while heroically endeavouring to rescue Montsioa's son, who was left wounded on the ground. Such was a short account of this brave man's career in South Africa, and he thought the House would agree with him when he said they had lost as gallant a hero as ever bore the name of Englishman. There was something to him inexpressibly touching in this brave man's death. In the fulness of his youth and vigour of his manhood, he gave up his friends, his prospects, the comforts of civilization, and made his lot with these half-savage tribes. And what for? Simply because he recognized the duty that was due from England to them, and, like the gallant Gordon in the Soudan, he determined to do his duty by these Native tribes, and leave to the English Government the indelible disgrace of having deserted them. Bethell was absolutely worshipped by every Native in Bechuanaland. They looked upon him as their saviour and only friend, and among the Colonists he was universally liked. In a notice which appeared in a Cape Town paper in a deep mourning border, it was said—

"The late Mr. Bethell was a courteous gentleman and of great promise. He made friends wherever he went, and it filled the hearts of many here with deep sorrow when they heard that one they loved so well had been sent to his grave thus early in his life in this cruel way. His relatives at home have the deepest sympathies from the people here, and knowing as we do how strong Colonel Warren's affection for his late nephew was, we tender to him our sincere condolence."

He submitted to the House what he trusted the Government would consider the reasonable demands of his family. In the first place, they demanded the arrest and trial of his murderers. They did this in no vindictive feeling, but simply in the interest of justice and humanity. The only piece of recrimination in which he would indulge was in saying it seemed to him a most extraordinary thing that Her Majesty's Government should have allowed all this time to elapse without taking any steps which would have appeared palpably necessary to take in order to avenge the death of this noble man. The whole circumstances of the case were well known to his family before the end of August, and had he known the Government had not the same power of obtaining information as the family had, they would have been only too glad to have supplied them with the full facts which would have justified them in taking immediate and prompt action. This was no ordinary crime—not a murder committed in the heat of passion or under the influence of drink—but a deliberate, cold-blooded, brutal murder of a brave man, lying wounded and helpless on the field of battle; and he thought the House would agree with him that a more atrocious crime could not possibly have been committed, and that the common interests of justice demand that the murderers should be delivered up. In the second place, they asked that the death of Mr. Bethell might accomplish that for which he gave his life. They asked that the Government even now at the eleventh hour might do their duty to those Natives who had been loyal and true to them in their hour of need. They asked that the Government would insist upon the restoration of their land and compensation, as far as possible, for the cattle that had been taken away from them, and that the Government should make preparations for defending them in future from the incursions of their rapacious neighbours. It had been urged that to do this would involve an enormous amount of expenditure, and probably a great loss of human life. Even if it were so, he maintained that it was England's duty to do it. But he thought the Government had altogether mistaken the character of the Boers. Certain enthusiasts had described them as most devotional, God-fearing, psalm-singing, pastoral people, who cared for nothing but living peacefully and quietly on their farms. As a matter of fact, from information he had received from residents there, the opinion he had formed of them was that they were the most bloodthirsty, treacherous race that ever disgraced the civilized world. He could give authentic accounts of barbarities and acts of cruelty they had practised which would shock hon. Members, and he never respected more the discernment of his hon. Friend the Lord Mayor of London—one of the most hospitable Lord Mayors that ever did the honours at the Mansion House—than when he refused to receive at his table the delegates of this blood-stained race. But in addition to this, he had it on the best authority—namely, that of Mr. Bethell himself—that the Boers, when once tackled, were the most arrant cowards, as bullies were generally known to be; and he was perfectly certain of this, that if once England were to show a firm front and to let them know we were not going to stand any nonsense, they would knuckle down and give very little further trouble. It was the position of irresolution which Her Majesty's Government had taken up since they had been in Office that had induced those men to treat us as so much dirt. However, he did not wish to enter now into a general discussion of our policy in the Transvaal. Our Colonies were now thoroughly aroused, and there was no doubt that the Government had at last realized that proper action must be taken. God knew that he had not brought this matter forward in any way from Party feeling, and no one would rejoice more than himself if the Government would now at the eleventh hour recognize their duties and win back the respect they had lost. He had endeavoured to place before the House an absolutely accurate account of the life and death of this brave English officer, who sacrificed his life in vindication of English honour, and he trusted

the Government would not think him unreasonable in what he had asked. He had demanded that, in common justice, those devils in human shape who perpetrated this atrocious and abominable crime should at once be given up to justice; and, for the rest, he could assure the House that nothing could help more to soothe the grief of the relations and friends of brave Christopher Bethell, than if they knew that by his death he had been the means of obtaining that for which he so cheerfully sacrificed his prospects, his comforts, and his life—namely, the recognition by England of the rights, services, and claims of those loyal Native tribes among whom he lived, and for whose sake he died.

MR. CROPPER said, that, in common with all Members on his side of the House, he sympathized with the last speaker in what he had said, as a public man and as a relative, of the sad death of Mr. Christopher Bethell, of which the country had heard with feelings of regret and indignation, and whose career seemed to have been distinguished by so much bravery and so much devotion to the Native tribes. We were accustomed to find brave men in the Public Service; but it was not common to find men so devoted, not only to their duty, but also to the rights of men whose skins were dark, and whose circumstances were so different from ours, and in whose cause they were willing to live and to die. He should be supported by both sides of the House in expressing sympathy with his relatives, the two Members for York. It was, perhaps, useless to echo the complaint that the Blue Book had been delivered that morning, and that there had not been time to study it. With respect to Mr. Mackenzie, he confessed he had not heard with any great feelings of hope of the appointment of that gentleman as Military Superintendent in Bechuana-land, for he thought it always well that Missionaries should not rise, or, he would say, fall, from their true position as teachers of religion to offices that required the use of force and involved the possibilities of bloodshed. It was to be regretted, however, that when Mr. Mackenzie did accept that position there was but slight attention paid by Her Majesty's Government to his absolute necessities. On the 26th of June he applied to Sir Hercules Robinson that his small force should be raised to 100 men, and that £5,000 should be sent to him. [Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY: It was sent.] The statement of the hon. Gentleman was the best answer that could be made to his observation, but it was unfortunate that the fact was not mentioned in the Blue Book; and it did not appear, at all events, that Mr. Mackenzie had received the 100 men whom he required. It did not appear in what circumstances or under what compulsion Mr. Mackenzie had resigned, and it was to be hoped something would be done for him by the Government he had tried to serve. He trusted they would hear what the Government intended to do with regard to the protection of the line between the boundary of Montsioa and that of the Boers. Unless there was a show of force the Convention with the Boers would not be sufficient to protect us and the Natives from constant encroachment. Having entered into the Convention, and made a determined demand for a trade route and a delimitation of territory, we must not shrink back from the position we had taken on account of an expense which would be insignificant compared with what we were incurring in the North of Africa. If Sir Charles Warren was sent out, he ought to be assured that he should not be deserted, but that he should be upheld in the demands he was expected to make on the Boers. He knew nothing personally of the Boers; but he had heard from many eye-witnesses what manner of men they were. From conversation with the learned Missionary, Dr. Moffat, and others, he was assured that the Boers were inveterate slave-holders, and that they acted with intolerable arrogance to any whom they could in any way tyrannize over. It was said the Boers had a great respect for the Bible; but he was afraid it was the respect of the South American slave-owner, whose favourite text was—"Cursed be Canaan." In the ultimate result all these questions must be dealt with by the Cape Colony. He did not think we should suffer because the Germans took an adjacent strip of territory; but if the Cape Colony joined with us in preventing any tyranny over the Black races, or the aggression of the Boers upon territories which we had said belonged to others, we must encourage and support the Cape Colony. He trusted to hear from the Front Bench that we could not go on temporizing, and would act decisively. Let it not be said that they entered into Conventions and made demands, but that the moment anyone was bold enough to violate the Convention and refuse the demands, they shrunk into their shell and feared to enforce their rights. As to the delay in producing the Correspondence, it was idle to say there was any difficulty in finding the labour required to print and issue a few sheets of paper.

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR) said, he had listened with great pleasure to the speech of the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Wodehouse). The hon. Member not only expressed the views entertained by the Opposition, but he hoped by many hon. Members on the Ministerial side. He (Mr. R. N. Fowler) could scarcely pretend that he had mastered the Papers issued only that morning; but he wished to call the attention of the Under Secretary for the Colonies to the despatch in page 1, from which it appeared that the Transvaal Government had demanded that their affairs should be transferred from the hands of the Colonial to those of the Foreign Office. A similar demand was made by them in 1872 or 1873, and refused by Lord Granville and Lord Kimberley, who were then Foreign and Colonial Secretaries of State; and he hoped Her Majesty's Government would pursue the same course on the present occasion. But this demand was an illustration of the impertinence of these Boers, who wanted us to deal with them as if they were a great European Power. They originally crept Northward, because 50 years ago they were angered by the abolition of slavery. They were essentially a slaveholding Republic, and they did not seem to have made any advance in 50 years, but were just as cruel and bloodthirsty as ever they were. He did not doubt but that up and down in the Transvaal State there were many excellent people who wished to live peacefully with the Natives around them; but the misfortune was that these were not the class of people who had the control of the State. The Government of the Transvaal and its most active supporters were men who thought it was their right to treat the Natives like cattle as long as they were useful, and when they ceased to be useful considered themselves at liberty to murder them if they pleased. He had received a letter that morning suggesting that as the Government were sufficiently restored to a sense of their duty, to direct steps to be taken for the punishment of the murderers of Mr. Bethell, it would be desirable also to press for the punishment of the murderers of Captain Elliot, who were acquitted by a jury of Boers and went about the country boasting of it. The truth was the Boers did not think it a crime to murder Natives, and they had scarcely more regard for the lives of White men. The great mistake which this country made was the surrender of Pretoria. It might not have mattered under other circumstances; but the great misfortune was that we gave it up after a defeat. It was all very well for the Prime Minister to talk in an election address of "blood-guiltiness," and for other Members of the Government to speak of their magnanimity; but the Boers did not believe in their magnanimity. They believed simply that the British Government had given way because they were defeated. Nothing went more to his heart when travelling across the Free State than to hear the conversation of the Boers on that point. They said—"It is all very well for the English to say that they could have gone on. They made peace because they were thoroughly beaten." No doubt, that impression was stronger in the Transvaal. For his own part, he deplored the fact that when we were actually prepared to have given the Boers a lesson, and had 10,000 men on the spot, we drew back and made peace. After that great and fatal error, it was hopeless to expect to do anything with these people until we had impressed them with the conviction that we were not to be tampered with. As it was, they believed we were beaten, that we were afraid of them, and that they could set us at defiance; and unless we sent out troops we should not dispossess them of that idea. He had as great horror of war as anyone, but if ever there was a righteous war it was that in which we were engaged with the Transvaal. We were carrying on a war against one of the most wicked and degraded races under the sun. One of the most pathetic events that ever occurred was the demonstration of the Natives on hearing that they were to be transferred from the Sovereignty of the Queen to the tender mercies of the Boers. He was thankful that the Opposition side of the House had no responsibility for that. They supported the Motion of his right hon. Friend the Member for Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), and thus entered their protest against this disgraceful surrender. He would also acknowledge that it was owing to the stand made by Lord Derby in the cause of humanity that the Boer delegates went back without attaining all they had expected. Still, the Boers thought that the British Government would not enforce Treaties, and, therefore, they were determined to put an end to their obligations. The time had now come when it was the duty of the House to insist that Her Majesty's Government should adopt a firm and decided policy on this subject. It was of no use sending out Sir Charles Warren unless we supplied him with a force of police, and, if necessary, with troops, and placed funds at his disposal. The Boers not only believed we were afraid of them, but they trusted to the support they knew they would receive from certain Members of Her Majesty's Government. He saw present on the Treasury Bench a right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chamberlain) who had been a defender of the Boer Republic. He was sorry not to see there the Secretary to the Treasury, the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), who recently took occasion in addressing his constituents to throw doubts upon the stories that reflected on the Boers, and did the best he could for his old clients. He apprehended that the hon. Gentleman did not think it would be pleasant to be in his place on that occasion. Although he was sure the Prime Minister would have heard with pleasure the able speech of the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Wodehouse), it would have been anything but a good quarter of an hour to the Secretary to the Treasury.

MR. GLADSTONE observed, that it needed no ingenious hypothesis to explain the absence of the Secretary to the Treasury, who worked very hard all day in his Office.

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR) said, he quite admitted the industry of the hon. Gentleman, but thought he might have spared time for this debate.

However, the point was that the support which the Boers received in high quarters induced them to set at defiance what was said in the House of Commons or by Sir Hercules Robinson. He could only say that he hoped, now the public were becoming alive to the course which had been taken by the Boer Republic, and to the class of men that the Boers were, they would demand of the House of Commons and of the Government that they should pursue a bold and fearless policy, which would restrain any further atrocities of the Boers in South Africa.

SIR DONALD CURRIE said, he was glad the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister was present at that debate, because he (Sir Donald Currie) was convinced that when facts were brought to the right hon. Gentleman's knowledge, he would give his own special care and attention to the subject. It was well known to the country that after the Transvaal War the argument of the Prime Minister was that the Ministry had been misled in the information conveyed to them by their agents, but upon being correctly informed as to the position of affairs in South Africa, the Government at once took action. The position in South Africa at the present moment was critical, and he would even say perilous. All that we had heard from that country was of the most serious import; and he did not speak too seriously when he affirmed that, in view of the weak condition of our Navy, at no time in the history of this country had our position in South Africa as a Maritime Power required more earnest and careful consideration, and it was to this he ventured to bring the consideration of this House, apart altogether from Party considerations. The condition of affairs in South Africa was grave, excessively grave, commercially, socially, and politically, owing to the Imperial course of proceeding towards South Africa for 30 years past, and notably in the last 10 years—nay, since we gave responsible government to the Cape in 1872—had been of the most serious and embarrassing character. With regard to responsible government, we had pressed it on the Cape, and it was only accepted by a majority of 1. He would confine himself to the national interests involved in the policy which the House was to affirm, or the Government were to adopt and carry out. If he had a policy in his business, he carried it out; and if the Government decided upon a policy, they ought to carry it out. The policy of this country should be consistent with our obligations; and he would confine himself specially to Zululand, for with regard to Bechuanaland quite enough had been said. We were so inconsistent! We were now imperilling Swaziland, to which country the Boers claimed to have a right. The Amaswazis had been always friendly to this country, and they had supplied the men who had enabled Sir Garnet, now Lord, Wolseley to gain the battle against Seco-coeni. They were now likely to be absorbed by the Boers—in the first instance attacked by freebooters from Natal, the Free State, and the Transvaal. The late Government—he would not provoke Party dispute—thought it wise to throw over Cetewayo's friendship, although the Zulus never once had attacked us, but looked to us as their protectors and friends. He remembered the late President of the Transvaal, Mr. Burgers, when he was in this country, living with him (Sir Donald Currie), showing him a letter, which he could find in no Blue Book, sent to that gentleman by the Colonial Minister of the day containing Cetewayo's proposal to Sir Garnet Wolseley to allow him to attack the Boers. He also saw the letter which Sir Garnet Wolseley then wrote, and which also he could not find in any Blue Book, advising him to do nothing of the sort, and Cetewayo refrained; and yet, afterwards, our Government declared war against the Zulus, after arbitration with respect to disputed border grazing lands claimed by the Boers. War broke out, and Cetewayo was beaten; and then what did the Zulus do? Had they ever once since the war turned upon us? With the bravery which characterized them as a nation, they acknowledged they were beaten, and asked us to govern them, and we refused. But that was not all. Not only did we not take care of them, but we handed them over to be ruled by a dozen Chiefs—a policy which had proved an utter failure, as might have been foreseen. Over and over again the Zulus had asked us—both the late and the present Governments—for fair play; but were told by the Colonial Office that we could not interfere, although they had proved to demonstration how unjustly they had been treated, particularly by John Dunn, who it was stated in the Blue Books just published had 1,700 odd Royal cattle as his prize, a short time after the battle of Ulundi. Was that justice to these people? They had asked us to govern them, and Sir Henry Bulwer, it now appeared, had urged upon Lord Derby to arrange for the government of Central Zululand. Three months ago, he (Sir Donald Currie) had asked the Prime Minister in that House whether the Government would take measures to secure good government in Zululand, and to prevent further bloodshed and robbery, out of regard to our credit and honour, for we were largely responsible for the unhappy condition of that country. Talk about Afghanistan and the break up of that country through our interference! The people in Zululand were starving, and many thousands of them had died through starvation and internecine war. This was typical of this phase of our policy—that we interfered in foreign lands, and then left the people to settle their own affairs. That was a cruel policy, and he claimed now, on behalf of the Zulus, that they were entitled to our protection. Sir Henry Bulwer had warned the Government that unless firmness was shown, now that the Boers had joined the Zulus, in a short time most serious dangers would arise to English interests in South Africa. What was to be the effect on the Reserve, now that we had decided to restrict our power there? The population of Natal was some 20,000 Whites, men, women, and children, with 400,000 Natives and refugee Zulus; and if there were to be some 300,000 more thrust in, without any unoccupied land to settle them on, they were going to have, as sure as they lived, in the future, in Zululand much more serious complications than they had in Bechuanaland. He would tell the House what had been said to him by the late President of the Transvaal, when he (Sir Donald Currie) disputed the right of the Boers to interfere with the Swazi tribe. The late President claimed that the Zulus had given a certain power and right to the Boers in the Transvaal in respect to St. Lucia Bay. Now, if the freebooters went to St. Lucia Bay, and if the Germans were to develop still further their claims to Angra Pequena and that district, we should be in this position, that the whole territory, East and West, might come under the influence of those who might be inimical to our interests in South Africa. That was a matter of serious import to us. Seven years ago it was proposed to Prince Bismarck that he should take the Protectorate of the Transvaal. With the French on the Eastern side of South Africa, and in some way or other influential in Madagascar, he wanted to know where was our security for the ocean route to India? And we should bear in mind that the White population in South Africa were estranged by our policy; the Natives would cease to have confidence in us; and the Germans, as well as the French, had interests different from ours. The Prime Minister wrote an article in The Nineteenth Century strongly in favour of the Cape route to India, and he (Sir Donald Currie) attached more importance to that than to the Suez Canal, which, at any moment, might be shut up in a state of war. He thought it would be most difficult for this country to maintain its communications through the Suez Canal if at war with a Naval Power such as France, possessing Tunis on the one side and Toulon on the other. In the event of a war, what was to be the position of this country if they were to be debarred from reaching India and Australiathrough the Canal, or of taking the Cape route in safety? He had no desire to aggravate our dangers by stimulating panic; but he had told his constituents, three years ago, that nothing but a grievous disaster would waken up this country to our naval and military position and the risks to our Colonial and Eastern Empire. Speaking on behalf of the Zulus and South Africans in general—both the Black races and the White—he claimed that the Government, for whom no one in that House would doubt his friendship, should frame and make up their minds to carry out a clear, a firm, and a distinct policy. That claim he made in the national interest. He did not hesitate in Perth, the other day, in closing the speeches which it was his duty to deliver to his constituency on the extension of the franchise, to urge that, by a calm consideration on the part of both Parties, the question of electoral reform might be settled, because there were large and important Imperial questions waiting to be dealt with by that House;

and if Ministers, instead of being wearied to death by fatiguing Questions and unnecessary delays, were allowed time to attend to their business, the Government might then have an opportunity of carrying out a settled policy which would promote the interests of this great Empire.

MR. GUY DAWNAY said, he was well aware that owing to a recent and, as he hoped, culminating atrocity in Bechuanaland, that was the part of South Africa which especially engaged the attention of the country at this moment; but though he hoped later to make some comments on that subject himself, he wished first to touch briefly on matters relating to another portion of the country, which should not be lost sight of in any debate dealing with Boer aggression. He thought that the House must have noticed with some surprise that there was no mention in the Queen's Speech of Zulu matters, no reference to all the mess and muddling and murdering there, and the absence of such mention was emphasized by the special manner in which the South-Western Frontier of the Transvaal had been singled out, as though it was the only portion of South Africa which was to be favoured with that "vigilant attention" which had been so long and hitherto so vainly called for. Before, however, entering into the state of things which existed in that country, he should like to raise his protest against the unfortunate position in which the House was again placed owing to the absence of Papers and Blue Books on the subject. If, at the commencement of last Session, the Papers had been ready and the House had been able to take the discussion on the state of Zululand on the Address, instead of having to postpone it until a later period of the Session, a far more general and adequate interest would have been aroused in the subject, much of the deplorable condition of affairs which now existed might have been prevented; and, certainly, to take one point, Usibepu would never have been allowed to be driven—by the help of the Boers, and after the slaughter of a great portion of his tribe—from the territory which he ruled by our appointment, and in a manner which Sir Henry Bulwer allowed gave him claims on our assistance. It surely might be possible to distribute these Papers a week or more before the Session, in order that

Members might avail themselves of the opportunity—often the only opportunity, always the earliest and most legitimate opportunity—of bringing important questions before the House in the discussions on the Address. He had, for example, only been furnished with Blue Books on South Africa about two hours before the meeting of the House, and they only carried the story down to the 23rd of July. Failing other information, he must trust to the Under Secretary for the Colonies to answer some questions with regard to Zululand. In answer to one that he had addressed to the hon. Gentleman a few days ago, he had been told that the Reserve was in a most “satisfactory” condition. That was easily comprehended when they remembered that the previous “unsatisfactory” state had meant that our Resident Commissioner in the Reserve had had to fight for his life against the Usutus; that on another time a party of our Border Watch had been attacked by Usutus, and out of eight men, three had been killed and three wounded; and, finally, that these Usutus had actually crossed into Natal and had fought with Natal Kaffirs, and in another case had fired on and wounded a Natal Native on Natal soil. They could now hear that the state of the Reserve was more satisfactory, without having to strain their capacity for gratitude to the Government for the comparative order that might now prevail. It was, however, with regard to Usibepu, and the intentions of Her Majesty’s Government towards him, that he especially wished now to inquire. No one could read Lord Derby’s despatch, on the concluding page of the Blue Book, without an uncomfortable suspicion that we had behaved very meanly to that Chief, and the closer the perusal of the preceding pages, the more fully that suspicion would be converted into certainty. As far as he could see, the Colonial Office gathered all their information upon Zulu affairs from and through Sir Henry Bulwer. They accepted his promise, but invariably refused to act upon his conclusions. They refused to listen to him with regard to the restoration of Cetewayo. They refused to listen to his representations with regard to the danger of allowing the Boers to join the Usutu Party against Usibepu; and the consequence was that we had now a new

Boer Republic to deal with, and we had lost the powerful and friendly Chief who would have maintained the balance of Zulu power. As Lord Derby—in order to excuse the meanness of his treatment—had thought fit to make very grave reflections on the conduct of Usibepu, he (Mr. Guy Dawnay) must ask the House to be allowed to call Sir Henry Bulwer to witness to the conduct and character of that Chief, and to the frequency with which the Government had been warned of the injustice and folly of abandoning him. On May 6, Sir Henry Bulwer wrote to Lord Derby in these words—

“If the Boers do join the Usutu Party, it is certain he will not be able to hold his own against such a combination. He will be destroyed, and his destruction will involve that of his people, the finest and bravest in Zululand. His destruction will be wholly undeserved; for whatever may have been said by the Usutu Party, and by those who have so ill-advised that Party, Usibepu took up arms only in self-defence, and to hold the territory which was assigned to him, and with no object of conquest or self-aggrandisement, as has been plainly shown since his success at Ulundi, in July of last year. His destruction will be altogether unmerited, and I do not hesitate to say it will be the greatest misfortune to the Zulu country. A great portion of the country will pass away from the Zulu people, and the remainder, with the exception of the Reserve, will under the Usutu dynasty come sooner or later under the domination of the Boers. On these accounts, then, for the sake of the Reserve, for the sake of Usibepu, and I may say for the sake of the Zulu people themselves, I venture to submit that there should be some interposition on our part.”

On May 8, Sir Henry Bulwer again wrote—

“It will, indeed, be a cruel case, if the Usutus, with the aid of a Boer force, are able to defeat Usibepu. He will not deserve his fate, and his fate will be a reproach upon us in the Native mind which it will not be easy to remove. I would, therefore, trust that some interposition on our part may yet be in time to avert that fate, and the further consequences that will result from it, for there can be no doubt that we shall feel the effect, when once we have lost so brave and loyal a friend of the English Government.”

Three weeks later, then, the Boer alliance was no longer a matter of doubt. Sir Henry Bulwer made a final appeal for action on the part of the Government—

“The position in which Usibepu is placed by the alliance of the Boers with the Usutus, and by the declaration of their intention to attack him should he not recognize Dinuzulu, is indeed deplorable. He appeals—and he has some claim to appeal—to us for our assistance, but we are unable to give him any."

Finally, after Usibepu had been routed by the Boers, and his tribe given up to slaughter at the hands of the Usutus, Sir Henry Bulwer made a final remonstrance to Lord Derby, on June 16—

"It is impossible to regard without feelings of the greatest pain and concern the ruin that has thus been brought upon the Chief Usibepu. He was placed and left in the position of an independent Chief by us. He has always looked upon himself as belonging to the Government, and has always shown himself a loyal friend to the Government. Immediately after Cetewayo's restoration he became, because of his independence, the object of the fiercest hate of the Usutu leaders. His territory was invaded by a formidable Usutu force two months after Cetewayo's restoration. The invaders were driven back with prodigious loss. But the event was the beginning of a long series of conflicts which ended in the destruction of Ulundi and the flight of Cetewayo. That Usibepu punished and spoiled those who attacked him is unquestionable; but he never sought to take advantage of his successes or to extend his rule. His desire was to be left alone and in peace in the territory over which he had been placed, and when he was forced into action it was, with few exceptions, to resist the intrigues and attacks directed against him. Had we taken over Central Zululand for the benefit of the Zulu people, we should have found no more loyal neighbour or supporter than Usibepu. But we hesitated to do this; we left the country to take its chances. We left it in confusion and disorder, and the Usutus have made a bargain with the Boers which has brought about, on the plea of the restoration of order, this most undeserved fate on the head of a Chief who has proved himself to possess as chivalrous and gallant a nature as the history of the Zulu nation can show."

As he had said, no one could read these despatches without coming to the conclusion that we had behaved very meanly towards that Chief. What were Lord Derby's excuses for his refusal to listen to Sir Henry Bulwer? That—

"Usibepu had often acted on his own responsibility. His recent defeat was the consequence of his victory in 1883, and of his ambitious projects of the present year, and Her Majesty's Government has never entered into any engagement to aid or to defend him."

He (Mr. Guy Dawnay) denied that the recent defeat was the result of the victory in 1883. It was the result of being forbidden to follow up that victory, and because the Reserve had been used against him, as it was not allowed to be used by him, as a "focus for intrigues and plans of future retaliation." Lord Derby next asserted that the position in which Usibepu found himself "was the consequence of his ambitious projects;" but he (Mr. Guy Dawnay) should like very much to ask the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, what were the "ambitious projects of the present year" to which Lord Derby referred? What proof was there of any such thing? All he (Mr. Guy Dawnay) had been able to find in the Blue Book was the statement that a few days after the death of Cetewayo, and after he had just defeated two attacks of Usutus, he asked to be allowed to hold the ground he was then occupying in consequence of his defensive victories. When he was told that he could not be allowed to hold it, he at once acquiesced in the refusal. Therefore, one thing was quite clear—namely, that however much Her Majesty's Government might repudiate all responsibility in reference to him, they had, when it suited their purpose, never shrunk from exercising control over him. He admitted that, as was said in the despatch, Her Majesty's Government had never entered into any formal agreement to defend him if he were attacked, or assist him, and he never required any aid to defend himself against the Zulu Chiefs; but it was an undisputed fact that Her Majesty's Government had entered into a solemn engagement with the Boers that the Eastern Frontier of the Transvaal should not be violated by an invasion of Zululand; and they were bound, under the exceptional nature of the agreement, to see that that paragraph of the Convention was kept, and it was to the fact of their having permitted that engagement to be violated with impunity, that Usibepu owed his defeat, and not to any inability to hold his position as a Zulu Chief amongst the Zulus. Unless Her Majesty's Government put forward some better form of argument than the bare and unsupported assertions contained in Lord Derby's despatch, he maintained that the refusal to grant Usibepu any assistance or moral support could only be classed with the refusal to help Montsioa, and could only be looked upon as most discreditable to this country; and he was afraid that eventually this cowardly conduct on our part would entail upon us the same punishment, and be revenged upon the British taxpayer. He should also like to know what the views of the Government were as to the Proclamation of Dinazulu and Mr. Grant, and the cession of land to the Boers; and whether they considered, as Sir Hercules Robinson did, it was a mere attempt on the part of the Boers to repeat the story of Stellaland in Zululand; and whether, in that case, it was to be treated with remonstrance alone, or whether they would have to wait another 18 months before they heard that the "vigilant attention" of Her Majesty's Government was directed at last to the Eastern borders of Boerland? He need not say that he had not changed the views which he expressed in the debate on this question three months ago; but he did not know whether the Government had or had not retreated from the position—the indefensible position, as he considered it—which they had then taken in regard to the amount of their responsibility to the Zulus. He would only say that his opinions had had since then the endorsement of Sir Henry Bulwer, had been confirmed by subsequent facts, and he was afraid would also be justified by future events. He now desired to say a few words about the South-Western borders of the Transvaal, to which public attention had been called in so special a manner, owing to the horrible and inhuman circumstances attending the brutal murder of a gallant gentleman and a British officer. The word "murder" did not, in any adequate manner, describe the atrocity of those who did Mr. Bethell to death. It was not an act committed under the influence of any of those evil passions which ordinarily led to crime. Even among some savage nations a wounded and unresisting enemy excited a natural pity and sympathy; but to those brutes in human form, whose vileness and lust of blood and pillage they had so long allowed to reign supreme in Bechuana-land, a wounded officer lying helpless before them was but an unresisting prey on whom, with the greater security to their own cowardly carcasses, they could wreak their hatred of Englishmen, and the innate brutality of their nature. He agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for York in his belief that Mr. Bethell, gallant as he was, and eager as he was in the cause of the Bechuanaas, would have thought his life well given, if his death could serve to win, as he thought it had served to win, public attention to this question. It would indeed, be matter for the very deepest satisfaction, if they could only believe that the Government did seriously intend now to put their foot down, and had made up their minds at last to stand at bay, and to show to these Boers that there was a limit even to the humiliation to which we would allow ourselves to be subjected, and a limit to the outrages which we would permit to be inflicted upon our helpless Bechuana allies. He said "if they could believe;" but they could not but remember that paragraph in the Queen's Speech in 1881, in which, with all the authority and solemnity of a Speech from the Throne, in the most distinct and unambiguous language, it was announced that the Queen's authority should be vindicated. And they also recollected that that vindication meant Majuba Hill and the Convention between a beaten country and the victorious Boers. He could not, in passing, help saying that it would have been better for his own reputation, for the credit of this country, as well as for the happiness of many a bereaved and ruined home, if, before penning that paragraph in 1881, the Prime Minister had recollected a passage which he had been ready enough to remember on a recent, and, as it seemed to him, less decent occasion—

"Beware

Of entrance to a quarrel; but, being in,
Bear't that the opposed may beware of thee."

He wondered that the Prime Minister could, with the memory of Majuba in his mind, have dared to quote, and threaten with, those words. They could not but recollect also that, in the autumn of 1881, the Prime Minister, speaking at Leeds, speaking with all the authority of his position as Prime Minister, declared urbi et orbi—

"Those men were mistaken, if such there were, who believed that because the Government had granted much to the Boers, it was to encourage them to ask for more."

And they must remember that that announcement but heralded by a certain number of months the surrender of our Suzerainty over the Transvaal, and the fresh farce of replacing by a new and equally worthless piece of paper the tattered shreds of the old Convention. When these facts were remembered, he thought that they might be acquitted of any very blameworthy want of trust in Her Majesty's Ministers, or in the value of the present announcement, if they read without any exaggerated confidence that after repeated insults, after repeated violations of the Convention, after repeated acts of murder and depredation committed by the Boers, Her Majesty's Government had at last been so far stung and goaded to action that they had promised to give these matters their "vigilant attention." It was not these repeated insults that had aroused the Government. They had borne them with somewhat monotonous humility, and with more than Christian forbearance. It had not been the repeated breaches of the Convention, which the Boers seemed to have considered was made to give them greater opportunities to defy this country. It was not repeated acts of outrage, pillage, and murder—it was not even the brutal murder of a British officer in cold blood that had aroused the Colonial Office. Those at the Colonial Office would be more than human if, by this time, they could help having grown callous to the reports of such chronic crime. It was not this that had awakened the Government from their dishonourable lethargy and inaction; it was the voice of the people of this country, and of our most distant and far-separated Colonies; it was that feeling of indignation which had been excited in every English-speaking, English-feeling breast; it was that feeling which had been evoked by the eloquence, the sincerity, and patriotism of his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), and of others who had dared to be as patriotic and as manly as himself. That was the real motive power in this matter, as well as the perception that not only was our honour at stake, but—and it was a very serious, though he trusted a secondary consideration—that our trade interests were also involved, and very seriously threatened. It was a point absolutely beyond contradiction that if the Boers in any manner once gained a footing in Bechuanaland, they would gain an entire control of the whole of the interior trade of Africa south of the Zambesi. Let any Government which so wantonly threw over the interests of our trade in that country reckon with the depressed artisans in our manufacturing towns. There was an old saying which they had often heard, and which, he thought, there was no disposition to contradict, that "Trade follows the flag." The flag of this country, as they knew but too well, had lately been obliged to be buried and concealed in Bechuanaland to save it from insult from the Boers. Trade would but too surely follow—he feared he might say was but too surely following that flag, and had already shown signs of diminution and decay—dying of our dishonour. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford had shown a desire to raise this question from the narrow, low level of Party politics. He (Mr. Guy Dawnay) would be glad if that could be done; but, after our previous experience on this subject, he was afraid it would, at least, be very hard so to raise it. This policy of the Government in reference to the Transvaal afforded no isolated instance of the action of the Government which they condemned. It was merely the most notorious instance of that "squeezability" which had, in fact, led to the coining of the word to express so constant an element in the Government policy—to designate that yielding to pressure which had distinguished—he would say which had disfigured—the whole page of their history. They had never, as a Party, wearied of pointing out the fatal results of this policy of surrender; and the very action of the Government at present—their doing in the autumn of 1884 what they had been begged to do—what they had been warned against not doing in the spring of 1883—was a sufficient witness to the justice of their criticism. On the other hand, those who ordinarily ranked themselves as the supporters of the Government had, with one or two notable and most honourable exceptions, ranked themselves as readily on this Transvaal question as on other points under the flag of their Party Chief, and had identified themselves with, and made themselves responsible for, the South African scheme. If ever there was a question in which Party feeling should be sunk, and in which national feeling should alone prevail, it was a great Imperial question like the present. On this question he believed there was staked, not only the fate of South Africa, but the future of our whole Colonial Empire. By their past action the Government had not only degraded and humiliated the name of England in the eyes of the Natives, by what they considered tame submission to defeat, by what was cowardly repudiation of our alliances, and abandonment of our Allies. They had not only taught the Boers that the Convention which they won at the muzzle of the rifle was but a term intended to save the conscience and soothe the ear of those hon. Members who supported the Government, and who preferred the idea of signing a Convention to that of suing for peace; they had not only further taught them, in the words of the President of the Board of Trade, that the "Convention would not prevent its provisions being reconsidered, if they should prove at any time offensive to the Boers;" that it would not prevent the granting of a new Convention, to be again, in its turn, whittled into nothingness. It was not only that; but their past action had tended to show to all our Colonies throughout the world that for them the tide of Empire had turned, that the ebb of Empire had commenced, that the honour of England had become a matter of Votes and Budgets, and that Colonial loyalty and love for the Mother Country was only prized when it could be had on easy terms of gratis affection, without the chance of responsibility accruing in return. In conclusion, he would only ask the House to allow him to read a few words of a letter from Mr. Mackenzie recording the words addressed to him by a Bechuana Native, as they contained the best and briefest advice that could be offered to the Government. The letter was written by Mr. Mackenzie from Vryburg in Stellaland on July 23 to a correspondent in England, and the paragraph he wished to bring to their notice was as follows:—

"I assure you the name of the Queen is still prized in many a hamlet in Bechuanaland. (It is wonderful it should be so.) One Chief, who, it had been said by the Boers in England, wanted to live under the rule of the Transvaal, sent a letter to meet me many miles from his town, to declare that he, too, would be under the Queen. 'Yours is by far the best Government' said another gray-headed man; 'but you have one great fault—you always go away when we want you most—Do not go away again.'"

Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY said, that South African debates were apt to be discursive, and he did not think that this discussion had been an exception to the rule, as he had been quite overwhelmed by the different questions referring to all parts of the world which he was called upon to deal with. He was also confronted by a great deal of inconsistency on the part of various speakers, and in no speech more so than in the eloquent one they had just heard. In that speech they had been appealed to to treat this matter simply and solely from the national and patriotic point of view; and yet that appeal had been prefaced and followed by as bitter an attack upon the Government for what it had done as any Party attack that had ever been made. Hon. Members ought not to take credit for appealing to the House to make a question a national and patriotic one, at the same time that they themselves made it a Party question. A crumb of comfort, however, he had, and that was that in none of the speeches had any fault been found with the action of the Government at the present moment, or since the last discussion that had taken place on South African affairs, with the exception that it was said they had not given sufficient support to Mr. Mackenzie; and, therefore, he said the Government really and truly found themselves pretty well in accord with the House of Commons in the policy they were adopting. ["Oh, oh!"] In answer to the complaint of the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Holland), he would repeat that he was exceedingly sorry that the Papers were not before the House; but he would point out to the hon. Member—and though he (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) was speaking as a comparatively young Member of the House, yet he was corroborated in what he was going to say by the authority of the Prime Minister—that it was a mistake to suppose that the occasion of the discussion on the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne was to be looked upon as the opportunity for an exhaustive discussion on matters alluded to in the Speech. If it were to be so regarded, they must change the Rules and Regulations of the House with regard to printing. It had been said that the printing might have been done in the Recess; but no printing could be done in the House except by order of the officers of the House, and that could not be done when the House was not sitting. As far as the Colonial Office was concerned, they had done the best they could. If they were to consider in future that exhaustive debates were to take place on the Address upon Papers laid on the Table the day the House met, then they must alter the Rules which regulated the production of Papers. Before entering on the general question, he wished to say a few words about the speech of the hon. Baronet the Member for York City (Sir Frederick Milner), who had spoken as to the death of Mr. Bethell. He should be very sorry to allude to that subject without saying that he considered that gentleman had shown a gallantry and pluck quite worthy of the admiration of everyone. It was clear that he had lost his life mainly by having waited behind to endeavour to save the life of a Native struck down by his side. Although it could not, of course, alter the brutal character of the treatment to which he was afterwards subjected by the filibusters, still it might be some consolation to the relatives of that gentleman to say that anyone who had read the account must say that his first wound must have been mortal, and that his life could not have been saved, even if the second shot had not been fired. He would now proceed to defend the Government against the charge of apathy and delay which had been brought against them. He denied emphatically that the Colonial Office had shown any apathy in the matter, or that there had been unnecessary delay in taking steps to secure the apprehension of the murderers. What the hon. Baronet the Member for York City did not sufficiently realize was this—that if Her Majesty's Government were going to make a demand for the punishment or extradition of the murderers, they must know who they were, and be prepared with evidence to convict them, and to satisfy the Power to which they were making the request. Now, he asserted positively that, until this month, the Colonial Government did not know, and he did not believe that anyone in the country knew, that even the names of the murderers were known. Until that information was received, the mere knowledge that Mr. Bethell had been killed, and by unfair means, was not a ground on which they could approach any Government, and say—"We demand the extradition of the murderers." The answer, of course, would have been—"Who is it that you want?" They were now in a position to name the murderers, and prove who they were, and their guilt. It had been said, as an imputation against him, that he had talked about the legal difficulties that might arise. He would not enlarge upon that, because he did not wish to be told that he was putting arguments in the mouth of the Transvaal Government. As a matter of fact, the question was not a simple one; it was very complicated, the territory on which Mr. Bethell was killed being neither British nor Transvaal territory. It was clear that the tribunals of the Transvaal would not be competent to try the case; and after the experience gained in the trial of Captain Elliot's murderers, he thought it just as well that the Transvaal tribunals should not try the case. There were similar difficulties in the way of extradition; and, in fact, the whole question was full of complications. His own opinion was that the best way to obtain justice would probably be to instruct the Commander of our Forces to get hold of them, and try them by court martial, for acts contrary to the usages of civilized warfare, when he should arrive in the locality. Whether that course should be taken or not was a question which other and different authorities must decide. Coming to the question of the Treaty, he had first to refer to two speakers that day, who had called upon the Government to account for the speeches of the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney), and the tentative opinions expressed therein. Well, he was not bound to answer for that hon. Member; but this he would say—that doubtless the Secretary to the Treasury was the only occupant of the Front Ministerial Bench who held the opinions which he had expressed. Now, as he had said, the great point that had been made by the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst, in the course of the debate, was that Her Majesty's Government had not sufficiently supported Mr. Mackenzie. He heard with pleasure the sentence in the speech of the hon. Baronet the Member for York City in which he said that they ought to trust to the advice of people on the spot. That was exactly what they had done on this occasion. Ever since Mr. Mackenzie had been sent out they had consistently acted on Sir Hercules Robinson's advice, and they had not refused any request which he had made. The maximum police force said by Sir Hercules Robinson to be necessary was 100 men, and he had never recommended an increase in that number. The hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst referred to the telegram received on July 2 from Sir Hercules Robinson, in which he said—"Please authorize Treasury Chest to supply another £5,000 when required." As a matter of fact, the answer to the hon. Member's strictures in connection with that request was that it was complied with at once—the £5,000 was sent to Sir Hercules Robinson 10 days afterwards—a period which only afforded time enough to set the Treasury in motion.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND: That does not appear from the Papers.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: No. Then the hon. Member stated that no answer was given to the question asked by Sir Hercules Robinson in his telegram of June 26, in which he said—

"In this case the invasion, if it takes place, will be an act of impudent defiance of British authority, and the invaders should, I think, be expelled and punished at any risk or cost. Do you concur?"

The hon. Member said that the Government gave no answer to that.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND explained that he had said that an answer was given, but an unsatisfactory one.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, that the answer which was sent by Lord Derby was as follows:—

"Her Majesty's Government approve your communication to the Government of the South African Republic, as well as the instructions which you have given to Mr. Mackenzie on the subject;"

the instructions given by Sir Hercules Robinson to Mr. Mackenzie being such as authorized him to form a Native Force sufficient to expel the marauders. The fact was that the break-down of the police arrangements was not owing to any neglect on the part of the Government to comply at once with the recommendations of Sir Hercules Robinson. It arose from a variety of difficulties, and among them was this—that the police force was not really established up to its proper strength until the early part of July. Why the delay occurred he could not quite ascertain; but, no doubt, there were difficulties in the way of the establishment, and, above all, of the mounting and transport of the force sufficient to account for it. If, however,

Mr. Mackenzie could have brought that force up to Montsioa's territory before the attack took place, the result would probably have been very different. It was not the fault of the Government that the police were not at Montsioa's side at the time, and he dared say it was not Mr. Mackenzie's fault either. Although it was disagreeable in that House ever to say anything against a man who was dead, he could not help expressing the opinion that Mr. Bethell's excess of valour caused him to be precipitate, and to hurry on a fight which it would have been more politic to postpone. There was, in fact, a statement to the effect that Montsioa sent to Mr. Bethell and told him not to fight, but that he insisted on doing so. Mr. Bethell had no policemen with him at the time, his force being composed of Native levies only. The Rooi-Gronders were, of course, anxious to precipitate the fight before the police arrived; and with that view they paraded the stolen cattle in front of Montsioa's laager, in order to entice him out. If, as he (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) wished, Mr. Bethell had been a little less brave, and if he had resisted the temptation put before him, and had waited until Mr. Mackenzie could have sent up the police force, the result would have been very different. There was really no other point for him to answer; but what he thought the House had a right to expect from him was that, as shortly as possible, he should give a statement of the line which the Government had taken in connection with the principal events since the House rose for the Recess, and what the present position of affairs was. Members would recollect that when the House rose Mr. Mackenzie had been out some time, and that the Government were receiving accounts daily of the threatened attack upon Montsioa by the freebooters; but no attack had absolutely taken place. The precipitate attack made by them upon Montsioa's forces and the death of Mr. Bethell happened on the 31st of July, after Mr. Mackenzie's visit to Montsioa, and the news reached this country just about the time the House rose for the Recess. Then the Transvaal Government came forward and sent Commander Joubert to the frontier. About that time also Mr. Rhodes had been sent up by Sir Hercules Robinson, the High Commissioner. Mr. Rhodes had been appointed at first temporarily, but afterwards permanently, to replace Mr. Mackenzie, who, about the beginning of August, had been called by Sir Hercules Robinson to Cape Town. With reference to the resignation of Mr. Mackenzie, he wished to say a word or two. Mr. Mackenzie had been selected by the Colonial Office, with the consent and advice of Sir Hercules Robinson, to go out there as a man who was, in their opinion, in many respects extremely well fitted for the task. Nothing Mr. Mackenzie had done, or which had been brought against him, altered the opinion that he was well fitted for the task. Of course, it was possible to find two or three errors that he might have committed; but this was incident to the career of everyone. He maintained, however, that anything Mr. Mackenzie had done, or anything which had been brought against him, had not shaken his (Mr. Evelyn Ashley's) belief that he was a man who might have done very valuable service, and that he was the best man they could have selected for the post. But Mr. Mackenzie had this one great defect, that he was not a persona grata to the Cape Ministry. As soon as the Cape Ministers officially declared by Minutes and communications to Sir Hercules Robinson that the permanence of Mr. Mackenzie as our Commissioner to Bechuanaland was an obstacle to their going forward, an obstacle to their action, Mr. Mackenzie, with the highest possible feeling, and with a sense of what was right and proper and for the good of the country, tendered his resignation of the office to Sir Hercules Robinson. What Mr. Mackenzie said was this. In his letter to Sir Hercules Robinson he denied being imbued with the prejudices imputed to him, and enlarged on the desire that he had shown to take a wide view of matters, to do justice to all parties and to all interests; but he said that, inasmuch as the Colonial Ministers regarded his continuance in office as a most serious obstacle, if not the only obstacle, to the maintenance of the peace of the Protectorate, he desired to remove that barrier, and with that object he tendered his resignation of the office of Deputy Commissioner in Bechuanaland. Sir Hercules Robinson, in his despatch, said that he thought the reasons which influenced Mr. Mackenzie in taking this step were sound, and he complimented Mr. Mackenzie on the earnest and unselfish spirit which had induced him to undertake the difficulties of establishing the Protectorate in Bechuanaland. In these matters it was of the highest importance that they should work hand in hand, where they possibly could, with the authorities of one of the largest Colonies. Well, Mr. Rhodes had been sent up by Sir Hercules Robinson, on the resignation of Mr. Mackenzie, to meet Commander Joubert on the borders of Goshenland. Having come as Deputy Commissioner, Mr. Rhodes attempted to arrange terms with Montsioa and the freebooters; but having found that the demands of the Goshenite people were unreasonable, exorbitant, and contrary to justice and right, and that even while he was there as Ambassador for the High Commissioner an attack had been made on Montsioa's territory, he had been compelled to leave them with a warning that they were attacking people who were under the protection of Great Britain, and that he would not in any sense be a party to the making of an arrangement. He therefore left, warning them of the consequences. Mr. Rhodes came back and communicated with Sir Hercules Robinson, who had endeavoured to settle also, as far as he could, the hostilities in the Stellaland district. Next, they came to the action of the Transvaal Government, because it was there, for the first time, that the Transvaal Government came upon the scene. After the attack made on Montsioa by the freebooters, that Chief was reduced to a very bad state, having lost a large number of men. Then it was that the Transvaal Government came to his aid, and offered to relieve him from the attacks of those freebooters on condition that he came under the jurisdiction of the Transvaal. He needed not to take up the time of the House by giving any details as to what the condition of Montsioa was; but the House might take it that Montsioa was absolutely an unwilling agent — that he was absolutely commanded by his defenceless condition to come to an agreement with the Transvaal Government. Thereupon the Transvaal Government sent a telegram to Her Majesty's Government, saying that they had taken steps to restore and maintain peace by taking Montsioa under their protection. The Colonial Office put themselves in immediate communication with the Cape authorities, and with Sir Hercules Robinson, wishing to know what was the true state of matters, and what was the view of the Cape Government. In consequence of the communications they received and the information they obtained, they had desired Sir Hercules Robinson, as High Commissioner, to call upon the Government of the South African Republic to disallow their recent acts as being an entire and absolute violation of the Convention of 1884. That those acts were so was, to his (Mr. Evelyn Ashley's) mind, too clear for argument. The result of this communication was that the Transvaal Government at once withdrew the Proclamation establishing a Protectorate over this territory, and very shortly afterwards the Transvaal Volksraad was summoned to ratify the withdrawal of that Proclamation, so that they had not, therefore, any longer to do, ostensibly or openly, with the Transvaal Government. The freebooters, however, were still in possession of the territory; and Her Majesty's Government, remembering that this was the Protectorate which had been invaded by these men, considered only one settlement of this question possible—that force should be used to remove those men from that territory. Her Majesty's Government had been acting in accord with the Cape Government, and the Cape Government had asked their sanction, during the time the military preparations were being made, to go to the territory of Montsioa and see whether, by their personal influence, they could arrange terms without fighting and bloodshed. Of course, Her Majesty's Government would never like to leave any stone unturned to obtain the legitimate objects they had in view without fighting; and, therefore, they had signified to the Ministers at the Cape that, while they would not relax the preparations they were making, they would not oppose any obstacle to the Cape Ministers going to Bechuanaland, and seeing what they could do, provided it was thoroughly understood that no settlement could be made without the consent and approval of Her Majesty's Government, and that Her Majesty's Government would not give their consent and approval to any settlement which did not unreservedly imply that none of the freebooters should remain in possession of Montsioa's territory without the express sanction of the High Commissioner. The position, therefore, was this—the Transvaal Government having, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, broken the Convention, had been called upon to retrace their steps. On that call being received, they did retrace their steps; and the Government having, therefore, only to deal now with the irregular freebooters on the Border, were preparing to send a force to coerce them, and while that force was being prepared the Cape Ministers were trying their hand at peaceful negotiations. They knew that Sir Charles Warren, as he informed the House yesterday, was going out; indeed, they might count on his going out within a very short time—in about a fortnight. The details of the forces Sir Charles Warren would have at his disposal were being settled by the War Office; and the House might be certain they would be perfectly adequate to the object the Government had in view. He did not think there was any other information it was necessary he should give to the House; because it would be more fully and accurately given in the Papers which would shortly be in the hands of Members. He wished, however, to say a word or two in regard to the speech of the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Wodehouse) and the speeches of the hon. Member for Perthshire (Sir Donald Currie) and other hon. Members on the question of Zululand. The fallacy upon which he ventured to submit so many speeches went, which found fault with the Government for not doing last year, or the year before, what they were doing now, was this—that last year and the year before not only was the case not by any means so clear, or the needs so great; but last year and the year before there were elements of danger in precipitate action which he ventured to say the patience and care of Her Majesty's Government had eliminated. The antagonism between the Dutch and English-speaking portion of the South African Races was, he had repeatedly stated, one of the greatest dangers and difficulties which, in their transactions in South Africa, the present, as well as the late, Government had to guard against. They might talk about the sum of money the Government might have to spend now in the course they were going to take; but how much money, and how much more than even money's worth, would have been the cost to this country and the Colony if, by any precipitate action, they had brought about a quarrel of races. That was a very distinct and a very great danger, when they were urged in former periods by hon. Members opposite to take more active and violent measures. What was now our position? By their patience, by their waiting, by their determination to show that they were ready to employ every means in their power before resorting to force; and, further, by waiting till the case was so clear and so distinct in regard to the attitude taken by the Transvaal Government and others that it could not be justified, the Government had succeeded in this—that they had, openly at any rate, a perfectly unanimous feeling in the Cape Colony. He considered that was a result which it was worth while to wait a long time for, and which was a result which they would not have got had they precipitated their action as some hon. Members urged them to do. The Cape Government had in September endorsed, in a telegram which would be found in the Papers, in every way the action of Her Majesty's Government. The telegram was so important that he should like to give an extract from it, because it was really a great tribute to what patience and perseverance could do, to have a Dutch Ministry in Cape Town sending to Her Majesty's Government such a telegram as that. It was received on the 24th of September, and stated—

"Ministers express their opinion that decisive measures should be now taken for the maintenance of British authority."

If hon. Members only knew what had been the feeling in South Africa ever since the first annexation of the Transvaal among the Afriander Race, who now for the first time had a Ministry in Cape Town, with Mr. Hoffmeyer, the head of the Afriander Party, as the man who controlled that Ministry, they would know what a great event it was to have the Afriander Party asserting that they wished to secure the maintenance of British authority. The object of the Afriander Party up to this time had been rather to weaken than to establish British authority, and to establish the authority of the Dutch-speaking population. The telegram went on to say—

"The Ministers believe that in taking such a course the Imperial Government will be thoroughly supported by Her Majesty's subjects of every nationality in this Colony."

He wanted to know, if the Government had taken the steps last year which they were urged to do by some hon. Members, whether any responsible body of men in Cape Town could have telegraphed them to say that they would be thoroughly supported by Her Majesty's subjects of every nationality in the Colony? They certainly would not have had that support; but he was glad to see from the accounts in the newspapers that meetings were being held in the Cape Colony to support the action of Her Majesty's Government in that respect. The hon. Member for the North Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Guy Dawnay) drew attention to the question of Zululand. While thinking that time would not allow him and them now to discuss the affairs of that country as well as Bechuanaland, he had nothing further to add to what he had already said with respect to it, except to repeat that Her Majesty's Government had carried out the intention they announced in the House, that they would maintain intact the Reserve. The Reserve was now in a perfectly quiet and secure condition. The hon. Member spoke a great deal about Usibepu's claims on the Government. He (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) did not know that the claims of that Chief were more than the claims of any other bold Chief in South Africa who had been loyal and brave. Usibepu was a strong man, and had shown himself friendly to Her Majesty's Government; but would hon. Members say that they should now send a force to Usibepu's territory, in order to support him and keep him on his throne? The Zulu question was not one, as the hon. Member said, involving any violation of the Convention by the Transvaal Government. It was totally different from the Bechuanaland question in that respect. The frontier of Zululand had not been violated by the Government of the Transvaal; but that violation had occurred through the invitation of the Zulus themselves. He was also asked whether the Government would appoint a Resident Commissioner in that territory, and whether they would look after the Swazis? They had, by the Convention, a right, if they chose, to appoint a Commissioner on the Zulu Frontier; but it was not likely, while the Zulus were themselves in a state of internecine war, as they had been, that the Government should ask the Commissioner to go and take up his residence on that frontier. The Zulus were an independent people, and all these demands that the Government should interfere, and prevent this and that going on on the frontier, and that they should defend Usibepu against Oham, or Oham against Usibepu, really reduced themselves to the old story of whether we should annex that territory.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH : What about the Reserve?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, the Reserve was as near being annexed as anything they could imagine. As to the question put by the right hon. Gentleman the Lord Mayor, his right hon. Friend, if he looked at the Convention, would see that there was no question whatever of allowing the Transvaal Government to communicate with Foreign Powers except through the High Commissioner. There was a specific Article in the Convention which said that no Treaty should be made by the Transvaal Government with any Foreign Power or any Native Tribe, except the Orange Free State, without having the consent of Her Majesty's Government. He ventured to say, in conclusion, that hon. Members, however much they might be disposed to criticize this, that, and the other, and to say—although he denied it—that they might have acted last year, or the year before, as they had acted now, would be inclined to acknowledge, in the words of one of the speakers, that the Government had at last laid before the House a clear and distinct policy, and announced what they intended to do. Having cleared Bechuanaland of the freebooters, and restored the status quo, then would come the question in regard to the future of the territory. One hon. Member had thrown doubt upon the prospect of the Cape undertaking the government of the country. He (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) did not himself have any such doubt. The active element in the Cape would, in his opinion, be anxious to take over Bechuanaland, in order that the Imperial power should not be established, because they would rather see the country under the control of the Cape. But however the future might turn out, it was quite clear they had before them a very clear course, and they would require no exhortation from hon. Members opposite to persist in that course. Any delay or hesitation that might have taken place had been amply compensated for by an upright and consistent policy; and he trusted and believed that although we might be obliged to send out a large and efficient force to that country, no real blow would have to be struck, and that we should be able by that force to vindicate our rights and the British Protectorate without having to spill any blood whatever.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH : I think the majority of the House will scarcely be of opinion that the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) has been entirely successful in his vindication of the policy of Her Majesty's Government. He commenced his speech by a complaint that we were asked to discuss this subject at a time when it could not be exhaustively discussed. If that is so, it is not our fault. We have felt the importance and the pressing nature of this matter so strongly that it is impossible for us to delay the discussion on South African affairs to that remote date when it shall please Her Majesty's Government to give us the Papers. I am bound to say that I think the excuse which the hon. Gentleman gave for the present imperfect state of information in which Parliament and the country have been left on this subject was by no means worthy of him or of the Government. In these matters it is always the case that where there is a will there is a way. If a serious attempt had been made by the Colonial Office to place the Papers in the hands of Members at the meeting of Parliament, I venture to say that it could have been done. To the best of my recollection, when there was an Autumn Session in a previous year, the Papers on Afghanistan were in the hands of Members some weeks before the House met. The hon. Gentleman has also complained that the hon. Member for the North Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Guy Dawnay), while declining to treat this matter as a Party question, devoted the whole of his speech to an attack on the policy of Her Majesty's Government. I am sure that anyone who looks at the course of this debate will see that it is impossible for any hon. Member to discuss this question without attacking the policy of Her Majesty's Government. Why, Sir, the most forcible attacks on the Government were made by two of their most staunch supporters—the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Wodehouse), and the hon. Member for Perthshire (Sir Donald Currie). The hon. Member for Bath spoke with an authority and ability on the subject that can hardly be surpassed in this House; and, as everyone knows, the hon. Member for Perthshire possesses a peculiar knowledge of, and interest in, the commercial, social, and political state of South Africa. When hon. Members such as those attack the policy of the Government, I do think it rather unfair to charge hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House with treating this as a Party question, because, with all goodwill, my hon. Friend has been utterly unable to make his speech anything but an attack on the policy of the Government. The hon. Member has stated that the Government are completely in accord with the House of Commons as to their policy. Hitherto we have been quite unable to ascertain that the Government had any policy at all; and if the matter had rested where it was left by the paragraph in the Queen's Speech, which stated that Her Majesty's Government were giving vigilant attention to their engagements, and were considering the means that might be required to secure the faithful observation of the Convention, the Opposition could not in justice to their opinion have passed over the subject without proposing an Amendment to the Address. It has, however, since been definitely announced that the Government had gone far beyond vigilant attention and consideration in this matter, and that they were preparing, under the leadership of Sir Charles Warren, an expedition of considerable magnitude in South Africa. It has been suggested that there is an alternative; that the Government of the Cape Colony have offered their services; and that Her Majesty's Government have agreed that the Cape Government shall attempt to settle the matter by peaceful negotiations. I am not desirous of interference by this country in the affairs of South Africa beyond what is absolutely necessary. Such interference has resulted in the past, and may still more result in the future, in much more harm and danger to ourselves, to the Cape Colony, and even to the Natives, than would have occurred had we left them to settle matters for themselves; but this is a case in which we are bound by most definite obligations and engagements to bear Imperial responsibilities and carry them out. This could not be left to be settled by the Cape Government, unless it was made perfectly clear that that Government, in settling it, would fulfil to the utmost the obligations into which this country entered when it assumed the Protectorate over the Native Tribes in Bechuanaland. I am as anxious as anyone in this House can be to act in harmony with the Cape Government in this matter; and I think I may say that no one can better appreciate the advantage of such harmony than I do. But if I refer to the debate in the Cape Parliament, after which the Resolution proposing to negotiate for the annexation of Bechuanaland to the Cape Colony was passed, I am sorry to say that I do not see in the speeches made in that debate, and in the spirit which animated the Members of the Cape Parliament, any ground for a strong hope that our obligations to the Native Chiefs will be carried out by the Cape Government. In the speech of one person of considerable importance—namely, Mr. Rhodes, the late Commissioner—what do I find? He is reported to have said that he had been told that one of the chief reasons for desiring to retain this country was that it was looked upon as a good land for the Colonial farmers, and that they ought not to lose such a splendid opportunity of developing the country north of the Orange River; that it was practically destitute of Natives, there being no more than 20,000 souls in all; and that the Cape Colony would obtain enormous assets in the shape of Crown lands. Reading these expressions, and others still stronger, uttered in the Cape Parliament, I venture to say that unless Her Majesty's Government are very careful in the matter they will not be fulfilling their responsibilities to the Native Tribes by leaving them in the hands of the Cape Colony. Then, what do Her Majesty's Government propose to do, if, as is possible, judging from the character of these freebooters, the Cape Government cannot settle this question peacefully? They propose what is a very serious matter—namely, to send a large military expedition to remove these freebooters by force. No one will appreciate the gravity of this proposal more than the Prime Minister himself, who, in March, 1883, when he had charged the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) with a desire to initiate a war in South Africa, used these words—

"My right hon. Friend urges us to undertake what I shall take leave to designate as a war which is 1,100 miles from the base of our operations. My right hon. Friend does not take into view the fact that in these former wars we had facilities for carrying them on by the aid of the sea, which made the conveyance of supplies a work of comparative ease. This is a proposal to march 1,100 miles into a country with respect to which we should have the aid of a railway for the shortest part of the way, but which, with regard to the rest, everything would have to be done over miserable roads. . . . Sir, I believe the enormous efforts, risks, and uncertainties of the expedition which my right hon. Friend contemplates, and would put at the back of his earnest remonstrances, are entirely out of proportion to the objects that are in view, or to the ends that he could possibly achieve. It is true my right hon. Friend says—'Only speak firmly, and you will never have occasion to resort to the sword.' I say no Government is worthy to hold Office in this country for a day that would hold firm language of that kind without being perfectly prepared to support it. What is the value of the opinion given by my right hon. Friend that there would be no occasion to resort to war, and what would be our predicament if, after holding that firm language, we had to support our remonstrances by a difficult, a costly, and almost hopeless military expedition? . . . What we decline to do is to undertake a military expedition for the purpose of rectifying disorders in a country which has always been disorderly, although we know that those disorders are now aggravated partly by the intervention of Boer freebooters. That is a responsibility we cannot assume, and which we will not impose upon the people of this country." —(3 Hansard, [277] 728-30-31.)

But it is a responsibility which, nevertheless, is to be imposed on the people of this country. We are told that now at last our word is to be maintained and our honour vindicated. I should like to ask to what it is really due that this serious enterprise will have to be undertaken? It is due to the fact that when in February last we were compelled to assume this Protectorate, we failed at once to make it a reality. The House will recollect the discussion last February on the Speech from the Throne in reference to this matter. Everyone was agreed that the word of the Boers in the new Convention was not a matter of any very great moment; but that the real alteration in the situation was this—the expression by Her Majesty's Government of a determination that come what might the new Convention should be carried out. How was the Convention to be carried out? I find, on referring to the debate, that the Under Secretary for the Colonies (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) made a remarkable speech—a very remarkable speech—comparing it with what he has said in the course of the debate to-day. He told the House that Her Majesty's Government had been in communication with the delegates from the Transvaal, that Her Majesty's Government had firmly insisted on the Frontier Question, and the delegates had assured Her Majesty's Government they would preserve the frontier. He said that Lord Derby had proposed and was determined to carry out the appointment of a Resident Commissioner of some character on the frontier, and that that Commissioner would have under his command some sort of police force, with which he could keep the frontier from the incursions of the freebooters, and added that the Government believed they had secured a settlement, it being a matter merely of police. If that were so, why was Mr. Mackenzie despatched without a sufficient force of police? That question had been asked to-day, and the hon. Gentleman gave absolutely no answer to it. All he said was that the Government had trusted to the authorities on the spot; but they cannot thrust upon Sir Hercules Robinson and Mr. Mackenzie their own responsibilities in this matter. The hon. Member told us as plainly as he could—I thought he deserved great credit for the candour of his statement—that if a police force of even 100 men had at once been placed at Mr. Mackenzie's disposal, all these difficulties and troubles and cruelties to Montsion would never have taken place.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: The right hon. Gentleman will allow me to say I never made any such statement. I distinctly said that 100 men were placed at the disposal of Mr. Mackenzie, and if they had been moved up the country at once these difficulties would not have occurred.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Yes; 100 men on paper, as useful as all those Proclamations. If 100 men could not be at once recruited in the Cape Colony, or obtained from any other Colonial source, Her Majesty's Government were bound by the assurances of the Under Secretary at the time to take care that Mr. Mackenzie went up the country with a sufficient number of men levied, if necessary, from our Imperial Forces. Now, the Under Secretary for the Colonies actually said, referring to the cruel murder of Mr. Bethell, that Mr. Bethell was a little too brave. What a way to speak of the conduct of one whom you engaged as your police officer, who was doing his best, in spite of the insufficient force placed at his disposal, to perform his duty, in the cruel and difficult position you sent him to fill, and who met his death in fighting against those who were the enemies of the British Protectorate in Bechuanaland! But the hon. Gentleman was not the only Member of the Government who gave the assurance to the House that a sufficient police force would be employed, for the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) said that if the freebooters from the Transvaal again attacked Montsioa and Mankoroane, they would come into contact with police established at the cost of the Imperial Government, who would, no doubt, give a good account of them. The Under Secretary takes credit for securing the co-operation of the Cape Colony by a policy of patience and perseverance; but what has this policy cost the Native Tribes, and British credit in South Africa? For the last three years we have been debating this question of the position of the tribes on the borders of the Transvaal. Negotiation had, up to this time, been the sole policy of Her Majesty's Government. We have had under the consideration of the House instances of cruelty, of robbery, of oppression against these tribes, to whom, like the Bechuanas, we have incurred direct obligations, or to whom, like the Zulus, we have responsibilities arising from other causes. Have these responsibilities or obligations yet been carried out? Even in February last, how much better was the position of the Bechuanas than now? It was only, I think, at the end of 1883 that this so-called Republic of Stellaland was established by the freebooters at the expense of Mankoroane; and if, when this matter was first brought before the House, Her Majesty's Government had acted with a reasonable amount of firmness, the establishment of that Republic might have been prevented. When Mr. Mackenzie went up he found a community of men, knowing themselves to be in the wrong, and determined to maintain their position, and not, if they could help it, to accept British authority, and in default of having any force at his disposal he could only try to make terms with them. But he found that Montsioa had defeated his enemies, the freebooters of Goshen, who were driven within the borders of the Transvaal. Fifty police, then, would have given a good account of these freebooters, for there were but 30 or 40 of them; but no sooner was it known that, although this British Protectorate had been established, some months were to elapse before the ratification of the Transvaal Convention, than there was a determined and united effort on the part of lawless persons of every nationality to make hay while the sun shone. What these freebooters of the Transvaal did they clearly did with the connivance of their Government, who even permitted gunpowder from the Government stores to be used by them, and whose Representatives in this country insisted that a period of six months should elapse before the Convention was ratified by the Volksraad. In the light of what has occurred, I look upon that delay with suspicion, and I think there was in this matter on the part of the Representatives of the Transvaal Government what amounts to something very like foul play. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had told them that the old anti-English feeling no longer existed.

MR. GLADSTONE explained that he referred to the distinction between Anglican and Dutch feeling.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: At any rate, the time had come when Her Majesty's Government were not justified in trusting merely to the word of the Transvaal Government in this matter. They must act by themselves, and carry out their responsibilities. The Under Secretary had spoken of the sympathy of the Cape Government, who were acting in concert with Her Majesty's Government. I have no doubt whatever, from the information we have received from the Cape Colony, that the whole English opinion there is of one mind, and is excited and enthusiastic to a degree with reference to the policy to be pursued by the Government. I notice that a Resolution passed the other day, to a great extent through the advocacy of Mr. Mackenzie, at Cape Town, and elsewhere, was to the effect that any failure on the part of Her Majesty's Government to maintain its just rights under the Convention of London, entered into with the Transvaal Government, and to fulfil its obligations towards the Native Tribes under the Protectorate of England, would be fatal to its supremacy in South Africa. This feeling is not only entertained by the English portion of the Cape Colony, but also by the thinking and more respectable portion of the Dutch population. I think, therefore, that we have really the whole of the valuable Colonial opinion on our side, whether Dutch or English; but there is a very different opinion in regard to this matter, which the Government will do well to remember. Not long ago I read a quotation from an article in a newspaper which represents the Afriander Party, and which advocated the removal of Montsioa because he would take advantage of the dispute between the Imperial Government and a portion of the Colonists, and would join with the people over the sea in preference to the people on his border, and added that it was important that this idea should be exterminated for ever. I would venture to say that it is a point of infinite importance for England and for our Empire, not only in South Africa, but throughout the world, that this idea should not be permitted to be exterminated. We must fulfil our responsibilities on this matter, by all means in concert with the Cape Government, if possible; but I think we shall not be able to fulfil them without some manifestation of Imperial power. These people have been taught a lesson which they must, sooner or later, unlearn. It may cost men and money to this country; but if it does, the responsibility will rest upon those who, for the last four years, have allowed these ignorant and uncivilized Boers to believe that they can flout the authority of this country in South Africa, and that if they are but firm in their opposition to our wishes they will be permitted to obtain their own way, and ultimately to drive us from that which is one of the most valuable Colonies of the Empire.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I should not have risen if the President of the Board of Trade, or some other Member of the Government, had desired to reply to the speech of the right hon. Baronet. Let me refer, in the first place, to the exceedingly awkward position in which the House finds itself, owing to the absence of the Papers which we were promised. If it is the fault of the printers, I do not think that it ought to be considered a sufficient excuse that the Factory Acts are the cause of the delay, for the printers might very well have sufficient hands to meet extra demands. The Papers presented this morning, and which, through the courtesy of my hon. Friend the Under Secretary, I saw yesterday, bring us up to this point—that Sir Hercules Robinson had stated to the Transvaal Government that Montsioa's territory was under British protection; that notwithstanding that he was attacked, and he was in very great danger; that Mr. Mackenzie had been sent up there, and was asking for reinforcements, but that he had not obtained them; that the Cape Government refused to give them; and that our own Government were, in some way or another, unable to give him what he required. The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies had stated that Mr. Mackenzie was expected by the Government to organize this police force, and I believe he also stated that the police were at his disposal. I cannot reconcile these statements with the information which I have myself received from Mr. Mackenzie, nor with a long letter from the Correspondent of The Times, the information in which was evidently received from Mr. Mackenzie. On the 17th of August last Mr. Mackenzie wrote a letter, of which the following is an extract:—

"Poor, poor Montsioa! I am afraid he has had to give in. I sent him some ammunition, and was about to send some more with a few men to help him when I was called to Cape Town. I began with 10 policemen, and stipulations not to have more than 25 without special leave. My own journeys have been performed without protection of arms. At an early date I exposed, after personal inspection, the position of the Transvaal people at Rooi Grond and Montsioa. They had no foothold out of Transvaal. The Transvaal winked at their levying war on their own account. Two months ago I appealed to His Excellency on this subject, feeling sure that I was in no position to fight the Transvaal with a few policemen."

I understood my hon. Friend to say that it rested not so much with Mr. Mackenzie, as with Sir Hercules Robinson. On that point I cannot give any opinion without seeing the despatches; but I think that when the Government sent out Mr. Mackenzie they were bound to have taken care that he had a sufficient force of police with him in accordance with the statements of the Under Secretary and the President of the Board of Trade, that the Government would provide a sufficient force to keep order. I was glad to hear the testimony that the Under Secretary bore to Mr. Mackenzie's conduct and to his self-sacrifice. It is due to Mr. Mackenzie to state that he did not ask for this appointment—that it was given to him on the recommendation of Sir Hercules Robinson without any solicitation of his friends on his behalf. He was appointed because it was believed by Sir Hercules Robinson and by the Government that he was the man best suited for the post; and reading through the Papers I think it will be proved that Mr. Mackenzie acted with great discretion, great forbearance, and remarkable ability, and has shown a self-sacrifice which is rare in the manner in which he thought nothing of his own position, because the instant he felt he was considered by any person of authority not likely to succeed, at very great cost to himself and the sacrifice of his whole future, he resigned. This is the position of affairs at the point up to which we are brought by the Papers circulated to-day. We are to have further Papers. At present the Under Secretary says that the Government have nothing to answer, except in regard to this matter of the police. But we cannot now refer to what has happened since, because we have not the Papers. But there are questions which, I think, we have a right to ask, and, if not entirely answered by the despatches, should be answered by the Government. One question is—Why did Sir Hercules Robinson assent to the resignation of Mr. Mackenzie? Another is—What are the instructions that were sent to his successor? I understand that the Prime Minister intimates that it has been answered that Mr. Mackenzie's resignation was accepted because the Cape Government objected to him, and could not work with him; but it must be remembered that Mr. Mackenzie was employed for the fulfilment of a duty undertaken by the Home Government. The Convention he was to see fulfilled was not a Convention with the Cape Government. There was no mention of the Cape Government in it. It was an arrangement between Her Majesty's Government and the Transvaal Government, entailing obligations upon us towards the Natives. My hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Wodehouse), in his speech to-day, which I listened to with the greatest pleasure, owing to the knowledge he has of these questions, made one statement with which I cannot entirely agree—namely, that we had entered into a sort of partnership with the Cape Colony for the purpose of carrying out this matter. There may have been a correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the Cape on the subject; but there was no mention of such a partnership in the Convention, nor have I seen any mention of it in the documents which have been laid upon the Table. The second question which I have to ask is—What were the instructions given to Mr. Rhodes and Mr. Bower when sent in the place of Mr. Mackenzie? Was Mr. Rhodes sent to represent a different policy from that which Mr. Mackenzie represented? Will the House allow me to give an expression of wonder at the change from one of those poor Natives? Mankoroane wrote a letter, dated September 4, of which I have a translation, which shows that it was a bond fide letter. He is immensely puzzled by these variations of policy, and the poor fellow writes in very great distress. He says—

"I have been thinking, are there two Queens? I dismissed my agent. If I had known that the Queen had no power, I should not have put away my agent. But I cast him off through confidence that, as the Queen had received me, I was protected by a power not needing to be added to by agents. Now, here I am, shall my confidence leave me? I know not. For to-day I look round on every side, being alone. I know not where to look for my life."

If there is change of policy, I want to know what it is? No answer has been given to-day to a question, which I should like to repeat—namely, "What action was immediately taken by the Government upon hearing of the attack on the Natives under our protection?" Was anything done at once? I should have supposed that a telegram would have been at once sent to Sir Hercules Robinson, asking—"Is the statement true which appears in the newspapers? If so, demand reparation?"

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Which attack is the right hon. Gentleman referring to?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: One attack was made in June, upon which no action was taken; but I am now speaking of what took place on July 31 against Montsioa, which led to such sorrowful consequences to the Native Chiefs, and in which Mr. Bethell was killed, or, rather, murdered. Before information was received that this officer had been murdered in cold blood, the fact was known that there had been this attack upon those under our protection; and I want to know why the Government did not telegraph at once to Sir Hercules Robinson—"Is this true? If so, demand reparation instantly from the Transvaal Government, and take care that they induce those filibusters immediately to leave the territory." We have Sir Hercules Robinson's own statement in the despatches circulated to-day that this expedition was organized and planned in the Transvaal territory, and that the Proclamation against it was almost a sham. There are several other questions which, if I had time, I might ask; but what is of real importance is what the Government are now going to do. I am very glad that Sir Charles Warren is going out. I believe from his antecedents that he is the best man that could be sent. He showed great ability, vigour, and discretion in restoring order in Griqualand West, and is much respected both by the Natives and, I believe, by the Dutch farmers in that territory. I am also very glad to believe that the Government have now come to the conclusion that no man is of much use there unless he has some force behind him. We are not told what the actual force is which Sir Charles Warren will have at his disposal; but I am glad to trust from the rumours which have reached me that the force will be sufficient, and that power will be given to Sir Charles Warren to take out and enlist there as many police as may be necessary. If the Government are taking that course, they are taking the best course. But then there should be a knowledge that the police would be supported by Regular troops, though, I believe, a mounted police are better adapted for dealing with the filibusters than the Regular Army. Now, one word with regard to the possibility of Sir Charles Warren, when he goes out there, finding an arrangement between the Cape Government and the Government of the Transvaal which may seem to settle the matter. We should all rejoice if the Transvaal Government, finding out that we are in earnest, and the Cape Government also, finding out the feeling of every loyal man at the Cape, and especially the feeling of Englishmen, though the present Ministry obtained power by Afrikaner support, would do their best to settle the matter. But the Government must not be sanguine that this is a real settlement; they will have to take care that it will not be simply another Convention. A force will be necessary in Bechuanaland to keep order, and it will be absolutely indispensable that some officer should go there to see that order is preserved. The Under Secretary—I do not know whether intentionally—seemed to dwell on the position of Montsioa as the one difficulty. That is not really the case. There is the so-called Republic of Stellaland, and it is a sad thing that such a condition of affairs should exist in a country under our protection. The Republic of Stellaland, acting, as they say, under our Protectorate, have imprisoned our Agents; and I must say I was surprised at the answer of the Under Secretary, who, when asked whether Mr. Wright had been taken prisoner, said that there was no occasion to take steps, because he was now free. But people who did such a thing to an Agent of our country ought to meet with some punishment. I do not say that from any feeling of revenge, but because, if people are allowed to do such acts with perfect impunity, you will never have an end of them. I could give details which would surprise the House of the atrocities already committed; and therefore I say that a mere settlement on paper saying we are restoring his land to Montsioa will not prevent the future being a mere repetition of the past, and will not at all meet our present difficulties. Unless you have something besides talk, unless you take some action, you will never have any peace and quietness there. One word more. I think this sad history gives us two or three lessons—first of all, a lesson of the necessity of firmness and consistency. I need hardly dwell upon that. Much allusion has been made to the Treaty of Majuba. I was in the Government which was responsible for that Treaty; but I never should have been responsible if I had not supposed that we should have guarded against the danger of that Treaty being violated, and that we should have given the Boers to understand that we made it, not from any fear of them, or on account of the difficulties of dealing with them, but because we thought it was right. They were quite sure to suppose that we made it out of neglect, indifference, or cowardice. We did not care what they thought of it so far as we were concerned; but it did matter to those for whom we were responsible, whether they had any reason to think so, and we should have taken care that there was after that Treaty a force sufficient to prevent a breach of it. Since that, I must confess that the way in which the first breaches of the Convention were received here was calculated to make the Transvaal Government believe they were able to do what they liked. Another lesson is that the penny wise and pound foolish policy is the most dangerous. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) is not here. He assumes the position of champion of the public purse, and is much concerned lest we should go to great expense in these matters; but of all the expensive courses which it is possible to take delay is the worst, for it will make the Boers think that we are afraid, or at any rate reluctant, to meet them. That is a course which is sure to entail upon us the greatest expenditure in the end. An hon. Friend of mine to-day asked me—“Are we to go to war?” Well, Sir, my reply was that it was impossible to overrate the amount of blood shed and of money lost by this policy of delay; and we have not seen the end of it. We must not be too sanguine as to what is happening at the Cape; and we must not suppose that we can shift our own responsibility upon the Colonists. Even the English Party there have hesitated in supporting us, because of the treatment which our Allies have met with, and the policy of vacillation that has been displayed. The English Colonists, in fact, have begun to fear to support us; and if matters had been allowed to go on as they were doing there would soon have been a time when it could be said that England had no friends at the Cape. Persons may think that it is from old associations I speak thus; that it is because the fathers or grandfathers of those people were slaves that I have a strong feeling about them. But I do not admit that because people are black and because their fathers were slaves we should not fulfil our promises to protect them. It is not, however, a question of black and white; the question is whether we are to keep this Colony or not? That is what it really does come to. Some have said—“Oh, let that Colony go; the Cape of Good Hope has been nothing but a trouble and nuisance to us since we have had to do with it.” [“Hear, hear!”] Yes; hear, hear; but is that hon. Gentleman aware of the vast interests of this country in South Africa? I am glad to know that there are some £20,000,000 of English money invested there, for it will be to the interest of the bondholders to see that justice is done. There never was anything more clearly proved than that justice to the Natives—to those poor unfortunate Blacks—is bound up with the preservation of English interests and the security of the Colony. But supposing we did let the Colony go, and that we lost that trade route to the interior, there is yet another trade route to be considered, which has already been alluded to to-day, and that is the route to India and Australia. Is it to be supposed that we could keep St. Simon's Bay as a coaling station with the Cape Colony independent? We should find that it would not long be an independent Colony, for it is one which Germany would greatly like to have, as it is widely different to the pestilential places on the West Coast of Africa which are now receiving their attention. It is a Colony with which the German Government might gratify the Colonial aspirations of Germany. Do you suppose that Germany would allow us to keep St. Simon's Bay as a Gibraltar in German territory? No; if you mean to give up the general government of the Cape Colony you may make up your minds that you will have to go away altogether; and, after all, it would be better to go away voluntarily than to remain and neglect your duties until you are compelled to go. I wish to make only one other remark. The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies gave one of the grounds of defence of the Government policy of delay which was the most extraordinary I ever heard. It was that by our waiting, by our delay, and by our patience, we have at last brought matters to a state in which a strong feeling has been excited at the Cape, and that the consequence is that the people at the Cape are now supporting the Government. I wish the Members of the Government could read the speeches which are made in the Colony by those who are expected by my hon. Friend to support them. There is nothing which has been said upon any platform by hon. Gentlemen opposite that is more humiliating to the Government than the way in which these men at the Cape have expressed their feelings with regard to what they consider as desertion until now. What else are we to expect, if we are to submit to injustice and to allow our officers to be murdered and imprisoned, and if we are to allow the Queen's Government to be insulted and our Allies to be despoiled on the ground that if enough of that were done, then there would be a feeling evoked at the Cape in favour of us? I sincerely hope that no Under Secretary for the Colonies will ever again venture on such a defence of the policy of the Government.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: My right hon. Friend has only left me a few minutes in which to reply to his observations.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I offered to give way for you.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I am anxious on the part of the Government that the speeches which we have heard should not be without some reply; but, in order to make that reply, I am compelled to compress what I have to say into the few remaining moments rather than that another day should be wasted on this subject. My right hon. Friend observed truly that both he and the country were most anxious to know what course the Government proposed to take at the present time, and I confess I think myself that the country will take a much greater interest in that than in the recrimination which has been addressed by one side of the House to the other. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) was unable to deprive himself on this occasion of the pleasure of making a Party speech, and he attacked the Government in the strongest possible terms, not for what they now proposed to do, but he attacked them for the past, and for the delay in the proceedings which we have now declared we are about to take. I listened to the right hon. Gentleman with great interest, and I confess I was astounded that, with his experience, he should imagine that the difficulties in South Africa could be so easily and so speedily settled as he now supposes. He said if only a short time ago we had sent out 50 police to the border of Bechuanaland all these dangers and difficulties and this expensive expedition would have been avoided. I should like to know whether, when the right hon. Gentleman occupied the position of Secretary for the Colonies, he would not have thought twice or thrice before sending 50 police anywhere, with a knowledge that in all probability it would bring about a general convulsion and perhaps a general war? The right hon. Gentleman absolutely ignored that which he knows, as well as I do, is the whole crux of this problem—namely, that we are dealing with a population four-fifths of which are of a different blood from ourselves, and that there is no possibility of a peaceful settlement in South Africa without such a sacrifice that we cannot contemplate imposing upon the British taxpayers, unless we have the cordial co-operation of the Cape Colony. I am surprised to hear responsible persons like the right hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Wodehouse) suggesting that we should put aside considerations addressed to us from the Cape, that we should ignore altogether the Africaner sentiment, and try to deal with this thing exclusively from a British point of view, and that we should yield nothing whatever.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I utterly deny that I made any such statement.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I am quite satisfied to leave the argument to the appreciation of the House. I have not time to meet it now. I wish to traverse entirely the position taken up by my right hon. Friend behind me, and the right hon. Gentleman opposite, that we have suffered by delay. I deny that we have suffered by delay. I say that the situation now is totally different from what it was some time ago. It is absolutely different in this respect, that we can now go forward and maintain our just obligations with the certainty that we have the general assent of the Dutch population of the Cape, and that change has been in consequence entirely of the patience, the long-suffering, if you like, that we have shown. When I consider the great interests at stake, the tremendous consequences which might have followed from an opposite course, I am quite content to sit still under the taunts of my right hon. Friend and the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and I am quite sure that the public generally will justify the course we have taken.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL and MR. WILLIAM REDMOND here rose together, and the SPEAKER called upon the latter.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND moved the adjournment of the debate.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he desired to point out that the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) rose before the hon. Member for Wexford Borough to move the adjournment.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL wished to know whether moving the adjournment of the House would prevent an Amendment being moved?

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member for Wexford Borough rose, and was called on by name, but he gave way to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain). When the hon. Member rose the second time, he thought it right to call upon him again.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he also wished to move the adjournment. His noble Friend intended to have moved the adjournment, in order that he might have an opportunity of moving his Amendment to-morrow.

MR. SPEAKER said, the adjournment could not be moved twice. It had been already moved by the hon. Member for Wexford Borough (Mr. William Redmond), and it was entirely optional with the latter to say whether he would give way to the noble Lord or to any other hon. Gentleman.

MR. GLADSTONE said, it would be for the general convenience of the House if the noble Lord would bring on his Amendment to-morrow.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he would endeavour to do so.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. William Redmond,)—put, and agreed to.

MOTIONS.

QUESTIONS.

LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART—THE NATIONAL GALLERY—THE BLENHEIM COLLECTION.

MR. CUBITT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he has sanctioned the purchase, by the Trustees of the National Gallery, of a picture by Raphael for the very large sum of £70,000, and a picture by Vandyck for the sum of £17,000; and, if so, whether he can inform the House what steps were taken by the Trustees of the National Gallery and himself to ascertain the supposed value of these pictures; and, if he can lay upon the Table any Papers on the subject?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): In reply to the right hon. Gentleman, I have to say that this matter has not been treated as a Treasury question, but, as in the case of the purchase of the Ashburnham Manuscripts, as one that demanded the consideration of the Government generally. Her Majesty's Government have sanctioned the purchase by the National Gallery Trustees, for £87,500, of two pictures—the "Ansidei Madonna," by Raphael, and the Equestrian portrait of Charles I., by Vandyck, now in the Blenheim Collection. The agreement to purchase the pictures is subject to a Vote by the House for the amount being obtained in the Session of 1885, and the Vote will be asked for in the Supplementary Estimates introduced in February next. At the same time, full particulars of the grounds upon which the purchase was sanctioned by Her Majesty's Government will be given in a Parliamentary Paper.

NORTHERN LIGHTHOUSE COMMISSIONERS—THE FAIR ISLE.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the Board of Trade proposes, in consequence of the great development of the Fisheries, to take any steps for improving the lighting of the Orkney and Shetland Islands, and particularly of the Fair Isle; and, whether the Trinity House authorities have yet arrived at any conclusion respecting the scheme submitted by the Northern Lighthouse Commissioners for improving the lighting of those islands; and, if not, when a Report may be expected?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The Board of Trade have no power to take the initiative in this matter. Advantage to the Fisheries standing alone would not be a justification for applying the Mercantile Marine Fund to lighting these Islands, as fishing boats do not contribute to that fund. I received yesterday a letter from the Trinity House authorities stating that they had not yet arrived at a conclusion respecting the comprehensive scheme submitted by the Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses; but that they had suggested to those Commissioners that, pending the settlement of wider questions, a rocket fog signal station on Fair Isle might be tried during the coming winter.

NAVY—STATE OF THE NAVY.

MR. GOURLEY asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, To be good enough to inform the House how many Ocean Armour-clad Cruisers are at present in commission, stating number, calibre, and description of guns, also coal endurance and speed of each ship; further, how many (if any) of this type are now being built, when they are likely to be finished, stating how they are likely to be armed, coal endurance and ocean-going (not measured mile smooth water) speed; also to state how many sea-going torpedo craft are in commission, how many are building, and whether any are sufficiently large and powerful for ocean fighting; and, further, to state if it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to appoint a Royal Commission or Select Committee to inquire into the condition of the Navy?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: The statement on the Navy, which, according to the undertaking given by the Prime Minister, will shortly be made on behalf of the Government, must embrace a more or less detailed reference to the numerous points raised in the Question of my hon. Friend; and I would ask him not to press for Returns in anticipation of the information which it will be the duty of the Admiralty to give to Parliament in a more convenient form.

MR. GOURLEY: What about the latter part of the Question?

BOARD OF TRADE—THE SUGAR BOUNTIES—MR. RITCHIE AND MR. T. THORNHILL.

MR. RITCHIE asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to No. 169 of the papers in the Blue Book, containing correspondence relating to Sugar Bounties, in which Mr. Giffen, an official of the Board of Trade, charges Mr. Ritchie and Mr. Thornhill, Members of this House, with having made "false statements;" whether he will state to the House the nature of such false statements and the date on which they were made; whether it is with his approval that a document making so grave a charge against Members of this House was inserted in an official Blue Book without any communication with the Members so charged; whether it is with his approval that a letter, No. 171, in the same Blue Book, from Sir T. H. Farrer to Mr. Ritchie, reflecting on Mr. Ritchie's conduct was inserted and the reply suppressed; whether he will call upon Mr. Giffen to withdraw and apologise for the charges referred to, and will cause the Blue Book to be withdrawn and another one issued with Mr. Giffen's letter, No. 169, omitted and apologised for, and Mr. Ritchie's reply to Sir T. H. Farrer's letter, No. 171, inserted; and, whether he will take steps to prevent in the future such an abuse of official documents?

MR. T. THORNHILL: As I am included in the Question, I would like to say one or two words in explanation of the whole thing.

MR. SPEAKER: I think it will be more convenient if the hon. Gentleman will follow after the right hon. Gentleman has made his reply.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: My attention has been called to No. 169 of the Papers in the Blue Book containing correspondence relating to the Sugar Bounties, in which certain Members of the House are charged with false statements. I may say that the publications of the Board of Trade are so voluminous and numerous that it is physically impossible for me to exercise a continuous personal and verbatim revision. In the present case, I was cognizant of the principal documents; but I left the arrangement for publication and the necessary covering letters to the care of the Chief of the Department. It was not with my approval or knowledge that the document complained of by the hon. Gentleman opposite was inserted, nor that the letter from the hon. Member in answer to No. 171 in the same Blue Book was omitted. I think that the hon. Member and the House have just ground of complaint on both points. I propose to remedy these errors as far as lies in my power by withdrawing the Blue Book and reissuing it, omitting the Letter No. 169, and inserting the reply, dated July 10, of the hon. Member to Letter No. 171, with the addition of a note to the effect that no rejoinder was made by the Department to that reply, because the subject in controversy had been fully discussed in this House in the debate on the 14th of July last. I beg further to read a letter written to me by Mr. Giffen, who has, I should add, been out of health, and suffering from a severe domestic calamity—

"Dear Mr. Chamberlain,—With reference to the Question put by Mr. Ritchie as to the correspondence just issued, I have to express my regret that my covering letter to the Board of Trade, dated June 30 last (No. 169 in the printed correspondence), imputes false statements to Mr. Ritchie, M.P., and Mr. Thornhill, M.P., and I beg leave to withdraw the words, and to apologize for having used them. The letter was written hurriedly, with a view to the record of the letters which I had written to The Times, and which I thought it my duty to bring officially to your notice, and without any knowledge that it would form part of the Parliamentary correspondence. As you are aware, the admission of the letter into the printed correspondence also occurred through a regrettable inadvertence.—Yours sincerely, R. GIFFEN."

Sir Thomas H. Farrer also desires me to express his regret that the Papers were not more carefully revised before they were sent to Press. Under these circumstances, I trust the hon. Member will accept the apologies which it is my duty to tender to him, and will be satisfied with the steps I am taking to repair the errors which have been committed.

MR. RITCHIE: Perhaps the House will allow me to say that I accept in the frankest manner the full and frank apology Mr. Giffen has made.

MR. T. THORNHILL: I also am satisfied with the reply, and will say no more on the subject.

NATIONAL LEAGUE AT NEW ROSS—ATTENDANCE OF THE POLICE.

MR. JOHN REDMOND asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether it is a fact that, on the occasion of a meeting of the New Ross National League on Wednesday October 22nd, the hall and entrances to the town hall, where the meeting was held, were occupied by a force of the Royal Irish Constabulary; whether they were there in pursuance of instructions received; and, whether the Government have issued any general instructions to the police with reference to attendance at meetings of the National League?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): It is not correct to state that the Town Hall of New Ross and entrances to it were occupied by a force of the Royal Irish Constabulary on the occasion of a National League meeting, and no instructions to that effect were given. Two constables who happened to be on ordinary town duty occasionally stopped at the corner during their rounds, and an acting sergeant was for a short time in the outer hall, which is open to the public. The instructions to the police are not to attend indoor meetings of the National League without special orders.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman have any objection to give the sources of his information? It differs materially from mine.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): The sources were official.

APPOINTMENTS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether he would have any objection to lay upon the Table a list of the names of gentlemen submitted to the Lord Lieutenant, in accordance with the suggestion of the late Chief Secretary, as fit and proper persons to act in the Commission of the Peace, and showing which (if any) of them have been in consequence appointed?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): It would be inexpedient to lay upon the Table a list of the names of the gentlemen submitted to the Lord Chancellor for appointment to the Commission of the Peace in accordance with the suggestion mentioned in the Question. It would lead to a discussion upon individual cases, unjust and misleading in the case of gentlemen not appointed. I may state, however, that a very considerable addition has been made to the Magistracy from names submitted in consequence of the suggestion of the late Chief Secretary.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND)—
RIGHT OF TURBARY—MR. R. H.
DUNNE, OF BRITTAS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether it is a fact that Mr. Robert Henry Dunne, of Brittas, in the Queen's County, uncle and guardian of the Dunnes (minors), sat at Petty Sessions in July last, at Clonaslee, and adjudicated in a claim respecting turbary on the estate of the said minors; whether J. Kenny, tenant on the said estate, got a fair rent fixed in the Land Court, no mention being made of turbary; whether the said tenant has always been of right accustomed, and unchallenged, to cut turf on the bog adjoining his holding for at least thirty-five years; whether Mr. Dunne now denies the right of the said tenant to cut turf on the bog in question, and whether, sitting as magistrate at Petty Sessions, he gave judgment against Kenny respecting the said bog, telling him in Court that he (Kenny) had no claim to any portion of the bog except what he (Dunne) himself gave or might give him; and, whether, if upon inquiry the above allegations prove correct, he will bring the matter to the notice of the Lord Chancellor?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): It is the fact that J. Kenny got a fair rent fixed in the Land Court, no mention being made of the turbary. He paid a distinct rent for the bog. His right to cut turf is disputed. On the information before me it would appear that Mr. Dunne only adjudicated in a case in which one tenant named Davis sued Kenny, another tenant, for trespass on the bog of Davis, to which, in the opinion of the magistrate, Kenny had no legal claim.

IRELAND — MOUNTMELICK COURT-HOUSE—USE OF BUILDING FOR PARTY PURPOSES, &c.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, If he is aware that the room in Mountmellick Court-house, which affords the only access to the gallery, is used for the purposes of freemasonry, and two freemasons' lodges having up to the present held their meetings in it; that it is furnished with the apparatus of the craft, and that boxes labelled with the name and number of the lodges are placed at the top of the stairs for the reception of the minor articles of the paraphernalia, while the curtains and flags of various colours are stowed, while not in actual use, in the cupboard; whether the court-house is not public property, and paid for out of the county cess; and, whether he will take steps to cause a discontinuance of a practice opposed to the feelings of the Catholic population of the Queen's County?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): The statements of fact in the Question are substantially correct, so far as regards the past. But a new house has been built for the use of the Masonic Lodges, and all the Freemasonry property has been removed to it from the room in the Court-house. The Court-house is public property, and is paid for out of the county cess.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, in the Court-house there were two lodges held their meetings, and it was only one of these which he had understood to have been removed. Was he to understand that both of them had given up the Court-house?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): That is the information I have.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE NEWSPAPER PRESS—OFFICIAL COMMUNICATIONS.

MR. RAIKES asked the noble Lord the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he accepts the responsibility of a letter dated from 12, Downing Street, and signed C. J. Maude, which appeared in The Morning Post of Tuesday October 28th; whether he can state if the communication respecting a scheme of Redistribution under the consideration of the Government, which recently appeared in The Standard newspaper, was furnished to that journal in recognition of its having afforded "more or less" support to Her Majesty's Government; and, whether he will lay upon the Table a list of those newspapers which, in consequence of their giving "more or less" support to Her Majesty's Government are directly furnished with intelligence from Government Departments, as well as of those to which, in the absence of such support, that favour is not extended? Perhaps, in putting this Question, I may be allowed to ask in addition whether the note which appeared in to-day's Daily News, answering by anticipation a part of my Question before it was put in the House, was also inspired by the noble Lord?

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR: In reply to the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to say that the note which appeared in The Daily News this morning may have been inspired by me, but it was inspired quite unintentionally, and not with the least intention of its appearing in the newspapers this morning. I do not think, however, its appearance will be any detriment to the right hon. Gentleman. In reply to the Question which appears on the Paper, I have to say that the letter which appeared in The Morning Post of Tuesday, October 28, was written by my direction. With regard to the second paragraph of the Question, I beg to state that the communication referred to was not furnished to The Standard by any Member of Her Majesty's Government, and I must refer the right hon. Gentleman to the answer given by the Prime Minister on the 24th instant, in which it was stated that the Solicitor to the Treasury had been directed to investigate the means by which the Redistribution scheme was furnished to The Standard. I do not think it would be of advantage to the Public Service to lay on the Table such a list as the right hon. Gentleman refers to. In saying this, I am only following long-established custom pursued by successive Governments, without distinction of Party, in exercising discretion as to the newspapers to which communications of intelligence are made.

MR. RAIKES: I beg further to ask the noble Lord, arising out of his answer, whether he intends in future, in furnishing intelligence to the public Press, to adhere to the principle laid down in the letter of Mr. Maude, of which he accepts the responsibility?

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR: Yes, Sir; I see no reason why there should be any departure from it.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I wish to ask the noble Lord whether, when he communicates pieces of information to the different Associations—namely, the Press Association and the Central News—it is the habit of the Government to prohibit those Associations furnishing this news to The Morning Post, which is a subscriber to one of the Associations?

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR: I am not aware that the Government has any power to prohibit these Associations giving any news to any of their subscribers.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: But my Question is, whether the Government, in communicating news to either of these Associations, lays down a condition that it shall not be supplied to The Morning Post? I have in my hand some correspondence which has passed between the Press Association and The Morning Post which points to the probability of that being the fact.

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR: There are conditions made with the Associations. In those conditions The Morning Post, which seems to have many champions in this House, is certainly not specifically mentioned. They are only general conditions laid down for the convenience of the Public Service.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I wish to ask the noble Lord whether he knows of any other newspapers in the Metropolis which are placed by the Government in the same category as The Morning Post?

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR: There are general conditions laid down, and they may include several newspapers, but none are specifically mentioned.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Will the noble Lord state what those conditions are?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I should like to ask the noble Lord, whether he is not aware that news is the stock-in-trade of newspapers, and that for the purpose of acquiring this stock-in-trade newspapers are in the habit of spending hundreds and sometimes thousands of pounds in a day; whether it does not follow, in the opinion of the noble Lord, that the Government, in supplying this stock-in-trade in the shape of news to newspapers, is making the supply of that news dependent on the tone of their editorials towards the Government, and is thereby giving a pecuniary consideration to the Press of the country in favour of supporting the existing Administration; and I would further ask whether he is aware that the distribution of advertisements to newspapers, which are the principal source of income to newspapers, is not also regulated—at least in Ireland—by the tone of the editorials of those newspapers?

BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND)— REALIZATION OF SECURITIES.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is a fact that they have directed the Board of Works in Ireland to realise their securities in several cases in which the Board of Works are mortgagees; and, whether, within the last week, the Board of Works have been instructed to take possession of the Southern Railway, between Thurles and Clonmel, for the purpose of sale?

MR. COURTNEY: The Treasury and the Board of Works are endeavouring by all legitimate means to reduce the arrears due on the loans now out to the public. With regard to the Southern Railway, between Thurles and Clonmel, the Board of Works are taking possession with the intention of improving the security in the interests of all parties concerned. There is no fear that the line will be closed.

EGYPT (WAR IN THE SOUDAN)—THE MARINES AT SUAKIN.

GENERAL ALEXANDER asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, Whether a promise was given that the Marines stationed at Suakin should be relieved every three months; and, if so, whether such promise has been kept?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY, in reply, said, that he understood no promise was given that the Marines stationed at Suakin would be relieved every three months; but the detachment was relieved from the port of Suez as often as the exigencies of the Public Service would permit.

NAVY—ARMAMENT OF SHIPS OF WAR
THE "COLOSSUS."

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, If he can inform the House whether the breech-piece of the 43-ton gun for the Conqueror and Colossus has yet been finally approved for service; and, also, whether the loading arrangements for that gun have been settled, and the mechanism required ordered to be made; and, within what time the guns and loading gear for those ships will be ready for use, and the ships complete for commission?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: The breech-piece or breech-screw was approved as part of the original design for the 43-ton gun. But a change of the obturator has been recommended by the War Office, and has rendered necessary a modification of this mechanism, which is expected to be ready for the Conqueror and Colossus in three months. The loading arrangements for the Conqueror are nearly finished, and those for the Colossus are ordered, and expected from the manufacturers in two months. The guns and gear will, it is hoped, be ready for the Conqueror within one month of delivery of the breech mechanism, and for the Colossus within two months of delivery of all work ordered from the manufacturers. Should these anticipations be fulfilled, the armament for the Conqueror should be ready in four months, and for the Colossus in five months from the present time.

PORTUGAL—THE "CITY OF MECCA."

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he has yet given up hope of inducing the Portuguese Government either to redress the wrong done to British subjects by the Portuguese Courts in the City of Mecca collision case, or to consent to an International arbitration; and if Her Majesty's Government contemplate asking Parliament to grant compensation for the wrongs they have failed to get redressed, or if they intend to leave British subjects to bear those wrongs entirely without remedy?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Her Majesty's Government are still in communication with the Law Officers, whose reply is expected immediately; but until it is received I cannot answer the other points raised by my hon. Friend's Question.

SCOTCH BILLS.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Lord Advocate, If it is the intention of the Home Office to introduce the Secretary of State for Scotland Bill and the Burgh Police and Improvement Bill, which were dropped by Her Majesty's Government last Session after prolonged discussion?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR): The intention is to introduce the Bills mentioned when the Government is in a position to resume the ordinary course of legislation.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—MR.
GEORGE BOLTON.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, What is the present position of Mr. George Bolton; is he in receipt of a salary from the Crown; and, what are the intentions of the Government respecting him?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER), in reply, said, the question was of considerable importance, and it was desirable that the opinion of the Chief Secretary should be obtained. The papers were now before him, and he would state the intentions of the Government on his return to the House.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—PRO-
ISSUE OF CROWN BRIEFS TO PRI-SONERS' COUNSEL.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Has it been the practice, regularly, occasionally, or ever, to give prisoners' counsel copies of printed Crown briefs; if so, why was this not done in the Maamtrasna case; was the Judge provided with a copy, or with copies of the depositions; and, who is responsible for withholding the dying declarations of Michael and Patrick Joyce from the defence?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): It is not the practice to give prisoners' counsel copies of printed Crown briefs. When depositions are printed and the prisoner's counsel or attorney applies for them it is usual to give them. No such application was made in the Maamtrasna case. The Judge was provided with copies of the depositions. The third paragraph implies a charge which I entirely repudiate. The prosecuting counsel had the conduct of the case, and bear all the responsibility connected with it.

MR. HEALY: The hon. and learned Gentleman has not answered my Question. I asked if it had been the practice regularly, occasionally, or ever, to give prisoners copies of printed Crown briefs; and I also wish to know whether in this case a copy was supplied to the Judge?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): It has not been the practice regularly. I cannot say that the practice has ever been departed from.

MR. HEALY: Can the hon. and learned Gentleman say yes or no to the question, did the Judge get a copy of the printed Crown brief?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): Yes, he did, I believe.

ARMY—ROYAL ENGINEER DEPARTMENT.

MR. GORST asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the appointments of civilian foremen of works and surveyor's clerkships in the Royal Engineer Department are withheld from discharged non-commissioned officers, Royal Engineers, who have held similar appointments prior to their discharge; and, if so, whether he can see his way to cancel an order which prohibits deserving discharged soldiers from obtaining these appointments on their leaving the Army?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Regulations have been recently issued (General Order 110, July, 1884), of general application, under which non-commissioned officers or soldiers who have been discharged to pension may, within certain limits of age, be re-enlisted for further Army service; but the whole principle of modern rules is that the same man cannot be in receipt at the same time of pay as an effective and of pension as a non-effective. To this rule it is not possible to make an exception in the case of the non-commissioned officers referred to in the Question; but employment is open to them on the conditions stated in the event of their services being required.

EGYPT (WAR IN THE SOUDAN)— ABYSSINIA—ADMIRAL HEWETT'S MISSION.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Military support from Abyssinia, to obtain which Admiral Hewett's mission was despatched to King John, has yet been supplied to the besieged Egyptian garrisons; and, if not, whether it has yet been arranged when our Abyssinian Allies will invade the Soudan?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The conduct of the evacuation of the garrisons referred to has been intrusted by the Egyptian Government to Mason Bey, and Captain Speedy has been appointed by Her Majesty's Government to advise the Abyssinians in carrying out the Treaty of June 3. There is no question in that Treaty of an invasion of the Soudan by Abyssinia. By the Third Article of the Treaty the King of Abyssinia engages to facilitate the withdrawal of the Egyptian troops through his territory to Massowah.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Are the garrisons being relieved now through Abyssinia?

FRANCE AND CHINA—HOSTILITIES— FRENCH BLOCKADE OF FORMOSA.

MR. WARTON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he could state what is the length of the coast line and what is the number of ports in Chinese territory blockaded by the French Admiral; what is the number of ships under his command; and, what steps, if any, did the Government take to ascertain whether the blockade is in fact effective?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I am informed at the Admiralty that the length of coast line blockaded in the Island of Formosa is 340 miles. There are six ports on this coast. Her Majesty's Government understand that the French Admiral has a considerable force under his command, but I am not able to state the exact number of ships. Her Majesty's Government are in constant communication with their Representatives—Naval, Consular, and Diplomatic —on the spot; but they have not received any information from them casting doubt on the blockade being effective.

ARMY—SMALL ARMS—SUPPLY OF RIFLES FOR THE ARMY.

MR. TOMLINSON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether an improved rifle has been adopted for the Regular Forces; and, if so, when a distribution of Martini-Henry rifles amongst the Volunteers may be expected?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that a final decision upon the subject could only be arrived at when the Estimates to be submitted to Parliament were settled, and these were now under consideration.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he was not sure whether the reply of the noble Marquess referred to the first or the second part of the Question.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that the question of the distribution of rifles to the Volunteer Force could only be settled in connection with the question of the manufacture of rifles for the Reserve, which would be considerably depleted by that measure.

ARMY—VOLUNTEER OFFICERS—TRAVELLING EXPENSES.

MR. TOMLINSON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in preparing the Army Estimates for next year, he will make provision for the travelling expenses of those Volunteer officers who tender themselves for examination in tactics, and are consequently required to attend at the head quarters of the district for the purpose of undergoing the examination?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The examination is altogether optional, though, if passed, it secures a special capitation rate to the corps. Under these circumstances, I do not contemplate any change in the Regulation which requires the officer to pay his own travelling expenses. Under the present Rules, an officer belonging to a corps distant from the ordinary place of examination may have his examination at another station, if there be one more conveniently situated.

LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—DETENTION OF PRISONERS AT CHESTER.

MR. TATTON EGERTON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What steps he will take to prevent the recurrence of the circumstances by which, after the last train to Knutsford had left, two men and a woman and child, prisoners in charge of warders, were left at Chester on Friday 17th, and were, failing proper accommodation, put into unused unwarmed cells, without bedding or any convenience; what steps he will take, both for the proper security of prisoners conveyed daily by ordinary trains during quarter sessions and assizes between Knutsford and Chester, and for the comfort and protection of witnesses and the public who have to travel by these trains; whether he is aware that large gangs of prisoners, both untried and convicted, are paraded in the ordinary trains and in the streets of both towns; and, whether representations were made to him of the inconvenience likely to arise from the closing of Chester Gaol?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that the hon. Member had been misinformed as to the facts in that matter. The prisoners in question were detained in Chester owing to a late sitting of the Court of Quarter Sessions. They were comfortably lodged for the night in the civil prison, where they had every accommodation and convenience. The Governor stated that the prisoners were very comfortable; their cells were not cold, each of them was supplied with two pillows, two blankets, and three rugs. In future, as in that case, every attention would be paid when it was necessary, in rare cases, to keep the prisoners in Chester. With regard to the latter part of the Question, he could assure the hon. Member that the arrangements at Chester were the same as those always made in all the towns in the Kingdom where Quarter Sessions were held.

POST OFFICE—PURCHASE OF TELEPHONES.

MR. KENNY asked the Postmaster General, If it is a fact that a proposition has been made to Government to buy up the telephone interests of the United Telephone Company and its affiliated Companies at the sum of £2,000,000; is it true that, as stated in The Electrician of 25th October 1884 (p. 525), the Postmaster General has recently given a large order for Gower Bell telephones to the United Telephone Company, and is it true that the price to be paid by Government for these instruments is more than ten times the actual cost; is it true that a Law Officer of the Crown has given an opinion (advertised in The Times and other morning papers of 28th October) that there is a telephone which does not infringe the patents of the United Telephone Company; and, if so, whether, in the face of this opinion, the Postmaster General approves of paying such exorbitant prices to the United Telephone Company for the instruments he requires for the public service?

MR. FAWCETT: In reply to the hon. Member, I beg to say that no such proposition as that suggested for the purchase of the telephone interest of the United Telephone Company and its affiliated Companies has been made to me. An order for 250 Gower Bell telephones was given to the United Telephone Company on the 25th of May last; but the price to be paid is not 10 times, nor anything like 10 times, the actual cost. I should have been very glad if I could have got them cheaper than the price paid. The opinion of the Solicitor General, published in the papers, was not given in his official capacity as Law Adviser to the Government, and until I read it yesterday in the advertisements referred to I was not aware of it. This being so, I am unable at present to say what course it will be desirable to adopt with regard to the future purchase of telephones for the use of the Department.

NAVY—THE NORTH SEA FISHERIES.

MR. BIRKBECK asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he is aware that, since the commencement of September last, serious complaints have been made on behalf of the fishing interest of the East Coast of England, to the Admiralty authorities, on account of the insufficient protection given to the English drift net fisheries in the North Sea, whereby most serious losses have been incurred, from the destruction and loss of nets, &c. by Foreign trawlers; whether his attention has been called to a paragraph, in The Daily News of Tuesday last, under the head of Lowestoft, to the following effect:—

“Very great destruction of nets took place during the night, caused by Foreign trawlers towing their trawls through the fleet of herring nets. Eight boats report having sustained considerable damage by these trawlers, who take advantage of the absence of Government cruisers, so necessary during this time of the year, and in the most wilful manner destroy hundreds of pounds' worth of gear during the year. A very strong feeling exists on the subject among the fishermen;”

and, whether, taking into consideration the fact that considerably over 1,000 sail of English vessels are at the present time engaged in the drift net fisheries between the “Outer Dowsing” and “Gallop” Light Vessels; that the North Sea Fisheries Convention, as far as England is concerned, is becoming a dead letter from want of sufficient cruisers to enforce its provisions; and that both owners and fishermen are daily incurring heavy losses on account of Foreign depredations, he will forthwith order an adequate number of cruisers to be stationed on the grounds, and that the commanders of the vessels in question be instructed to call at the principal fishing ports for information from the Board of Trade and Custom House Authorities as to the latest reports of depredations? Before putting this Question I desire, with the permission of the House, to read two telegrams which I have received. One, which arrived last night, says—

“The outrages by Foreign trawlers to our fishermen have been, these last few nights, something fearful. Boats constantly arrive with great damage to the gear cut away—damage amounting to many thousand pounds. Trade paralysed. If these outrages by Foreign fishermen continue, fishing this season will be entirely ruined. Surely Government can find some means of protecting this great industry.”

That morning he received another telegram as follows:—

“Further arrival of our vessels with great loss of gear caused by Foreign trawlers. Have every reason to believe one Belgian trawler of Ostend has done £500 worth of damage alone. Some fishermen laying their vessels up, having lost all their gear.”

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: I am informed by the Admiral Superintendent of Naval Reserves that the cruisers detached for the protection of the Fisheries have been actively employed on that duty. Rear Admiral Douglas and Mr. Malan, of the Board of Trade, are specially engaged in drawing up a Report on the Fisheries, which will enable the Admiralty to determine what number of vessels may be permanently required for the protection of the Fisheries. In the meanwhile, two gunboats, the Sea

Mr. Kenny

Moss and Cherub, have been ordered on this service, in addition to the two cruisers already on the station.

FLOATING DRINK-SHOPS (NORTH SEA)—THE INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE.

MR. BIRKBECK asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the invitations for the International Conference at the Hague, relative to the floating drink-shops in the North Sea, have been issued by the Netherlands Government; and, if not, what has been the cause of the delay?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The Netherlands Government suggested that the Conference referred to by the hon. Member should meet this month; but the German Government asked that the meeting should be put off until the case of the Diadrich had been fully investigated, and the proceedings which it might be in the power of Her Majesty's Government to take against the British fishermen concerned in the attack on that vessel had been concluded. Under these circumstances, it is probable that the Conference will not meet before next spring.

WEST INDIES—ISLAND OF GRENADA—IMMIGRATION.

MR. DEASY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether, in view of the fact that immigration to the Island of Grenada has almost ceased, the Government will recommend the Local Government of Grenada that the Immigration Department, now uselessly maintained at a large annual cost, be abolished; if it is a fact that the Excise Duties were increased some years ago for the purpose of establishing a Grammar School; and, whether such a School has been established?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: A small number of immigrants had been applied for this year, and are now on their way to Grenada. The Royal Commissioners have recommended that ample provision be made for the continuance of immigration. Until it is decided whether the system is to continue, the Immigration Department, the cost of which is about £700 a year, cannot be abolished. The Excise Duty was increased to provide for the salary of the Lieutenant Governor, which had, up to that time, been paid by the Imperial Treasury, and to make up for general deficiency of revenue; but this increase was in no way connected with a proposal to establish a grammar school. Such a school had not yet been established.

THE WEST INDIES—CONFEDERATION OF THE WINDWARD ISLANDS.

MR. DEASY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the recommendation of the Royal Commissioners, dated April 1884, with regard to the Confederation of the Windward Islands, will be carried out; and, whether it is a fact that Sir William Robinson, Governor of the Windward Islands, in contravention of the forty-eighth article of the Royal Instructions, has become the purchaser of a tract of land in the Island of Grenada known as "Mardi Gras?"

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: No decision has yet been arrived at as to the confederation of the Windward Islands. No information that Sir William Robinson has purchased an estate in Grenada has reached the Colonial Office; but I may point out that the 48th Article of the Instructions referred to relates only to Crown lands, and Mardi Gras does not appear to be Crown land.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE CRIME DEPARTMENT OF DUBLIN

—MR. S. L. ANDERSON.

MR. O'BRIEN asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, How many and what offices Mr. Samuel Lee Anderson filled prior to his late removal from his offices in Dublin, and at what salaries his different employments were held; for what reasons he was deprived of his position in connection with the Crime Department at Dublin Castle, and of his position as acting Crown Solicitor at Green Street; whether he is to receive any compensation for the deprivation of these emoluments, or any increase of salary for the offices he still retains as Crown Solicitor for two counties; and, for what reasons he has been knighted?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): Sir Samuel Anderson held the offices of Crown Solicitor for Waterford and Kilkenny, and, in addition, he was employed in the Crimes Department of the Chief Secretary's Office at a salary of £500 a-year. Upon the recent retirement of his father he ceased to render any assistance at Green Street, and his employment in the Crimes Office was terminated upon the reorganization of that office. He has received no compensation for deprivation of emoluments, and no increase of salary. He was knighted in recognition of long and able services to the State.

MR. HEALY asked how it came to pass that a barrister could act as Crown Solicitor, as in this case?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, he saw nothing illegal in the fact. It had occurred in several instances.

MR. HEALY gave Notice that on Monday he would ask, Under what circumstances a barrister had come to be appointed as Crown Solicitor for Waterford and Kilkenny; and if the practice was to be extended?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, that Sir Samuel Anderson was not a barrister when he was appointed. He had been called to the Bar since then.

NAVY—THE DOCKYARDS—HAND-DRILLERS AT PORTSMOUTH.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the Board has received a Memorial from the hand-drillers in Portsmouth Dockyard; and, whether any decision has been arrived at in regard to their prayer?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: No Memorial has been received at the Admiralty from hand-drillers in Portsmouth Dockyard.

LIGHTHOUSES—TORY ISLAND.

MR. LEA asked the President of the Board of Trade, If the great difficulty of communicating with Tory Island after the recent disaster to the Wasp has proved the necessity of at once establishing telegraphic communications with the lighthouse on that Island?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, that Tory Island had upwards of 300 inhabitants, and was nearly 800 acres in extent. The question of telegraphic communication was one rather for the consideration of the Postmaster General than for the Lighthouse Authorities.

LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART—THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

MR. COOPE asked the First Commissioner of Works, What progress is being made in the buildings for the proposed extension of the National Gallery; and, whether the Government is prepared to take any, and, if so, what, steps in order to give further facilities for the admission of the public, and especially on week-day evenings?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The new buildings of the National Gallery are making satisfactory progress, and are being pushed on as rapidly as possible. I hope they will be complete within the time originally named. With regard to the opening of the Galleries at night, the matter is not under my control. The responsibility rests in the Trustees of the National Gallery; and, as I stated last year, the Trustees, having regard to the preservation of the pictures, are not in favour of lighting the Gallery at night.

MR. COOPE: In consequence of the unsatisfactory nature of the reply to the latter part of my Question, I beg to give Notice that on the earliest opportunity I shall move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, every facility should be afforded to the public for visiting the great National Collections of the British Museum and the National Gallery, and that it is expedient that steps be taken without delay to give admission to the public on at least three week-day evenings in each week till 10 o'clock.”

CRIMINAL LAW (IRELAND)—THE CORNWALL TRIAL.

MR. SEXTON asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, If it is the fact that none of the jurors who came up to be sworn in the conspiracy case of the Queen against G. C. Cornwall (late Secretary to the General Post Office, Dublin), and Martin Oranmore Kirwan (late Captain, Galway Militia), were challenged or directed to stand aside by the Crown; and, whether the Crown will pursue a similar course in the cases of Mr. P. M. Fitzgerald and the Tubbercurry prisoners?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): The Question only appeared on the Paper to-day, and I am unable to ascertain what course was taken by the Crown in the cases referred to. But whatever course may have been taken in the case of Cornwall and Kirwan, the case of P. M. Fitzgerald and the Tubbercurry prisoners must be judged of when it arises, and I cannot anticipate what course the Crown will take then.

MR. SEXTON gave Notice that, to-morrow, he would repeat the Question, and if the answer was not satisfactory he would move the insertion of words in the Address assuring Her Majesty that it was highly desirable, in the interests of public justice, that the Criminal Law in Ireland should be administered with more impartiality between all classes of the people.

LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES) — TRIAL OF NORTH WALES PRISONERS.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the dissatisfaction of the people of North Wales, as expressed in the local newspapers, with the arrangement according to which prisoners admitted to bail, as well as those actually in custody, are now liable to be sent for trial to Chester; and, whether he will take such steps as may be necessary for the trial of North Wales prisoners in North Wales?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that he had had no special Notice of that matter. The arrangements with reference to the Circuits were made by the Lord Chancellor, in consultation with the Judges. He understood that the arrangements that had been made were more or less of an experimental character. He dared say that dissatisfaction was caused in North Wales or elsewhere, because, where there was what was called an Associate Assize, that was a combination of places for which Assizes were to be held, all the places where they were not held were dissatisfied. But it was necessary that that dissatisfaction should be endured, on account of the public convenience of the combination.

EGYPT—QUARANTINE.

MR. PUGH asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is the fact that formerly through passengers between England and India, though coming from an infected port, were passed through Egypt by the Egyptian Railway, under certain special quarantine regulations, but without any delay; when the course of detaining such passengers in Egypt was first adopted;

whether any evil resulted from the former plan, or whether any better result has been obtained by detaining such passengers in Egypt, as at present; and, whether there is any, and what, prospect of the through passenger traffic from England, via Brindisi, being again carried by the Egyptian Railway without delay?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I regret that I am unable to answer this Question without referring to Sir Evelyn Baring. A despatch on this point will be addressed to him by to-morrow's mail, and when his reply is received a communication will be made to the hon. Member.

NAVY—THE CHINA SEA SQUADRON.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of the Government to strengthen our Naval Forces in the China Seas?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: I am not prepared to state what are the intentions of the Government with regard to strengthening our Squadron in the China Seas. I may, however, say that the Agamemnon, which is already commissioned, has been ordered to China.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT: My Question is one of some importance to the country, and I should like to have an answer from the Prime Minister.

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. and gallant Baronet asks me a Question relating to a matter which is arranged between the Foreign Office and the Admiralty. My Office affords me a sufficient quantity of occupation; and I am not indisposed to ask my hon. Friends who represent other Departments in this House to answer Departmental Questions.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT: Then I beg to address the Question to the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I communicated with the Admiralty on this subject, because the Question appeared to me to be one in connection with it. I think that if any hon. Member will look at the Question he will see that it is so. I am, however, quite willing to give the hon. and gallant Member any information in my power to-morrow, with the permission of the Secretary of State.

Mr. GORST asked whether there was any truth in the statement which had appeared in the newspapers that the Agamemnon could not steer, and must undergo extensive alterations before going to sea?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: If my hon. and learned Friend will give Notice of the Question, I will answer it. The Question relates to the Professional Department of the Admiralty.

SCOTLAND—CROFTERS AND COTTARS IN THE HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS
—LAND LAW REFORM.

Mr. MACFARLANE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If his attention has been called to the serious and increasing agitation in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, upon the question of the amelioration of the condition of the Crofters and Cottars; and, if he is prepared to make a statement as to when Her Majesty's Government propose to legislate upon the question?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: My attention has been called to the serious agitation in the Highlands and Islands, and I regret to learn that acts of disobedience to the law have occurred there, and are threatened. I am sure that the hon. Member will agree with me that those who counsel and encourage such acts are the worst friends of the crofters, and are not promoting their interests. I think it necessary to say, in the present state of things, that conduct of this kind cannot be tolerated; and it must be known that it is the duty of the Local Authorities, with the entire support of the Executive Government, to take such measures as may be necessary to enforce the law and maintain order. That is my answer to the first part of the Question, with reference to serious agitation. As regards the second part, I can tell the hon. Member, who is aware, that the whole of this subject is engaging the careful and anxious attention of the Government; but it is quite impossible for me at this moment to make any statement with reference to legislation on this subject.

Mr. MACFARLANE: The right hon. and learned Gentleman will remember that last year—"Order!"

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member wishes to put a Question, he can do so.

Mr. MACFARLANE: I beg to ask the Prime Minister, whether it is within his recollection that a printed anonymous Circular, recommending illegal acts, came into my possession, and was passed on by me to the Government, with a desire that they should take steps for their suppression? That disposes of the question as far as I am concerned. With regard to the answer of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, he says that the subject is engaging the attention of the Government; but some months ago I received the same answer, and it was to allay this agitation that I put my Question.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The hon. Member can hardly expect that I should state what legislation is contemplated on the subject, nor can he expect that at this moment I should be able to state when it will be brought forward. He knows what the present state of things is with reference to Public Business, and any statement of the kind on my part would be illusory.

Mr. O'BRIEN: May I ask whether there is any intention of employing Mr. Clifford Lloyd in the Highlands?

THE RELIEF OF KHARTOUM.

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the disclosures contained in the recently-published blue books that food and ammunition are now failing at Khartoum, orders will be given to Lord Wolseley to advance with all speed for the relief of General Gordon at Khartoum?

Mr. GLADSTONE: Full instructions have been given to General Lord Wolseley as to the purpose of his mission; and we, having perfect confidence in his ability and skill, are very unwilling to interfere or to limit his discretion by giving him directions which might be inopportune; but preparations are actively being carried on for the purpose of enabling an advance to be made.

THE MINISTRY—PERSONAL OPINIONS OF MEMBERS NOT IN THE CABINET—MR. COURTNEY AND SOUTH AFRICA.

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I wish to be allowed to ask a Question of which I have given the Prime Minister private Notice. My Question is, Whether the statement made by the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies yesterday, that the views of his Colleague the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), with regard to South Africa, were held only by himself among Ministers, was made on the authority of the Cabinet?

MR. GLADSTONE: There was no previous communication between my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies and myself upon that subject. I understood my hon. Friend to give his own opinion as to the particular views entertained by my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury on a particular subject. But with regard to the general question of repudiation of the opinion of Colleagues, I must say that my understanding has always been with regard to Members of the Government, not in the Cabinet, that their responsibility for particular measures began when they were called upon to take part in Parliament in respect to the proposals upon them outside the particular limits of their own duty.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I am about to throw myself upon the indulgence of the House. I was betrayed into a statement with respect to an individual which involved a criminal charge. I will state the words I used. They were—

"I would merely say that I am informed that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade was not present at the Aston riots; that Mr. Schnadhorst was not present, but that the leaders of the riots were from South Staffordshire, and were led by Mr. Tangye."

Obviously the charge of leading such a riot as that involves a criminal charge. I have received the following letter from Mr. Tangye, which, with the permission of the House, I will read:—

"Gilberstone, Bickenhill, near Birmingham, October 23, 1884.

"Dear Sir,—You were good enough to mention my name in the House last night. Allow me to inform you that whoever gave you your information about me, gave you false information, a course of proceeding not unusual with Birmingham (and other) Tories.—I am, yours truly, RICHARD TANGYE, London.

"C. N. NEWDEGATE, Esq."

I beg to thank the House for having allowed me to read this letter, and to state that, though inaccurate, my information did not come exclusively from Birmingham Tories.

OF THE DAY—IRISH INDUSTRIES.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he observed a Notice of Motion on the Paper by which the Government were to have precedence over Orders of the Day and Notices of Motions for the different stages of the Representation of the People Bill. He had a Motion down for Tuesday next, which was of very great interest to the people of Ireland, and in regard to which he might say he had, he believed, the unanimous support of the Irish Members, in addition to having the whole Irish Press, and, he believed, the whole Irish people. That Motion asked for a Select Committee to inquire into the condition of Irish Industries. His object was merely to have the Committee appointed this Session, in order that next Session their labours might commence. He would ask the Prime Minister, whether he had not heard him say that where the wishes of any people were almost unanimous, and did not conflict with any Constitutional principle, he thought the wishes of that people ought to be considered? In deference to the right hon. Gentleman's own judgment—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is not entitled to enter into debatable matter.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT: The Question is a long one, and I must apologize. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he can give me any facility to bring forward my Motion?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was not prepared to say—and he thought he should be departing from the distinct engagements under which they lay to the House if he were to say—that in reference to a day for a particular Motion they would consent not to ask the precedence which they intended to ask for the stages of the Representation of the People Bill. No doubt, the Motion touched a subject of great importance. But there were many other subjects of great importance in respect of which a similar request might be made. What he suggested to the hon. Baronet was that he thought this question might very well stand over until they had disposed in that House of the stages of the Representation of the People Bill. The hon. Baronet had stated that he did not look for making practical progress this Session by the sitting of the Committee; and he could not suppose it improbable that after the stages of the Representation of the People Bill had been disposed of the hon. Baronet might find an opportunity for moving his Motion, or for putting to him a Question, which he should not then find the same difficulty in answering.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT: I beg to withdraw my Notice of Motion, and give Notice that I will bring it on in Committee of Supply.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.

MR. GLADSTONE: I beg leave to move that the consideration of the second reading of the Representation of the People Bill be postponed until tomorrow.

Motion agreed to.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked, On what day the Government proposed to move the second reading of the Representation of the People Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE: I cannot say when the debate on the Address will close, and I am unwilling to surrender any chance, subject to the engagement I have made, as to the time for bringing on the Motion.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.] [SIXTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Main Question [23rd October,] "That, &c."—[See page 69.]

Main Question again proposed.

AMENDMENT (LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL)—THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, in rising to move the following Amendment to the Address:—

"And humbly to assure Her Majesty that this House regrets to find in recent speeches and actions of one of Her Majesty's Ministers, holding the high office of President of the Board of Trade, an incitement to interference with the freedom of political discussion, and a justification of riot and disorder," said: Perhaps the House will allow me to express my thanks to the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. W. Redmond) for his courtesy in kindly allowing me to bring forward this Motion. Such courtesies are not so very common among Members of Parliament, and when they occur they merit the warmest acknowledgment. I saw in one of the newspapers this morning one of those extraordinary paragraphs which always profess to know beforehand exactly what every Member of the Government is going to say on every important matter, to the effect that the Prime Minister intended to take the earliest opportunity of protesting in the most emphatic manner against the conduct of a Minister of the Crown being impugned on the occasion of the debate on the Address. I do not know whether that is so or not; I should think it was not so, because I believe the House will admit that if any charge is to be brought against a Minister of the Crown, particularly one of the first rank, the debate on the Address is the most Constitutional method that can be selected for bringing it forward. My apologies for bringing this matter before the House are these. In the first place, the riots at Aston excited an enormous amount of public attention, almost more attention than any other event since Parliament rose. I am only talking of the excitement as shown by the fact that this riot was discussed and commented on throughout the whole of the Press of the country, for several days, and has excited, if possible, more attention than the remarkable progress of the Prime Minister in Scotland, though, of course, its origin and nature has always been the subject of great controversy. My next apology is, that if I had not taken this opportunity no other opportunity would have been likely to have occurred for a very considerable time, because it is well known that the House will soon occupy the whole of its time with the Franchise Bill. Sir, in bringing forward the Amendment, it occurred to me that it would not have been right for me to bring a direct charge, which I feel is one of great gravity, against a Minister without giving the House the opportunity of pronouncing by a Division on the merits of the charge, and that, I imagine, can only be done by moving an Amendment to the Address. But my principle reason for bringing this Motion forward is found in the words which fell from the Prime Minister himself on the first night of the Session—words of a most remarkable character, which I will now read to the House. But before doing so, I may, perhaps, be allowed to express the hope that a Parliamentary discussion of these events at Aston may have the good effect of preventing a repetition of anything of the kind in the course of the political controversy which is now agitating the country. The Prime Minister's words were these—

"I wish to record in the strongest manner my disapproval, my grief, I may say my grave condemnation of all breaches of order in connection with this question, even under circumstances of temptation or even incitement. The line between order and disorder is a definite one. The question of what is incitement or provocation is open to dispute. I should condemn any disorder in point of policy, and I should condemn it on principle even if I did not believe it to be inexpedient. On this subject I feel certain I speak the sentiments of all my Colleagues."

When I heard these words fall from the Prime Minister, I felt that nothing that has ever fallen from him ever gave me such a graphic and forcible representation of the enormous amount of labour in connection with the government of a country which falls on the shoulders of the Prime Minister, because it was at once clear and conclusive to me that, when he said he spoke the sentiments of all his Colleagues, he had never had time to read a single speech delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain), for I shall be able to show the House that, as far as that expression "all my Colleagues" is concerned, the Prime Minister was, of course, unintentionally, entirely inaccurate, and that he did not speak the sentiments of his Colleague the President of the Board of Trade. This question raises the doctrine—I believe a comparatively modern doctrine, but which is now a Constitutional doctrine, and which for the last two or three years has been very much set aside—namely, the doctrine of collective

Ministerial responsibility—whether it is open for the Head of the Government to lay down a certain course of conduct which shall be followed by himself and his Colleagues, and whether that course of conduct is to be deliberately set aside on many occasions by one of his Colleagues acting as the spokesman of the Government. Now, I think I shall be able to prove to the House, by extracts from the speeches of the President of the Board of Trade, a deliberate, systematic attempt, commencing immediately after Parliament rose, and pursued, I regret to say, up to the last point of the Recess, to incite the people of this country to riot and disorder. ["Oh, oh!" and cheers.] I ask the House, before they reply positively, to wait till I lay before them what I rely upon. I think I shall be able to prove that he is morally guilty, morally responsible, for whatever riots have taken place, or may take place in the immediate future. There is a term in the French law, not, I think, existing in the English law, under which an indictment can be framed founded upon moral complicity. That is to say, that a person who writes and publishes an incendiary article, or delivers an inflammatory speech, pointing to certain results, if followed by those results, can be charged with moral complicity; and that is one of the charges I bring against the President of the Board of Trade—such moral complicity with those riots. I will go further, and charge the President of the Board of Trade with direct responsibility. The strength of the case I wish to lay before the House I base principally upon the speeches of the President of the Board of Trade during the last few months. That is the point on which I most wish to insist, so that, even apart from those Aston riots, apart from any evidence I may bring before the House to show connection between the President of the Board of Trade and such riots, I still contend that I should have been justified in moving this Amendment. As I shall not have the right of reply to the President of the Board of Trade, and as he was undoubtedly very anxious that I should not have it, I will endeavour to anticipate the line of answer he will take. In the first place, I will venture to say this much—that to the matter I shall bring under the notice of the House it is no answer for the President of the Board of Trade to adopt what may be called the tu quoque argument. The kind of argument which is summed up in the expression "You're another," may be very effective and very amusing for the purposes of Parliamentary debate, but I do not think it will be sufficient to clear the character of a Minister of the Crown. Everyone will recognize the difference between the position occupied by the President of the Board of Trade and that of a private Member of Parliament. The difference is enormous as regards the responsibility attaching to each. In case the tu quoque line of argument should be followed by the right hon. Gentleman, perhaps the House will permit me to say that, even if it be considered by some hon. Members applicable for the purposes of debate, for myself I should claim the indulgence of the House to this extent, that I challenge hon. Gentlemen to find in any single speech of mine made in the country a single word or expression which would not have passed the criticism of the Chair. [Cries of "Oh!"] Well, I make that challenge to the House. I am not aware of ever having used a single expression which would call for rebuke or comment from the highest censor of Parliamentary language. I also think that it will not do for the President of the Board of Trade to assert that the extracts which I am going to quote from his speeches do not possess any serious meaning. That may be a line of argument most undignified for a Minister of the Crown to adopt, and one very damaging to him, for his audiences, wherever they may be, or whoever they may be, would know in future that all the declarations which he might make, and all the political harangues which he might make, would be nothing but froth and flummery, and possess no serious meaning. Nor do I think it would do for the President of the Board of Trade to say that his expressions were in the nature of a warning; for if that is the line, the unanswerable criticism I would pass on that would be that these warnings were couched in such language, and these prophecies were supported by such recollections and metaphors, that they had an irresistible and inevitable tendency to fulfil themselves. Now, Sir, shortly before Parliament rose there was a great demonstration of the Liberal Party at Birmingham, to which I will attach as much importance as any hon. Member opposite likes to attach. [Cries of "Bank Holiday!"] Well, on Bank Holiday—[Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: The 4th of August]—it was just about the time Parliament rose. The President of the Board of Trade was in attendance at that demonstration and made a long speech, in which find the following paragraph:—

"The opinion of the streets has had a mighty force in our political history. It has shaken Monarchs on their thrones. [A Voice: 'And knocked them off.' Laughter.] It has overturned Ministers. ['Hear, hear!'] In 1832 it carried the Reform Bill in the teeth of the House of Lords—[A Voice: 'And will again']—more powerful than that with which we have to deal, after a conflict which had brought the country almost to the verge of revolution. We read that at that time there were 100,000 men in Birmingham and the surrounding districts who were sworn to march on London, if need were, in defence of their liberties. [Cries of 'We will again if required.'] The peace was broken in many parts of the country, and there were at Derby, Nottingham, and Bristol fierce outbreaks of popular passion, accompanied by a great destruction of property. We had hoped that we had left those days of disorder far behind; but there are still evil counsellors"—

[Chears.] Might I throw out with the greatest possible respect to hon. Members opposite, that the brevity of these proceedings will be best attained—and what I wish most of all, the brevity of my own remarks—if they will allow their expressions of approval to be taken for granted? The right hon. Gentleman went on—

"But there are still evil counsellors—[Cheers—provoking and slandering the people—[Cheers—who are straining their privileges to the utmost, and who obstinately resist the extension of the popular liberties. Let them take heed. If we are commencing this great conflict with temper and moderation, it would be a mistake to suppose that we are less earnest or resolute than our forefathers."

I believe the right hon. Gentleman will not contest the accuracy of that report, and on that I will make this remark! It seems to me that, as far as the style of rhetoric is concerned, it is rather poor stuff. When compared with the oratory of the Prime Minister, to which we are accustomed, it seems to me to be rather like the clanging of a cracked tin pot compared with the harmony of a great orchestra. But this is a mere criticism en passant. Whatever importance the passage quoted possesses is derived entirely from the Ministerial position which the speaker occupies. I would like to ask hon. Members opposite, with little hope, however, of a favourable answer, whether they think it altogether in accordance with Ministerial tradition for a Minister of the Crown—a servant of a Monarch—to state that “the opinion of the streets had shaken Monarchs on the Throne?” For my own part, I am inclined to think the taste was questionable. I wish to ask the attention of the House to the interjections of the audience. I remember that one of the gravest accusations against the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) and his Colleagues in this House from the Ministerial Bench, and which accusation, when brought, was always cheered to the echo by hon. Members opposite, was the grave impropriety of their conduct in not rebuking the audience for the interjections they made. I find that after the sentence of the President of the Board of Trade about shaking Monarchs on their Thrones, there was a voice—“And knocked them off.” The President of the Board of Trade passed that interjection by, apparently thinking that it was a very natural one under the circumstances. I find, also, that when he reminded his audience that 100,000 men in Birmingham and districts were sworn to march on London in defence of their liberties, that was met with the cries of—“And we will again if required.” Again the President of the Board of Trade did not think it necessary to remark on the interjections of his audience. What I want to know is, why it is wrong for the hon. Member for the City of Cork and his Colleagues to provoke, and not rebuke, excited interjunctory observations from their audiences in Ireland, and why it is right of the President of the Board of Trade to provoke similar observations, and not to take the smallest notice of them? I see no reason why a different standard should be applied to the Irish Party to that applied to Members of the Government. If anything, I think the more rigorous standard should be applied to Ministers of the Crown than to private Members. Well, when the President of the Board of Trade gets up, will he tell the House what would happen to an Irish Member who, in discussing the question of self-government in Ireland, for instance, reminded his audience with the same amount of detail and vigour of the incidents of the Rebellion of 1798? When the President of the Board of Trade says that there are evil counsellors who are provoking and slandering the people, and that they should take heed, I want to know what those expressions mean in the mouth of a Minister of the Crown? Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that it would be a great mistake to suppose that he, as a Minister of the Crown, thought that the audience listening to him were not as determined as the people who, in 1832, marched upon London in defence of their liberties. [Cries of “No!” and “Hear, hear!”] I defy any hon. Member to put any other construction upon the words. “Our forefathers”—what did our forefathers do? Our forefathers were prepared to march on London in defence of their liberties, and to break the peace in many parts of the country, and to accomplish a great destruction of property. Of course, if the President of the Board of Trade is going to take up the line that all this means nothing, I shall have nothing further to say; but I shall be surprised if the right hon. Gentleman makes such a reply. Well, that was the speech made on Bank Holiday at Birmingham by the right hon. Gentleman, and I contend that that was the first incitement to the people to pass the bounds of fair and peaceable political discussion, and to have recourse to other modes of agitation. After that speech the utterances of the right hon. Gentleman ceased for a time. I think he went on a little tour in Europe, in company with the hon. Member for Ipswich. When he came back, in the last days of September or at the beginning of October, he was, I think I can see, in the speech he made at Hanley, greatly surprised and much disappointed to find that no disturbance of the peace had taken place. In his speech at Hanley I discover not only a further incitement to public tumult, but as it were a rebuke to his audience for not having acted on his previous advice. At Hanley the right hon. Gentleman used these words—

“Our opponents have not dared to hold one free and open meeting except one at Darlington, where they were defeated by a large majority, and one at Bournemouth, when they attempted a procession which was incontinently broken up.'

Why do not hon. Members opposite cheer that? [Radical cheers.] Here we have the President of the Board of Trade stating with great satisfaction and delight that the Conservative Party had not dared to hold one free and open meeting. Well, what is the construction to be put upon that? The advice to the audience was that, if the Conservatives in Hanley or anywhere else were to try to hold a free and open meeting, the Radicals ought to break it up. Then to show that I am not mistaken the right hon. Gentleman said with still more satisfaction and delight that the Conservatives at Bournemouth had attempted a procession, which had been broken up to his immense gratification. [Cries of "Oh!" and "Hear, hear!"] [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I did not say that.] Well, then, why did not the right hon. Gentleman express one single word of regret for what had occurred? Why did he not use language like that of the Prime Minister, when he said that the line between order and disorder was a definite one? Why could not the President of the Board of Trade spare one word of regret for the fact that free and open political discussion had been interfered with at Bournemouth? I do contend that that expression of the right hon. Gentleman at Hanley was a distinct intimation as to the line his audience were to adopt whenever the Conservatives held a free and open meeting. I will not waste the time of the House by contesting the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that we have not dared to hold free and open meetings, although I could, if I had time, contest it and make my contest good. The President of the Board of Trade then went on to say—

"How long is this state of effervescence and agitation, which is rapidly degenerating into irritation, to last? These great gatherings are only held at considerable inconvenience; they effect a great disturbance of ordinary business; they involve much personal sacrifice; and as the summer leaves us and winter draws on, they will involve still more inconvenience and annoyance."

These expressions remind me of a speech delivered by Judge Keogh, when Mr. Keogh, in which he said that a good time was coming, when the nights would be long and the days short, and when his hearers would have a fine opportunity of showing their political sympathies.

"Oh, oh!" I see an ominous parallel between the words of the President of the Board of Trade and the expressions used by Mr. Keogh. I would observe, with regard to the statement that the agitation was rapidly degenerating into irritation, that this view is quite peculiar to the President of the Board of Trade. It does not appear that any of his Colleagues discovered that the agitation was to degenerate into irritation; but if it was so to degenerate, was it not the right hon. Gentleman's duty to allay the irritation? The right hon. Gentleman, however, goes on to stimulate it to the utmost. He says—

"I can appreciate the views of those who dread what they call the democratic tendencies of the age, but I cannot appreciate or respect the course of men who, sharing these convictions and prejudices to the full, endeavour to conceal them by fulsome professions of regard for the men whom all the while they are endeavouring to defraud of their rights."

That is a serious charge for a Minister of the Crown to bring against his opponents, particularly when he says that the agitation is rapidly degenerating into irritation. He charges the whole of his opponents practically with being political liars, engaged in a conspiracy to defraud the people of their rights. I leave it to the House and the public to say whether such a charge can be entertained by any reasonable man. Now I come to the gem of the speech. "These gentlemen," said the President of the Board of Trade, meaning those who are engaged in this conspiracy—

"These gentlemen presume on your love of order and hatred of violence. Unless this generation has lost other qualities which have made the name of Englishmen respected throughout the world, they will show a courage and resolution, a love of liberty and hatred of injustice, which will sweep away those puny obstacles which now for a time are barring the advancing tide."

Now, there is no mental exercise more wholesome than endeavouring to see ourselves as others see us. [Ironical Ministerial cheers.] Those cheers encourage me to express my gratitude to hon. Members opposite for the invaluable assistance they always afford me in that respect. I will show the House the way in which the speech of the President of the Board of Trade is viewed in the Sister Isle. The journal called United Ireland places this passage side by side with another statement which was made in Ireland in 1883 by the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington). I have read to you the passage in the speech of the President of the Board of Trade, and I will now read the statement of the hon. Member for Westmeath, which is as follows:—

"I will ask the tenant farmers to come forward generously and give the labourers a fair day's wages for a fair day's work. If not, the agitation which has been carried on on their behalf will be turned against them."

Perhaps hon. Members opposite think there is no analogy between the two speeches. Now, in order that hon. Members opposite may see themselves as others see them, I will ask the House for permission to read a few comments which have appeared in the journal which I have already mentioned in these two passages—

"For the above two sentences Mr. Harrington was degraded to the level of a convict in a common gaol, with a deal board for his bed, and nauseous draughts of poison cocoa for his food. Will the Cabinet of the 'Even Keel' deal out equal measure to the inventor of that pretty nickname? Will Mr. Chamberlain be invited to step down from his saloon carriage, pluck the orchid from his button-hole, and don the rough but servicable habiliments of the Birmingham penitentiary? Will Mr. Traveyan oblige by vindicating that step to the great British public, on the ground (all sufficient in Mr. Harrington's case) that Mr. Chamberlain is a 'formidable man'? For incendiary suggestiveness 'their Joe's' language outstrips beyond comparison our Tim's. Nobody ever contended that the harming of as much as a fly had resulted, or could reasonably be apprehended to result, from Mr. Harrington's threat to bring public opinion to bear against the farmers. Mr. Chamberlain's constituents, on the contrary, instantly made an honest English translation of his words into bludgeons and scaling ladders, and proceeded to (in Mr. Chamberlain's phrase) 'make their own application' of his apologue. The 'puny obstacle' which barred the way to the Tory meeting ground in Aston Gardens, on Monday night, was a stone wall, and the Liberal lambs 'swept it away'—broke a gap six feet wide in it—and went for the 'Tory parasites' with battering rams and legs of chairs. By 'violent pressure' of this kind Mr. Chamberlain's disciples routed Sir Stafford Northcote and Lord Randolph Churchill from their platform, exploded their fireworks, and beat their followers about the head, and then went away to peruse glowing accounts of their achievements in the next morning's Liberal papers. The police who were in attendance civilly looked on, and said it was good. Of course, Mr. Chamberlain's skin is safe; but the next time he feels inclined to lecture us on our lack of appreciation of the 'Even Keel' régime, let him contrast the sacred right of skull-cracking enjoyed by himself and his braves with what would happen to Mr. Harrington and his braves if perchance he hurled a speech containing half as many fiery epithets against the Tory demonstration next Monday night in the Rotundo, and if on the spur of his incitements a Nationalist mob burst into the Round Room, sent the audience flying helter-skelter, and employed the chairs and the reporters' table on the heads of the orators."

I do not think anybody will venture to say that these comments of United Ireland I have quoted are, in the smallest degree, exaggerated or untrue. The result of that speech at Hanley, on the 10th of October, was clearly seen in the events at Birmingham on the 13th. On the 18th of October the right hon. Gentleman goes down to Wales, and makes a speech at Newtown, and in the course of that speech he says—

"These demonstrations have been carried through at great personal sacrifice. You cannot be continually demonstrating, especially as, in the case I have assumed, your demonstrations prove to be of no effect. If the Lords continue to sneer at orderly manifestations of opinion, if they continue to ignore the Constitutional methods for expressing opinion, what will you do?"

And then it appeared to have occurred to the right hon. Gentleman that he had gone a little too far, so he goes on in this way—

"I dare say that on Monday it will be said, as it has been said already, that, in thus trying to lay the situation plainly before you, I am inciting you to violence and disorder. That is false."

Was it false? Remember there had been great violence, and that this was immediately after the Aston riots—only five days later—when the right hon. Gentleman solemnly asked his audience what they would do if they got tired of these peaceable demonstrations, and then said it was false to assert that that interrogatory of his was an incitement to violence and disorder. If the right hon. Gentleman was so anxious about violence and disorder, why did he not take the opportunity of expressing his regret at the events that had taken place on the Monday previous? I do not think it would be wrong or shameful for the right hon. Gentleman to do what the Prime Minister took the first opportunity of doing. The moment the House met, the Prime Minister, in his first speech, took the earliest opportunity of expressing his regret for what had occurred. In the absence of any expressions of regret on the part of the President of the Board of Trade after that very stimulating interrogatory to his audience, I say he did do that which constituted a direct incitement to continued violence and disorder. The President of the Board of Trade, without one word of allusion to the Birmingham riots, goes on to say—

“There are only two men in this country who throughout the quarrel have conspicuously incited the people to disorder and to violence.”

One of them was myself, and the other was Lord Salisbury. I will not detain the House with any defence of myself for the purpose of this discussion. I will put in any plea hon. Members opposite wish. It is not necessary for me to detain the House with any defence of myself; that can be done on another and more convenient occasion. But those are the three speeches of the President of the Board of Trade. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite have just reminded me, by their laughter, that I had forgotten something to which I attach a great deal of importance. I refer to the passage where the President of the Board of Trade said, referring to me—

“And, gentlemen, this is the man who is now so indignant because the workmen of Birmingham have taken him at his word and pulled off the coping of a wall in order to attend a meeting to which they had been invited and which the Tory managers were endeavouring by a transparent fraud to palm off as a misrepresentation of the opinion of Birmingham.”

That is his opinion of the Aston riots. Pulling off the coping of a wall! Now, I will ask the President of the Board of Trade only one question on that point. Suppose the workmen of Birmingham, indignant we will say at some of the proceedings of the Board of Trade, had assembled outside the grounds of the right hon. Gentleman's splendid mansion at Highbury, and had there pursued the same proceedings as they had done at Aston, I wish to know whether he would have described that as a few workmen of Birmingham pulling off the coping of a wall? I do not think it necessary to pursue that subject further; but those three speeches which I have laid before the House are undoubtedly what I principally rely on to justify my charges. I am quite content in this matter to make the Prime Minister the judge, because he has, without exception, had the longest political experience, the greatest knowledge of public life of any man in this country, and his position is so great that he can afford in judging this matter altogether to discard all Party proclivities, and to pronounce an historical opinion on it. Since 1815 this country has gone through many sharp political struggles, in which Ministers of the Crown have taken a leading and prominent part, and I ask the Prime Minister whether, in going through all the records of the speeches delivered by Ministers of the Crown up to the present day in moments of political excitement, he can or anyone can produce a single speech from any Minister of the Crown containing passages approaching in their nature to the sentences from the speeches of the President of the Board of Trade which I have read to the House? I put that question to the Prime Minister with much confidence. But, independent of these passages, which, I maintain, do constitute a deliberate attempt to incite the people of this country to other methods than that of Constitutional agitation, I will now, if the House will allow me, endeavour to confirm and corroborate the case by other evidence I have got of the direct responsibility of the President of the Board of Trade for the Birmingham riots. The first portion of the evidence is of a negative character, the second portion is of a positive character. My first point of negative evidence is this—that on the evening of those riots, immediately after they occurred, and even on the very spot, I made a speech to a few scattered and flying sheep who had been rescued from the disaster, in which I charged the President of the Board of Trade directly and plainly, and without the slightest circumlocution or qualification, with being the author of those riots. I was acquainted with what the President of the Board of Trade had said, and with other matters, and I made the charge then and there, and that charge has never been denied. [Laughter.] I do not know why hon. Members opposite should laugh at that. Surely the President of the Board of Trade, only as late as Monday last, did think proper to deny it; and I want to know why, if it was necessary to deny it on Monday last, it was not necessary to deny it when it was originally made? The right hon. Gentleman said it was a serious charge to make against a Minister of the Crown. I think I am not mistaken in supposing that he was obliged to make that denial by the Prime Minister himself. [Mr. GLADSTONE: No.] Well, then, I reiterate it, that the President of the Board of Trade said on that occasion that it was a most serious charge to make against a Minister of the Crown. Why was it a serious charge then, and not when it was first made? The President of the Board of Trade had lots of opportunity for denying it. In the first place, there was a meeting the next night of the Liberal Association in the Town Hall, and it would have been quite possible for the President of the Board of Trade to have attended that meeting where all his Birmingham colleagues were assembled, and to have made a statement about the riots, either deprecating them or justifying them, or exonerating himself. It would have been perfectly competent for the President of the Board of Trade to have written to the local papers or to the London papers denying the charge. It would have been perfectly competent for the President of the Board of Trade, at his meeting on the Saturday following in Wales, to deny the charge; and yet he did not. He can, however, deny charges when he likes and when it suits him, because with reference to some charges which I made against the Birmingham Corporation being under the influence of the Caucus, and which are really of no interest except to Birmingham itself, and could not compare with charges affecting the character of a Minister of the Crown, the President of the Board of Trade thought fit to deny them. He said that what I stated was "a falsehood, a wanton falsehood." Well, I am sure hon. Gentlemen opposite do not think it necessary for Ministers to deny in language of that kind. I think in the House of Commons, under your rule, Sir, the President of the Board of Trade will hardly make use of such language. But he could deny the charge brought against the Birmingham Corporation in language of that offensive character, and yet did not deny the charge brought against him as a Minister of the Crown. Of course, with respect to the expressions "falsehood" and "wanton falsehood," I could have brought them under the notice of this House if I had liked, but I did not think it worth while to do so. I knew the President of the Board of Trade was used to that kind of expression. The right hon. Gentleman applied a somewhat similar expression to Lord Beaconsfield when he said that he always went down to Parliament prepared to fling at the House of Commons the first lie that came into his head. I know that he again applied almost the same expression to the Prime Minister when he characterized his election address of 1874—a great public State document—as

and then he went on to say that the Premier's interest in such a great question as the county franchise was merely assumed in view of an election. Of course, when expressions of that kind are applied to men far above me, and they take no notice of them, I do not think it necessary to answer a charge of wanton falsehood made against me, and I shall content myself with assuring him that nothing which I have said is liable to that imputation. I find—on looking back to a Times article of August, 1879, immediately after the right hon. Gentleman made a speech in Gloucester, in which he compared the late Government to a gang of celebrated swindlers and criminals called a "long firm"—that The Times made the following comments:—

"Mr. Chamberlain's denunciation of the Government and of his opponents must be denounced as passing the bounds of decent political warfare. . . . We cannot let this kind of language pass without an indignant protest against it as an insult to the whole public life of England. . . . We feel for our part ashamed that any English politician who holds a respectable position should condescend to this kind of Billingsgate."

I daresay that right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite do not care very much about the opinions of The Times. ["Hear, hear!"] No more do I. I only quoted it for the purpose of showing that there is no reason whatever, as far as I am concerned, why I should attach any importance to the violent language of the President of the Board of Trade, as it is usual with him. In the speech at Newtown, the right hon. Gentleman, so far from denying the accusations I had publicly made against him, justified and virtually gloried in the riots that had taken place at Aston, and he did so at a time when all the Liberal Press was condemning them in terms as strong as it possibly could. I pass on to the second point of evidence which I rely on in this matter, and that is, the knowledge which the President of the Board of Trade must have had, from his presence in Birmingham, of the proceedings that were likely to take place. I maintain that the President of the Board of Trade must have been aware—he could not possibly have helped being aware—of what was likely to occur at Aston on the evening in question. He must have known that the Liberal Association had determined to call a counter-demonstration at the same place. He must have known that a counter-demonstration summoned at a similar hour on a piece of ground absolutely adjacent to that chosen for the Tory demonstration might lead to a breach of the peace. He must also have known of the placard which was issued by the Liberal Association summoning the meeting; and this placard I really must read to the House, and I must ask the Government to remember the description of themselves as an “Even Keel” Government. A more incendiary placard, one more strongly and directly inciting to riot and disorder, was never put out by any Nationalist Body or any Orange Lodge in Ireland. [“Hear, hear!”] I will make that statement good. The placard is headed—“To the men of Birmingham and the Midlands.” It is dated Saturday, October 11, and it was circulated in Birmingham on the afternoon of that day, on Sunday, and on the Monday morning it appeared in The Birmingham Daily Post. The placard says—

“On Bank Holiday you met 100,000 strong, and unanimously protested against the rejection of the Franchise Bill by the Tory Lords. Lord Salisbury laughs at you, and says he cares nothing for your protests. Another Tory, the Right Hon. James Lowther, describes you as a ‘horde of ruffians.’ Lord Randolph Churchill, who belongs to a family of State paupers, who have drawn £4,320,000 from the pockets of the people, with aristocratic insolence calls you Mr. Chamberlain’s ‘tag-rag and bobtail.’”

I content myself at present with traversing those statements, which are all equally and absolutely untrue. I never spoke of the working men of Birmingham as Mr. Chamberlain’s “tag-rag and bobtail,” and my right hon. Friend the Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther) never spoke of them as a “horde of ruffians.” It is equally untrue to say that Lord Salisbury laughed at them, and said he cared nothing for their protests. The placard then goes on to make various inflammatory statements. It says—

“The Tories are holding a demonstration at Aston Lower Grounds on Monday to support the House of Lords in refusing the franchise to 2,000,000 of men. They know that the men of Birmingham and the Midlands are against them, and by holding a ticket meeting, from which all Liberals are excluded, they hope to pass resolutions which will misrepresent your opinions. Do not submit to these Tory insults. Refuse to allow the opinion of the Midlands to be misrepresented. Show to Lord Salisbury and his lieutenants, who have always been the enemies of the people, that you will insist upon justice. The Franchise Demonstration Committee asks you first to attend a great open-air meeting in Witton Road, Aston, on Monday next.”

The placard goes on to state that three processions headed by brass bands will start from places named, and then comes this paragraph—

“After the open-air meeting, let all who can get admittance attend the Tory meeting and vote against the Tory resolutions.”

Now I ask is there one law for England and another for Ireland? In Ireland counter-demonstrations have been prohibited over and over again by the Government, and yet in the case of counter-demonstrations in that country there has been a strict injunction given by the promoters that each party should go to their own meeting and not interfere with their opponents’ meeting. But in England this Government allows a counter-demonstration to be called by a placard of this inflammatory nature, which incites interference with the opposing meeting. The third paragraph on the placard—and I am sure the Prime Minister disapproves of it—says—“Wear the Gladstone badge, and show that you are not ashamed of your colours.” Now, I ask the House whether the President of the Board of Trade, with his great intelligence and local knowledge, knowing that a placard of this kind had been put out, knowing that it would be widely read and numerously obeyed—whether he could have imagined that any other result would possibly take place than that which actually did take place? What would the right hon. Gentleman have done in the character not only of a Minister of the Crown, but of the leading, and in many ways rightly the leading, person in Birmingham? Surely, with the knowledge which he possessed, and with the knowledge of what would be the result of issuing this placard, he could have publicly uttered an opinion on the Monday morning to the effect that he would not tolerate, that he would do all he could to prevent, a disturbance of the Tory demonstration. It would have been very easy and very simple; and if he had taken that course it would have completely exonerated him and his colleagues in regard to any charge which might be brought against them in this House with reference to these riots. The President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) said, at a meeting of his constituents, when he joined the Cabinet—

I want to know whether the President of the Board of Trade has ever remembered what is due to his Colleagues in the Ministry; and I particularly want to know whether on this occasion, when he refrained from taking any steps to prevent what he knew must turn out to be a riotous and tumultuous proceeding, he remembered what was due to his Colleagues? I maintain that it was not only his duty to use his great influence to prevent such disorderly proceedings in any case, but it was his special duty on this occasion to do so because of the fact that the Leader of the Opposition was going to Birmingham. When a Leader of the Opposition, be he Liberal or Conservative, goes down to any part of the country to address a great meeting of his supporters called together for a particular occasion, I declare before this House, without fear of contradiction, that he has a positive and indisputable right to the protection and support of every leading local authority or leading person, at any rate, as far as public order is concerned. I should have thought very little of all this if it had been a mere riot against a candidate, who should know what he may have to go through at Birmingham; but I do say that the President of the Board of Trade, occupying the position he does at Birmingham, exercising as he does enormous power there, knowing that the Leader of the Opposition was going to address a meeting of his followers, was bound not only as a Minister of the Crown, but also as an English gentleman, to come forward and, at any rate, as far as he was concerned, to do all that he could to prevent disorder. I do contend, further, that as a general principle, when a man knows that an outrage is going to be committed or likely to be committed, when the same man has the power to arrest that outrage, or, at any rate, to mitigate it, and when he declines to exercise that power, he is morally and directly guilty of the outrage when it is committed. I now come to what I may call positive evidence. ["Oh, oh!"] Yes, I say the direct evidence, for I consider it would not be right to bring this matter to the notice of the House if I was not prepared to state all the proof I have to show the direct complicity of the right hon. Gentleman in all that took place. I have to show to the House the direct complicity of the Birmingham Liberal Association with the riot. I shall not detain the House with evidence on the point, because it would take up far too much time. I simply say that the Conservatives of Birmingham have made this matter the subject of legal investigation, and they have evidence of a very clear kind, at any rate, so far as it has been sifted, to show a carefully prepared organization for the riot, and to show the steps which were taken to forge tickets of admission. The moment I came into the House I received a letter directly inculcating a leading member of the Liberal Party of Birmingham with a large order for forged tickets. We have also evidence at Birmingham to prove the introduction into the ground beforehand of a few accomplices, and to show that ladders were brought by appointed persons, and were in readiness to enable the storming party to scale the walls. There is complete evidence to show that gangs of men known to the police were hired in Birmingham. There was the Cecil Street gang, and £50 were paid to this body. There were the Harding Street gang, the Lench Street gang, under a man named Martin—I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman knows him—the Great Bar Street gang, under the Brothers Reed, two notorious pugilists, each of whom received £20, and others; and some of these were paid by members of the Town Council, and also by members of the Committee over which Mr. Schnadhorst presides—the Caucus Executive. The arrangement made with the leaders of the roughs was that if they succeeded in breaking into the premises 5s. would be paid, and if they succeeded in breaking into the hall and preventing the meeting 2s. 6d. would be added. The Committee had the folly to be stingy; the fact that the additional half-crown was not paid in some cases has enabled the solicitor to obtain useful and reliable information. All this, of course, is an ex parte statement; but the matter has been the subject of legal investigation, and this is what the Conservative Party are prepared to prove in a Court of Law or before a Committee of this House. This is the evidence of the direct complicity of the Birmingham Liberal Association with these riots. Before going into the connection between the Association and the President of the Board of Trade, let me say a word about a matter which has been greatly misrepresented—the character of the Conservative meeting. I have a letter on the point from the principal authority of the Conservative Party, Mr. S. Hopkins. It has been stated in the House that the Conservatives tried to get up a free and open meeting as an expression of the opinion of all parties, and that that was a provocation to and a justification of what the Liberals did. This is an altogether incorrect and inaccurate statement. Mr. Hopkins says—

“Mr. Chamberlain’s statement as to the Liberals being invited is untrue; also as to the Conservatives representing or wishing to use their meeting as an expression of Birmingham opinion. All the meetings were advertised as plainly as possible, and declared to be in every way Conservative demonstrations. Applications for tickets by Liberal agents were refused. For instance, Messrs. Tangye made a request for 800 tickets. The secretary replied that the Conservative demand was so large, we could not spare them.”

I have here a ticket which bears out the statement. It is one which was issued long before the meeting, and it is headed “Conservative demonstration in support of the House of Lords.” It is obvious that we were merely endeavouring to get all the Conservatives we could together in one meeting, which was to be a demonstration on the one side, and it is altogether inaccurate to say that it was anything else. The House may rely on the perfect integrity of Mr. Hopkins. The President of the Board of Trade and the hon. Member for Ipswich will admit that he is incapable of putting an inaccurate statement before the public. He is responsible in all these matters, and he says the Conservatives never tried to do more than hold a Party demonstration. I will now ask the House what is the Birmingham Caucus or Liberal Association? I will reply to it myself by stating that the Birmingham Liberal Association is the President of the Board of Trade. Anyone who can divest himself for a moment of the extremist Party prejudice will say that the Association and the President of the Board of Trade are one and indivisible. He created it in its modern form; he presided over it; he was returned by it; he is at once its father and its child. I have a curious record of the fact in a statement made by Mr. George Dixon, a man of the highest authority in Birmingham, standing next, indeed, to the right hon. Gentleman, who was formerly a respected Member of this House, and looks forward to being the Colleague of the right hon. Gentleman. This is what Mr. Dixon says on the subject at a meeting of the School Board.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: What is the date?

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: May, 1878. Speaking of the connection between the President of the Board of Trade and the town of Birmingham and the Liberal Party there, Mr. Dixon said—

“Mr. Joseph Chamberlain is undertaking to create the public opinion of the Town Council and of Birmingham, and also to be its public exponent. In fact, it seems as if the terms Mr. Joseph Chamberlain and Birmingham were become synonymous; Mr. Joseph Chamberlain is Birmingham, Birmingham is Mr. Joseph Chamberlain. He represents himself in the Town Council, and he also represents himself in the House of Commons. Mr. Joseph Chamberlain has adopted the House of Commons’ plan, and has a Whip in the Town Council. I suppose that he also has a Cabinet, composed partly of members of the Town Council and partly of members outside.”

If that were a Tory statement, it would be the most miserable libel that could be put forward about Birmingham; it would be “a falsehood, a wanton falsehood;” but, unfortunately, it is the statement of Mr. George Dixon, who is to be the Colleague of the right hon. Gentleman. That plainly bears me out in the assertion I have made as to the connection between the right hon. Gentleman and the Birmingham Liberal Association. The matter is one of absolute notoriety. I am quite certain of this—that the right hon. Gentleman is far too courageous, far too determined, ever to repudiate any one of his political associates. As he expects, no doubt, that his Colleagues will defend him from charges which may be made against him in this House, so I am certain he is prepared with even more cordiality and sincerity to defend the leaders of the Birmingham Liberal Association from any charges against them, and to maintain his responsibility for all their acts, and to avow his knowledge of them. I may add that the connection between the President of the Board of Trade and the Birmingham Liberal Association, and the control he exercises over it, are far more direct, powerful, and effective than the control which the hon. Member for the City of Cork exercises over the Land League and its proceedings. [Cries of "Time!" and "Order!"] I am very sorry for having trespassed so long on the time of the House, and I apologize. To sum up the case, it is this. I rely principally upon the three speeches which were made by the President of the Board of Trade, the first speech inciting, as I hold, to tumult, the second renewing that incitement, and almost rebuking his audience for not having acted upon his incitement, and the third speech glorying in the result and inciting to further tumult. To corroborate and confirm all that, I also bring up his refusal and neglect, until the other day, to deny the charge I made of his being connected with the Birmingham riot. I bring up his presence in Birmingham, his knowledge of what was likely to occur, and the power to prevent these occurrences taking place, and his refusal to exercise that power; and, lastly, I make out, as strongly as I can, and I assert before this House, and shall not be contradicted by the right hon. Gentleman, the indissoluble connection that exists between himself and the Birmingham Liberal Association, and his complete, real responsibility for the acts of that Body. That, Sir, is the case against the right hon. Gentleman. [Cheers, and "Oh, oh!"] I do not expect to convince hon. Gentlemen opposite. But there is a power of opinion outside this House, on which I hope that these facts may make no inconsiderable impression, and, even in spite of prepossessions, may carry conviction to some Gentlemen opposite. It is with no little confidence in the general impartiality of the House of Commons that I submit to its consideration the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed,

To insert in the ninth paragraph, after the word "us," the words "and humbly to assure Her Majesty that this House regrets to find in recent speeches and actions of one of Her Majesty's Ministers, holding the high office of President of the Board of Trade, an incitement to interference with the freedom of political discussion, and a justification of riot and disorder."—(Lord Randolph Churchill.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will think that the speech to which we have just listened justifies my reticence on a previous occasion, when the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), at the instigation of the noble Lord, made a vague and violent attack on me. If I had attempted then to answer that attack, I could only have done so in very general terms, and, having exhausted my right of speech, I should have been quite unable to give to the House any information with reference to the numerous details in the formal indictment which has now been preferred against me by the noble Lord. Sir, the noble Lord, in his concluding observations, commented on the fact that I had waited until last Monday to deny the charges which he and others had made against me. I should wish to point out that the noble Lord himself, like the hon. Member for Portsmouth, when he first brought these charges, and others still stronger against me in Birmingham, did not attempt to substantiate them by the slightest tittle of evidence. In these circumstances, I attributed them to what was, perhaps, the natural irritation of the noble Lord, who had seen his best laid plans go astray, and who was hoist with his own petard. But when the noble Lord repeats these charges, or any portion of them, in his place in this House, speaking with due deliberation, and with a full sense of responsibility, then, Sir, I am prepared to treat them with the seriousness which they deserve. I feel that I have no option but to meet in detail the accusation which he has brought, and I shall then submit myself to the judgment of the House. If these accusations are true, I shall incur its just censure; if they are false, the House will appreciate the conduct of the noble Lord who, in order to damage a political opponent, has brought forward charges which he has been unable to substantiate. Now, the inquiry divides itself into two branches. There are two matters which I shall try to keep perfectly distinct upon which I have to offer explanations to the House. First, there are the charges which affect myself personally, my own character and reputation; and next, there are charges against my constituents, for whom I am not responsible directly or indirectly, but as to which I shall have some defence to offer, and some explanation to make. As regards the charges against myself personally, let me clear the way by protesting, in the most absolute terms, against the new doctrine laid down on Monday, and brought forward again to-night, that if a man does not deny violent charges brought against him, he is to be assumed to admit them. That is a favourite doctrine of the noble Lord, who has brought more reckless charges against political opponents than any other living politician. Public life would be perfectly unendurable if a public man were to be held responsible for every crime of which he may be accused unless he immediately takes steps to refute the accusation. There is not a day passes in which I do not see some old slander revived, or some new libel devised, and if I am to deny them I should have to keep another secretary. In a Court of Justice a defendant is not called upon for an answer until some evidence, at all events, is brought forward, and I do not see why it should be different in a Court of Honour. But this practice of the noble Lord of flinging charges in the air in the hope that they may strike an opponent is a very common one. He has ventured to allude once more to the infamous charge, as I consider it, which he has brought against the Corporation of Birmingham. I denied that charge in strong language. But the noble Lord wonders that I should deny the charge against the Corporation, while I left my own reputation to take care of itself. I did so because that charge tended to damage local government, in which I was deeply interested. I think it is perfectly monstrous that a charge of that kind, affecting the integrity of 50 or 60 gentlemen who give up their time to the service of their fellow-townsmen, should be lightly made. If such charges can be lightly made by persons in a responsible position, it will be impossible to find men who will be willing to undertake such labour and responsibility. But what did the noble Lord do with reference to this charge? He was challenged to prove it by the Mayor of Birmingham in a calm and temperate letter, to which the noble Lord replied by a letter which the Mayor of Birmingham has been forced to characterize as insolent and evasive. The noble Lord has not attempted to substantiate this charge. He knows perfectly well that there is not a tittle of evidence in its favour. He knows perfectly well that a Conservative member of the Town Council—himself the treasurer of the Conservative Association at the present time—having been appealed to by one of his constituents, declared that in his knowledge and belief the charges were not true. Yet the noble Lord never withdrew them. Well, Sir, I say this new method of controversy—to make a foul and offensive charge, and then, if those against whom it is brought do not think it worth their while to contradict it, to assume it to be true, or, if challenged to prove it, to refuse the proof—is not a fair method of warfare; and those whom the noble Lord calls my “tag-rag and bobtail” would be thoroughly ashamed to adopt such a course. The noble Lord used very similar tactics in his attack upon me. What is the charge which he brings against me? The words of the Amendment are—

“Humbly to assure Her Majesty that this House regrets to find in recent speeches and actions of one of Her Majesty’s Ministers, holding the high office of President of the Board of Trade, an incitement to interference with the freedom of political discussion, and a justification of riot and disorder.”

[Opposition cheers.] Yes; hon. Members cheer that as they cheer any other charge against the President of the Board of Trade. But that is not the charge which the noble Lord brought against me. That is not the charge which I challenged him to prove in this House. Why has he gone back from his own words? In Birmingham he charged me with direct complicity in these riots; he charged me personally with having hired roughs; and he charged me with having entered into a direct conspiracy with others to provoke these disturbances. There is not one word of that either in the Amendment or in the speech he has delivered to the House.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Read the Amendment.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I have read the Amendment, and I have shown that the noble Lord has entirely shifted his ground. He has evolved a new charge, but it is not the charge which I challenged him to prove. I do not deny that the charge which he brings now is a serious charge, and I am quite prepared to answer it; but I want to know, if he believes his charge against me, that I was personally responsible for the hiring of these roughs, why he has not put that charge into the Amendment? Well, now the real fact is, that the noble Lord does not believe in these charges himself. He knows that if he did believe them—

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Mr. Speaker, I rise to Order. I wish to ask you, Sir, whether the right hon. Gentleman is in Order in stating that I do not believe the charges that I have brought before the House?

MR. SPEAKER: I have not yet heard the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I was merely going to point out that that was not the statement I made. I did not say the noble Lord does not believe in the charges which he has brought before the House. What I accused the noble Lord of was not believing the charges which he has failed to bring before the House.

MR. SPEAKER: It would be altogether out of Order for the right hon. Gentleman to accuse the noble Lord of not believing in charges which he has brought before the House. If the right hon. Gentleman says that, he will not be in Order.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I will content myself with saying that, whatever the noble Lord believes, I do not think that after the evidence which I shall be able to lay before the House, he will be able to get any assembly of gentlemen to agree with him.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Mr. Speaker, I rise to Order. I really must ask you, Sir, whether the right hon. Gentleman, having said that I do not believe in the charges that I have brought before the House of Commons—[Cries of "No!"—and you having ruled that he is out of Order, is not bound to withdraw the statement he has made?

MR. SPEAKER: I understand the right hon. Gentleman to deny that he made the assertion that the noble Lord did not believe in the charges which he has brought before this House. I have said, and I repeat, that if the right hon. Gentleman does make such a charge, he is out of Order, and I call upon him to withdraw it.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Now, Sir—[Cries of "Withdraw!"] I have nothing to withdraw; I did not make the statement of which the noble Lord complains, and I cannot, therefore, withdraw what I have never said. Now, I am going to call the attention of the House to the charges as they were made by the noble Lord at Birmingham, and to contrast them with the charges which he has brought forward to-day. To-day, the noble Lord has said he bases his case principally upon speeches which I delivered on August 4, and again at Hanley, and on a speech which I delivered after these occurrences took place. That is a totally different thing from a charge against a Minister of direct complicity in outrage. I find the first proceeding of the noble Lord in connection with this matter appears to have taken place at the Midland Conservative Club, on Monday, October 13, when Lord Randolph Churchill moved—

"That, viewing the scandalous and discreditable organized riot excited this afternoon by Mr. Chamberlain and the Caucus, with the object of preventing Sir Stafford Northcote from addressing the people of Birmingham on public affairs, the members pledge themselves to combine, organize, and prepare for such retaliatory measures as may be necessary against the Radical Caucus in Birmingham, and shall in future effectually protect the tranquillity and order of public meeting."

Then, at a banquet at the Exchange Rooms on the 14th of October, the noble Lord is reported to have said—

"Now, the Tory Party are not quite so stupid as Mr. Chamberlain and his friends think they are. They are much more ready to learn a lesson than is generally supposed; and having discovered last night the great Party advantage which Mr. Chamberlain derives from a timely exhibition of force, I presume that they will pay him the compliment on the earliest opportunity of resorting to force themselves."

All I will say in reference to that part of the noble Lord's statement is, that it seems to be a little inconsistent with his present proceedings. I want to know whether the noble Lord is an advocate of order, or the champion of disorder? If he thinks that these proceedings at Birmingham were disgraceful, why does he propose to retaliate in the same way? On the contrary, if he thinks them perfectly legitimate, and intends to employ them himself, why does he come down to this House and complain? I really do not see how the noble Lord can get out of that dilemma. Does he pose as a champion of Parliamentary Order and decency, or is he prepared to support in Birmingham the proceedings which he has condemned to-day in this House? The noble Lord was more definite in later speeches. On October 15 he spoke at a banquet in a great hall, and he then said—

"The authors of this outrage were men who were hired—who were hired by Mr. Chamberlain and his friends—who were picked up, Heaven knows where, and who were paid, Heaven knows how, to do the work which no Birmingham artizan could be found to do."

The noble Lord went on to say—

"The only people who glory and revel in their disgrace are Mr. Schnadhorst and Mr. Jesse Collings, the Pylades and Orestes of Birmingham. We will not be too severe on them, for, after all, we may be perfectly certain of this—that they were acting under the inspiration and under the high direction of Mr. Chamberlain."

On October 13 the noble Lord also said—

"It is, gentlemen, to Mr. Chamberlain that we owe the scandalous proceedings of to-night;"

and later on he said—

"Let it go forth to-night that we, the Conservative Party in Birmingham, numbering at least one-half of the population of Birmingham, are prevented from holding a great meeting in the Town Hall to-morrow solely by the arts of Mr. Chamberlain."

Those charges are definite enough. I ask the House whether any one of these charges has been—I will not say proved, but even repeated, to-night? Now, I am going to reply to them in detail, because, whether made in the House or outside, I think the time has come when an answer should be given to them. I will take first the case of the Town Hall. I have no more to do with the letting of the Town Hall in Birmingham than the noble Lord himself. It is let under regulations which have been in force for a generation. It is let to the first comer. The Tories have had the Town Hall again and again for their political demonstrations. The noble Lord, Lord Salisbury, and many other distinguished Members of the Tory Party, have in recent times had the Town Hall in Birmingham, and have received a perfectly attentive and respectful hearing. I did not know the Town Hall was engaged on this occasion. I knew nothing at all about it. I did not know anything about the meeting which was held there the night after the disturbances till I read the account of it in the papers. But I have inquired of the Liberal Party in Birmingham whether they could throw any light on the matter, and they tell me that the Town Hall was engaged by the Liberal Association last May—long before there was any talk about this Conservative demonstration, and long before they could know whether they would in any way interfere with the proceedings of the Tory Party. I am told, further, that they would have been perfectly willing to allow the use of the Town Hall to the Conservatives as a matter of courtesy, if an application had been made; but no application was made on behalf of the Tory Party. The noble Lord has evidently to-night, as on former occasions, been under a great delusion as to my supposed influence in Birmingham. It is most complimentary to me, although I think it ought to be rather discouraging to the noble Lord in his candidature for the borough. No doubt, in 1878, when my friend, Mr. George Dixon, in a moment of irritation about some local controversy which has been long since amicably settled, described me as having great influence in Birmingham, I do not think I could fairly have contested his statement. It was true at that time. I had been Mayor of the town for three years, Chairman of the School Board for three years, I was chairman of several of the leading institutions in the town, and a prominent member of the Liberal Association; and I was then fairly described as one of the most influential persons in the town. But since I have been a Member of Parliament I have taken very little part in local affairs, and since I have been a Member of the Government I have taken none at all. The moment I became a Member of the Government I resigned all the offices which I held in Birmingham, and I have since refrained from all interference. In my own interest I thought it inexpedient for me, the Representative of the town in Parliament, to interfere in local matters. Then the noble Lord says I am the Birmingham Caucus. Again, I am much flattered by this description of my influence and ability; but it is a total mistake. Except that I am a subscriber, although, I believe, not one of the largest subscribers, for, in common with my hon. Colleague and other Liberals in the town and neighbourhood, no doubt, I continue to subscribe to the funds exactly the same sum as I subscribed before I was Member for the town—beyond that I have no part whatever in the Liberal Association. I am not a member of any of its committees, and I have not attended any of its meetings. I am a Representative of the Liberal Association and of the town of Birmingham; and, knowing how jealous my constituents would be of any interference with their independence, I have thought it advisable to keep out of the matter altogether. The noble Lord is utterly mistaken, and is basing his suspicions and charges on the most slender foundation, if he puts them on the ground that I am in any way a moving force in connection with the Liberal Association of Birmingham. And now I come to another charge, probably the most serious of those which are brought by the noble Lord against me. He says that I have hired roughs. I will answer that in this way. I have never in my life hired a rough for any purpose whatever. I have never in my life contributed, directly or indirectly, to the hiring of roughs; I have never suggested the hiring of roughs. I have never connived at the hiring of roughs; and if I can in any possible way put that denial more broadly I shall be perfectly willing to do it. Then there remains the question whether any of my constituents hired roughs upon this occasion? It is, perhaps, too much for me to undertake to answer absolutely for all of them; but I do not believe a word of it. The noble Lord says that the Tory Party in Birmingham have got proof. [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Evidence.] The noble Lord says "evidence;" but the House will observe that throughout the noble Lord, in talking about evidence, has not given the name of one individual except that of Mr. Satchell Hopkins, the chairman of the Conservative Association. Let hon. Members mark that. I have a good deal of evidence to bring before the House, and I am going to give names. I challenge the Conservative Party to prove the hiring of roughs. I suppose that the hiring of roughs for the purpose of breaking up a meeting is a criminal offence; and if the Conservatives discover that any of my constituents are guilty of it, let them bring them before a Court. I do not believe a word of it. In the first place, it has never been the custom of the Liberal Party in Birmingham or any of its members to hire roughs; and, secondly, on the present occasion the hiring of roughs was absolutely unnecessary. [Cheers and laughter.] Well, it was absolutely unnecessary. Even supposing that anyone in Birmingham was animated by the intentions which the noble Lord ascribes to them—even supposing now, for the sake of argument, that there were persons in my constituency who organized a premeditated disturbance in this meeting—it would have been totally unnecessary for them to go to the expense of hiring roughs, for they had 15,000 men on the ground, according to the noble Lord's own knowledge, close to the meeting. [Opposition cheers.] I assure hon. Members opposite that they will find that their cheering is a little premature when I come to deal with that part of the case. They admit there were 15,000 Liberals close by, and, in addition, there were 20,000 Liberals at least in the meeting itself. And now I come to the next question—that of the forged tickets. The noble Lord does not accuse me, I am happy to say, of personally forging these tickets; but as a reference has been made to it, I will first clear myself. I know absolutely nothing about it. I certainly have not suggested such a thing; I am not a party to it; and I do not know that it was done. Indeed, I am firmly convinced in my own mind that it was not done. [Murmurs from the Opposition.] I know perfectly well that Mr. Satchell Hopkins is a respectable man, whose word I would take on any matter known to himself. I know that he believes in this tale of a forgery; but I am sure it will be found, sooner or later, that it is only a mare's nest which the Tories have got hold of. At all events, if the tickets were forged, I had nothing whatever to do with it. I will undertake to say the same on behalf of all the responsible leaders; and, again, I must point out that there was no necessity for anything of the sort. I will show the noble Lord that there was not the least difficulty, in the first place, on the part of the Liberals in obtaining tickets for this meeting. There was no earthly reason why they should forge tickets when they were to be had by thousands. They had 10,000 tickets, at the very least, in their possession. Perhaps the noble Lord did not know that. Well, now I will give him the evidence at once. I will show him how the tickets were obtained. I have got here a sworn deposition. It is signed by Mr. James Wiggett, a machine tool maker, and dated the 28th of October, 1884. [Ironical cheers from the Opposition.] Yes; the day before yesterday. It would not have been any truer if made earlier. He says—

"I am the president of the Machine Tool Makers' Society in Birmingham."

And at the end he says—

"I am not, nor have I ever been, a member of either the Liberal or Conservative Associations in Birmingham or elsewhere."

MR. GORST: Before whom is that sworn?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Before Mr. W. Horton, a Commissioner to administer oaths in the Supreme Court of Judicature of England. This gentleman goes on—

"About a fortnight before the day of the Tory demonstration I applied to Mr. Barton, the secretary of the Conservative Association, for tickets of entrance to the Aston Lower Grounds for the purpose of being distributed amongst the members and workmen of my society and the workmen engaged in my trade. I received from Mr. Barton 600 white tickets, which were distributed by me to any person in the trade who applied for them without reference to or knowing their politics. I had for myself a red ticket for admission to the reserved seats. When I presented myself at the entrance at the Lower Grounds I had a Gladstone badge pinned to my coat. The men in charge of the entrance refused to allow me to enter, saying that my ticket was a forgery."

That was a ticket which this man had actually received from the secretary to the Conservative Association. He goes on—

"I went back and took off my badge, and immediately afterwards presented myself at another entrance with the same ticket, and I was admitted without any objection."

This is another statement on the same subject. It is from Mr. Walter Parsons, and he says—

"I presented myself at the turnstile, near the Wotton Road, with the ticket I had given me by Mr. Wootton, Scripture reader for St. Paul's Church—given me at the express request of the Vicar himself, who was present on the occasion. Having given my ticket up to one of the stewards, I was told to 'go about my business or I should be removed by the police,' as the ticket I had given was a 'forged' one. Three ladies who passed in before me also had their tickets torn up in their faces and were sent away. I tried to explain myself to the man in charge, but he turned a deaf ear to all my entreaties. Fortunately I had another ticket given me by a very prominent member of the All Saints' Conservative Association. I went to the other entrance near the hotel, and was passed in all right without any ceremony."

Now, I think these letters will show the House how all this difficulty has arisen. The Tories got it into their heads that the Liberals were going to forge tickets, and the next thing was to assume that everyone who went with a Liberal badge had a forged ticket, and these people were tearing up their own tickets all over the place, believing them to be forged. I have now done with the accusations made against me at Birmingham, and I come to those made in the House, and the next statement I come to seems to me a very striking one. The noble Lord says I must have been aware of the arrangements for the counter-demonstration. Of course, I was aware of them. I had the same knowledge of them as the noble Lord himself. The first intimation I had was from the newspapers, and if the noble Lord will refer to The Birmingham Daily Post he will see where I got my first intimation of this meeting being held. I admit, without the least difficulty, that I was aware that the meeting was to be held. I did not suggest it; I had nothing whatever to do with it. But the noble Lord says I might have stopped it. My answer is, that I could not have stopped it if I would, and I would not have stopped it if I could. Why on earth should I have stopped it? It was a perfectly legitimate counter-demonstration.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Ireland!

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I quite understand the support the noble Lord expects to get by his allusion to Ireland. It was a perfectly legitimate and orderly demonstration. There was no earthly reason why I should have interfered to prevent it; and I go further and say that it would not have led to any disturbance or evil results at all but for the crass stupidity of the Tory management. I think I heard some hon. Members opposite say the counter-demonstration was held at the same place. Is it such an uncommon thing to hold two meetings in England where they can be held safely very nearly at the same place by different parties to consider the same subject? Why, Sir, I find that at Stroud, on July 30, there was a demonstration of Liberals, and I find that the right hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) attended a Conservative counter-demonstration, called at the same hour, and within 500 yards of the same place.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: They were absolutely out of sight of one another. It was utterly impossible for those present at one meeting to have anything to do with those attending the other.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I beg to say that the meetings at Birmingham were out of sight of one another until the wall went down; and I really cannot follow the right hon. Gentleman when he says it was absolutely impossible for one meeting to have anything to do with another only 500 yards off. But I am not in the least complaining of the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman. What I say is, that it does not necessarily suggest itself to the mind of an English statesman that to hold a counter-demonstration is a provocation to riot and disorder. Well, then, the noble Lord has commented on a placard. I really do not know whether I saw that placard; but having listened to the recital of it by the noble Lord, although it partakes a good deal of the flowery character of controversial political literature, I do not see in substance much to object to in it. The Liberals of Birmingham were called upon to resent the insults that had been flung at them by the noble Lord, Lord Salisbury, and others attending the Tory meeting, and, if they could, to get admittance—for what? To vote against the resolution. Then the noble Lord says they were asked to wear their badges. Of course they were. They went as Liberals, and they were not ashamed of their profession of their political faith. Then the noble Lord makes a statement which really is almost too absurd to be serious. He is bringing this tremendous charge against me; and what is one of the grounds he seriously lays before the House of Commons for suspecting me of having committed an act as to the morality of which I will not at this moment say anything, but which would be an act of the supremest folly in a person in my position? The noble Lord suspects me of direct complicity in the riots at Birmingham, because, forsooth, I was at my house a few days before the meeting. Does not the noble Lord know that I live at Birmingham? I do not know what the domestic habits of the noble Lord are. But I confess I am inclined to augur badly of them if he thinks it a matter of suspicion for a gentleman to stop at home with his family. [Cries of "Oh!" from the Opposition.] Yes; I think these details are unworthy of the House of Commons. But it is not my fault that they have been brought forward. The moment I returned from Germany, after an absence of five weeks, I went to my house at Birmingham, and remained there continuously for some time. I was at Hanley on the 7th of October, where I remained until the 9th, and on the 9th I returned to Birmingham and remained there until the 18th. Does the noble Lord mean to suggest that when he honours Birmingham with a visit I am to fly for refuge to some other place? I can only say I was at Birmingham long before the noble Lord was heard of, and I shall remain there long after the noble Lord's connection with that place has come to an end. I think I have now gone seriatim through every one of the personal charges which have been made against me by the noble Lord. I shall deal with the speeches to which he has referred later on; but, as regards any charge of complicity in these disturbances or in a conspiracy to create them, I treat it with a flat denial, and I meet it with a denial of all the details which the noble Lord has used. I say that a charge of this kind ought not to have been made, and I do not believe that it is advanced on public grounds at all, but it seems to me to be dictated by personal prejudice and Party feeling. I verily believe that in the whole history of Parliament no such grave charge has ever been brought against a Minister of the Crown upon grounds so trumpery and so inadequate. The noble Lord says that in one of my speeches at Newtown I have condoned the acts of my constituents.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I said that the right hon. Gentleman gloried in those acts.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Yes; he said that I gloried in them. I should like to read to the House what I did say on this point, because the noble Lord only read a portion of the paragraph from which he quoted. What I said was that if anyone said that I was inciting to violence and disorder—

“That is false. There are only two men in this country who throughout this quarrel have conspicuously incited the people to disorder and violence. One of them is Lord Randolph Churchill, who, speaking at Edinburgh at the end of last year, declared that he would not consent to extend the franchise unless the labourers showed that they were in earnest by pulling down the railings, or by engaging the police and the military. This is the man who is now so indignant because the working men of Birmingham took him at his word, and pulled off the coping of a wall in order to attend a meeting to which they had been invited, and which the Tory managers were attempting by a transparent fraud to palm off as a representation of the opinion of Birmingham.”

Well, I do not see, I confess, especially with the information I have now to lay before the House, that there is one word in that statement which I ought to withdraw. I want the House to consider what these proceedings were of which the noble Lord complains. I believe that I have a greater hatred of violence than the noble Lord, and I am perfectly ready to subscribe to every word which was uttered by the Prime Minister on the first day of the Session. If I ask the House to take a lenient view of the proceedings of my constituents on the occasion in question, it is because I believe that those proceedings were caused by almost intolerable provocation, and that they were pursued almost entirely in self-defence. I think it right that the House should know that the whole of this matter has been very grossly exaggerated. The noble Lord talked about a riot.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I was there and saw what occurred.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The noble Lord has not seen, as I have, an angry mob, or he would not speak in that way of the proceedings of what was, on the whole, the good-tempered mob before which he stood on Monday week. The total amount of damage done by 50,000 or 60,000 people trampling over the extensive grounds at Aston is only estimated by the manager and proprietor of the grounds at £126, and he says that damage to an equal amount has frequently been done by an ordinary meeting of similar magnitude on a Bank Holiday or similar occasion, and, although the crowd had entire possession of the building and the grounds, there was not one case of serious personal injury. Does the noble Lord suppose that if a Birmingham mob had not been good tempered that 50,000 people could have got out of these grounds without any injury beyond a few scratches? I do not say this in order to excuse what has been done however; that must stand upon a different footing. I merely put this to the House to show that this was not an organized mob, and that this was not premeditated violence, and I think that I shall convince the House that whatever was done was the result of the mismanagement of those who called the meeting. I must remind the House that this was not an ordinary Conservative demonstration. The Conservatives have held meetings in Birmingham again and again, and, as far as I am aware, not a single meeting called by them has ever been broken up before, although they have been attended by a considerable number of their political opponents. On the occasion in question, however, the Tories gave more importance to the meeting than would have attached to an ordinary Conservative gathering. Their game was palpable to the Liberals. If they had called an ordinary Conservative meeting, they could not have hoped to have filled the grounds, because, in spite of the statement of the noble Lord, there are not 50,000 Tories to be found in Birmingham or anywhere in the neighbourhood of that town. [“Hear, hear!” and “Oh, oh!”] Well, not male Tories, at all events; and what the Tories relied upon was the presence of their Liberal opponents in order to make up the meeting, while they were to have packed gatherings in the two great halls, as well as the assembly in the grounds, at which resolutions were to be passed which were to go out to the world as an expression of opinion on the part of the people of Birmingham. The noble Lord says that he has it on the authority of the Tory managers of the meeting that no invitation was ever given to the Liberals to attend, and that the meeting was always declared to be a Conservative gathering. Now, I will call the attention of the noble Lord to a speech of a friend of his, Mr. Barton, the paid secretary of the Conservative Association at Birmingham, and the hon. secretary of this demonstration. This gentleman attended a dinner at the Hen and Chickens Hotel in Birmingham on September 10, and, referring to the demonstration, said—

"It would be open to all who would take the trouble to get a ticket, Liberals and Conservatives alike, and except for the formality of obtaining a ticket all would be free to attend, and he hoped they would invite all their friends, whether Liberals or Conservatives."

There is an invitation given by the official who had more right to give it than any other man in Birmingham, which was accepted, no doubt very much to the discomfiture of the noble Lord. Now, as to the attempt to misrepresent this meeting, The Birmingham Gazette, a Tory journal, on the 9th of October, said—

"Just as the great Conservative demonstration at Manchester at the commencement of the Recess campaign proved unmistakably that the people believed in the Peers and honoured them for their pluck and statesmanship, so the demonstrations next week in Birmingham, at the close of the Recess, and on the eve of the next move on the Parliamentary chess board, are expected to prove"— not that the Conservative Party, but—

"that the heart of England beats in unison with its extremities North and South, and that the people of the Midlands have faith in the wisdom and prudence of the Conservative Leaders in the present crisis, and have perfect confidence in their ability to vindicate principles which, being above Party, can claim to be national."

It is perfectly plain, therefore, that this was to be a national demonstration in favour of national principles. Well, the Liberals applied for tickets in hundreds and thousands, and the Tories believed that they were going to have a most successful demonstration. They gave away these tickets wholesale, and some 10,000 tickets were obtained by Liberals. But, after a time, the Conservatives found that they were giving too many tickets to Liberals—they began to smell a rat, because they found that the great Conservative demonstration would be attended by so large a number of Liberals that they would not be able to pass their resolutions; and, accordingly, after a time the further issue of tickets to Liberals was refused. It was when that refusal to issue more tickets to Liberals was announced that the working men of Birmingham determined to get up a counter-demonstration, with which, I believe, the Liberal Associations had nothing to do. Of course, there were members of the Liberals Associations on the Committee; but the meeting was chiefly organized by Trades Unionists. Some 15,000 Liberals attended the counter-demonstration, and I am told that the speeches were of a very moderate character, and that there was no incitement to violence, and that no word was uttered to which anyone could take exception. Everything would have passed off quietly but for the utterly unjustifiable conduct of the Tory Party to the Liberals who, having got tickets, presented them at the gates, wearing the Liberal badge, and were refused admission. Here is a letter from Mr. Coleman, who is connected with one of the religious bodies of the town, in which he says—

"Kindly grant me space to complain of an unwarrantable and dastardly attack made upon my son in the Lower Grounds yesterday. He had purchased a reserve ticket for the great hall, for the purpose of hearing the speeches of Sir Stafford Northcote and Lord Randolph Churchill. This ticket he duly presented at the gates, and was admitted. He had no sooner entered than he was accosted by a respectably-dressed man, who, seeing his Gladstone badge, exclaimed 'You're a Gladstone man,' and immediately struck him a violent blow on the head with a heavy stick, felling him to the ground. Nor was this a singular instance. Several of my neighbours and friends, on presenting their tickets, had them roughly snatched from their hands, and were ejected with great force from the grounds. These facts speak for themselves, and so far from the Tories winning additional votes for Lord Randolph Churchill, by such brutal conduct they stir the disgust and indignation of every right-minded citizen, and provoke against themselves much rancour and bitterness for the future.

"Yours truly,

"HENRY COLEMAN."

This was not a solitary instance in which Liberals were ill-treated; it was the general treatment of every known Liberal. The consequence of such conduct on the part of the Tory Party may be easily imagined. These men, who had been so treated, came round to the other meeting which was being held in the neighbourhood, and they complained of the scandalous way in which they had been treated. And naturally there was a great deal of indignation expressed. The people in the crowd began to scale the wall. First it was boys, and then it was men. The wall was covered on the top with broken glass bottles, and those who got over first suffered a little in their persons and their clothes, and they, therefore, called out to their friends to knock off the coping of the wall. It was, however, knocked off from the inside, and was reached by a ladder taken from a shed belonging to the manager of the grounds, and that alone showed that there could be no premeditation in the matter. Having got the ladder, they knocked off the coping, and then knocked down six feet of the wall, through the gap in which 15,000 men, all Liberals, came pouring. Then they did that which I cannot justify. They let off the Tory fireworks. That was undoubtedly wrong. And what was worse, they acted with indignity towards the right hon. Baronet the Leader of the Opposition—they let him off upside down. Up to this point, I must inform the House, the meeting had not been disturbed or broken up; and if the Tories had acted wisely, they might have had their meeting and their speakers listened to. Of course, they would have been outvoted by 10 to one; but they must take their chance of that if they call a "national demonstration" in Birmingham. Now I come to the most serious part of the case. Mr. Satchell Hopkins has stated, in a letter to the papers—

"That the Conservatives had no hired roughs at Aston Lower Grounds on Monday, the 13th of October, either as 'chuckers out' or in any other capacity, offensive or defensive."

[Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Hear hear!] The noble Lord had better not cheer too soon. Mr. Hopkins said—

"That there were about 450 stewards, all of whom were volunteers and unpaid, and that the whole of the arrangements were made for an orderly and peaceable meeting."

Now, Mr. Hopkins is evidently under a mistake in this matter, because, at a meeting held a few days before the 13th of October, Mr. Stone, late president of the Conservative Association, stated that it was expected that the Liberals would come, and that if they did effective arrangements had been made for vigorously repressing them. I accept Mr. Hopkins's statement so far as he speaks of facts within his own knowledge; but Mr. Hopkins is a guileless man, he does not know what I know, and what the House will soon know. Now as to the meeting in the great hall. I have a letter from Mr. W. E. Cooke, a manufacturer at Constitution Hill, Birmingham, who explains the way that the riot commenced. He says that the refusal to admit people with tickets led to people getting over the wall—

"As to the great hall," he says, "I was near the reporters' table, and saw a Tory steward hit a man trying to get into the speakers' gallery—this was the commencement of the strife. The man struck was directly in front of me, so that I could not see the striker's face."

This was the beginning of the row. I have also the letters of two gentlemen—Mr. J. S. Reynolds, manufacturer, and Mr. W. B. Vince, solicitor, the son of a highly esteemed Nonconformist minister. They say they were standing close to the reporters' table, and had a good view of the whole proceedings. They were in a position to state that the first breach of the peace was by a Tory steward. A gentleman came there with a Gladstone badge, showing a platform ticket. He attempted to get on the platform, but was pushed back, and was struck a heavy blow in the face by a person wearing the badge of a Tory steward, and was knocked full length on the floor. This, said the writer, was more than flesh and blood could stand. More joined in the conflict, and a general mêlée took place. The first blow, they said, was struck by a Tory steward, whom they believed they could identify.

Mr. GORST: Is that sworn testimony?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: No; but I shall be delighted to provide the hon. and learned Member with sworn testimony. I would remind him that the noble Lord did not give any sworn testimony at all. Mr. Wiggett, president of the Machine Tool Makers' Society, in the latter part of that deposition from which I have already quoted, says—

"I went direct into the great hall, and stationed myself at the back of the reserved seats. Long before the proceedings commenced I saw a number of men who were on the platform wearing rosettes, and who were striking the people in front of the platform with their sticks. Up to that time there was no disturbance whatever; but the people close to the platform were so exasperated by the treatment of the men on the platform, that they made a rush to get on the platform. The men on the platform defended it as well as they could with chairs and sticks. I saw all that took place, and I say positively that the disturbance was commenced by the men on the platform who wore rosettes, and that up to the time when they began using their fists there was nothing but good-natured chaff and banter taking place."

I have some more sworn information. Edward Reed, of Moor Street, Birmingham—perhaps the noble Lord knows him.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Who is he?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Well, he is a rough. He says, upon oath, that—

"Between 9 and 10 o'clock on the morning of the day when the Tory demonstration took place at Aston, I went to the shop of Mr. R. C. Jarvis, in Worcester Street, for the purpose of getting an engagement at the Aston Lower Grounds. I went to Mr. Jarvis, because I had been engaged and paid by him on previous occasions to attend and break up Liberal election meetings. I saw Mr. Jarvis in his shop, and I said to him—'Please give me an engagement for Aston,' and he gave me one. He said—'Why don't you go with the mob?' And I said—'Oh, I go by myself.' He replied—'Go and do what you can.' I said—'Well, what are we to do when we get there?' He said—'If you see any Liberal badges on the people, tear them off their coats and destroy them.' He also said—'You must go with the mob—do what they do, and I will see you.' In the afternoon I went with 11 or 12 roughs down to Aston. We got there about half-past 3. We were all supplied with tickets. When the doors of the great hall were opened we got in, and went on to the platform. We left the platform and we met Mr. Jarvis. One of our party asked him what we were to do, and he said—'I have told you once; do as I told you, rip them things off them,' meaning the Gladstone badges. We at once set to work tearing off the badges from the coats of the people who were wearing them. I then went out to have a drink, and on returning to the hall a lot of Liberals were getting into the room. I and my companions then began knocking the Liberals about, and we did all we could to prevent them getting on to the platform. I afterwards got on to the platform and assisted the Tories in knocking the Liberals off, and this continued until the Liberals got too strong for us. I must have knocked about 10 Liberals down. I used chairs, and broke two of them over the Liberals. I shortly afterwards left the grounds. I went to Mr. Jarvis's shop on the Wednesday following to be paid. I saw Mr. Jarvis himself, and he paid me half-a-sovereign for what I had done."

MR. GORST: Will the right hon. Gentleman say before whom that was sworn?

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: What is the date of it?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: It was sworn at the Birmingham County Court on the 28th of October before C. Horton, Commissioner to administer oaths of the Supreme Court of Judicature in England. Now I have got another deposition to read to the House.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Another rough?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Two or three roughs. Richard Taylor, Baker, Hanley, and Leveson, all living in Birmingham, made oath. Taylor said that, in company with the others, he went to the Aston Grounds for the purpose of getting an engagement from the Tories. He fully expected to get an engagement, as he had frequently had engagements before for the purpose of upsetting meetings of Liberals, for which he had always received payment from the Tory Party. They had tickets given them by members of the Tory Party with which they went straight into the grounds. There they saw Mr. Barton, secretary of the Conservative Association. They told him they were not engaged. He said—"Go and do the best you can, and I will see to you." They then went towards the refreshment bar, and whilst there one of the Tories brought them 7s. worth of checks to get drink with. They were told—"If you see any people with Gladstone badges you must tear them off." They went to the platform. They knocked the Liberals down as fast as they could, until they got too numerous and strong, and then "we hopped the twig." During the following week they received several sums of money from different Tories for what they did at Aston. On the Thursday following they went to the Conservative Association office to be paid. They saw Mr. Barton, and they said—"Is there not anything for us?" He said—"Where is my bag?" And then he said—"We had better leave it till Monday and come again. I will write to the Colonel." They went to the office on the Monday and saw the clerk, who said Mr. Barton was very bad. "Here is half-a-sovereign for you." They refused that because it was not enough. They went on Wednesday and took the half-sovereign, on the understanding that Mr. Barton would write to the Colonel about it. Anderson and Leveson said that was all true; but they did not hear the conversation in the office because they remained outside while Barton went in to receive the money. That was sworn on the 27th of October before Mr. Hooper.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD: Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us what proceedings will be instituted?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: No proceedings have been instituted; but I think it is likely they will form a part of proceedings in the future.

MR. GIBSON: Is there any title at the head of the document showing that it was taken before a Commissioner of Oaths?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I really cannot answer for the Commissioners. These depositions have been taken before three or four Commissioners. I have given the names of two already, and I shall shortly give the name of another. I have hitherto been dealing with the proceedings in the great hall, and I say that the depositions which I have read show clearly that the disturbance in that case was commenced by these Tory roughs, acting as stewards; and it was in consequence of their assaults on the Liberals that the platform was stormed and the meeting broken up. Now I come to the meeting in the Skating Rink. With regard to the Skating Rink meeting, I have a letter from Mr. F. J. Staples, in which he says—

“Before the storming of the platform I saw one of the ‘gentlemen’ behind the speaker’s chair take up one of the chairs and hurl it with all his might into the midst of those in front of him. It was a mercy no one was killed; but it was cleverly caught and returned. Others followed his bad example, and the scuffle began; so for the breaking of the chairs in the hall the Conservatives have to thank one of themselves, for they certainly began the quarrel without sitting down to count the cost.”

I have another letter from Mr. Parsons, in which he bears testimony to the same effect. I now begin to read another deposition in reference to what took place in the Skating Rink. The deposition is signed by Larry Mack, of John Street, late Newton Street, Birmingham, and dated 28th October. It was taken before Mr. Horton, and is to this effect—

“On the morning of the day on which the Tory meeting took place at Aston I went to

Mr. Jarvis’s shop in Worcester Street to get an engagement. I went there because I had been told that if I went to him he would set me on. I saw Mr. Jarvis in his shop. It would be about 10 o’clock. I asked him if he was engaging any men to send down to Aston, and he said ‘Yes,’ and I told him to put my name down. He said ‘I am in a hurry now, but go down to Aston and do what you can and come back to me. I know your features, and will see to you.’ He told me to join the mob, and do what they did. I went down to Aston about half-past 1 o’clock. I had a ticket. When I got into the grounds I joined a gang of roughs there, and we spent some time in drinking. We had a lot of drink before the meeting commenced. We went into the Rink about 4 o’clock, and stationed ourselves close to the platform. About 5 o’clock the people came into the Rink very fast. We noticed a lot of people coming in with Gladstone badges on, and we snatched them off. On the following day I went to Mr. Jarvis’s shop in Worcester Street to be paid. I saw Mr. Jarvis himself. Mr. Jarvis paid me 6s. for my work on the Monday. I asked him for 10s., and he said he could not afford me more.”

I have here another deposition by J. Welch, of Smithfield Passage, Birmingham, and Enoch Bird, of Central Row, Birmingham, taken on oath before Mr. M. Hooper, Commissioner, on the 27th. The former says—

“A few days before the Monday when the Tory meeting was to take place at Aston, I met Mr. Bryan, fishmonger, of Balsall Street, at the corner of Macdonald Street and Barford Street South. Mr. Bryan is a Tory. He said to me—‘Come here, I want you.’ And I said—‘What for?’ And he replied—‘I want you to get 40 men to go down to the Lower Grounds on Monday to ‘bear up’ for the Tories.’ He also stated that it would be all right, and that he was waiting for Mr. Jarvis, of Worcester Street. I engaged a lot of roughs, altogether about 14. I could not get any more, as they wanted to know where the ‘brass’ was coming from. He said—‘Meet me at the Queen’s Arms public-house, at the corner of Barford Street South, to-morrow, and I will put you all right.’ I and about 16 roughs met Mr. Bryan on the following morning at the Queen’s Arms. Mr. Bryan paid for about eight or ten quarts of beer. He said—‘I want you all to go to the Lower Grounds and do the best you can.’ He said he was a rank Tory, and he wanted the men to ‘bear up’ for the Party. He said Mr. Jarvis was to have met him there, but he had not come. I got plenty of tickets from the Tories for admission to the grounds. I and my ‘pals’ went to the Lower Grounds about 4 o’clock on Monday. We went into the Skating Rink, and on to the platform, where we took platform seats. A number of Liberals tried to come on to the platform, but as fast as they came up we knocked them down with the chairs. This was the commencement of the row. We continued to knock them down until they got too strong, and then we had to run away. Harry Jarvis was with me, and we had half-a-sovereign given to us, which we spent in drink on the ground. We remained on the ground the whole evening, cheering for and supporting the Tories. On the day after the meeting I went to Mr. R. C. Jarvis, in Worcester Street, to be paid. He gave me a note to Mr. Barton, the secretary of the Conservative Association. We went to Mr. Barton. Mr. Barton gave us his card, and told us to go back to Mr. Jarvis and tell him to pay us anything in reason, and he would pay him back. We went back to Mr. Jarvis, and found a mob in his shop. Mr. Jarvis would not pay because of the mob. When he refused to pay, I said—'Here is your own handwriting; it is clear proof that you engaged us.' He took the note and ripped it up, but I picked up the bits."

This statement is confirmed by the other man, Bird. Now, Sir, I think I have really done almost sufficient to prove my case. If the noble Lord has not got enough, I have plenty more evidence. I have got here four or five depositions, altogether, I believe, from a dozen men—[LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Perjurers! and cries of "Order!"]—giving details to the same effect, that they were engaged by certain Tories to go to the grounds at Aston in order to assault the Liberals, to tear off their badges, and, if necessary, to "clout" them—that is, to hustle them; and that they performed that task. They began the row, and, in consequence of their proceedings, the meeting was broken up. One of those depositions, however, contained some special information which it is right the noble Lord and his friends at Birmingham should have some knowledge of.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: No, indeed; I will not trust them out of my possession. The noble Lord will, I have no doubt, read them in the newspapers, or I shall be happy to furnish him with copies. Charles Smith, of Bow Street, Birmingham, says—

"About 3 o'clock on the afternoon of the day on which the Tory demonstration took place at Aston, I went to the office of the Conservative Association in Newhall Street, Birmingham, for the purpose of getting an engagement to go to Aston. I saw Mr. Charles Barton. I asked him if my services would be wanted at Aston; he told me that they would, and he gave me half-a-crown to get some bear with. I went down to Aston, and into the grounds. I had half-a-dozen tickets from Mr. Charles Barton. When I got into the grounds I joined a gang of roughs, led by a man named Harry Jarvis. For about two hours we walked about the grounds and pulled off the Gladstone badges that we found, and if any complained about the badges being taken off them, we 'clouted' them."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: What!

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Does not the noble Lord know what "clouting" means? I sincerely hope he may never have that Birmingham experience. The deposition goes on—

"This was before the meeting commenced. About 5 o'clock in the afternoon I went up to Mr. William Barton and told him that the half-crown I had had from the office was not enough. He gave me another half-crown and two shillings' worth of checks for drinks. We spent the money, and also the checks, in drink, and afterwards we went into the great hall. When we got in there we began pulling off the badges and knocking the Liberals about. We attacked everybody that we saw in opposition to the Tories. We continued doing this until our opponents became too numerous, and then we ran away. On the following morning I went to the offices of the Conservative Association for some money. I saw Mr. Charles Barton, who said that all the money he had in his pocket was 3½d., and he gave me that. There were between 11 and 12 roughs in my gang, who had all been engaged to work for the Tories. We understood our instructions to be to tear off all the Gladstone badges, and we were left to do what else we thought fit. For the last 10 years I have been engaged by Tories. I was always engaged for the express purpose of attending and breaking up Liberal meetings. I know a lot of roughs who have been engaged by the Tories at election times to do the same kind of work."

This deposition is signed "Charles Smith," and it was made before another Commissioner, named Parr. The date is the 29th October; so that there are three dates—the 27th, 28th, and 29th October. I think I have adduced quite sufficient evidence. It is at the service of the noble Lord, if he likes; and I confess that I think it is almost a matter of honour on his part to pursue this investigation further. All the evidence which is before me shall be at his disposal in the copies, if not in the original. From this evidence, it is clear who were responsible for the riots at Birmingham. It shows that there was a set and deliberate purpose to repress the Liberals, and to repress them by means of hired roughs, in the way in which roughs ordinarily pursue their business. In consequence of this violence, there naturally followed the breaking up of the meetings, and the general discomfiture of the whole Conservative demonstration. There is only one thing in the speech of the noble Lord in which I think I can heartily concur. He called upon me to express regret that any possible slight should have been passed on the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition. Sir, I respond to that appeal. The right hon. Gentleman has always been a courteous and a generous opponent, and I deeply regret that he suffered any annoyance in connection with those proceedings. I can assure him it was not personal to himself, because I believe my constituents respect him, as I also do. I do not know whether it is possible for me to make any reparation; but this I do offer. If he is magnanimous enough to overlook this matter, and if he will come again to Birmingham, and will allow me to attend him on the platform in the Town Hall of Birmingham, I will pledge myself that he shall have in the Town Hall—in a free, open meeting, and for which no tickets are issued—a respectful attention and a quiet hearing from my constituents. I can promise him that; that they will acquiesce in his views I cannot promise, nor can I promise that a resolution will be carried in the sense in which he may desire; but I think I am justified in the promise I make to him, on behalf of my constituents that he will obtain a quiet and respectful hearing. I say that from what I know of my constituents, and from what I know of the character which is borne in Birmingham by the right hon. Gentleman. I have now only to deal with the noble Lord's observations on the speeches that I have delivered during the Recess, and previous to it. He is entirely mistaken in saying that the first speech of mine, on which he commented, was delivered after the breaking up of Parliament. It was delivered while Parliament was sitting; and if the noble Lord thought that it incited to violence and disorder, I cannot understand why he put such a restraint upon himself, and did not call the attention of the House to that speech. I can only, in regard to the passage which he has quoted from it, say that it appears to me to be a mere historical retrospect, every word of which is true, and that it might very properly serve, I think, as a warning to the Party opposite. Does the noble Lord object to historical retrospects? Does he mean to say that any man who, at a public meeting, relates the occurrences of 1832 and 1867, is offering incitement to disorder? If he does, then I say that the noble Lord is, as usual, very inconsistent. Speaking on the 19th of December, 1883, at Edinburgh, the noble Lord himself said—

"Now, in 1832 and 1867, when very large settlements of Reform were effected, there can be no doubt that the unenfranchised classes wanted the franchise very much, and it would have been highly inexpedient, not to say impossible, to have refused it. There was, at that time, intense political excitement all over the country, constant mass meetings, imposing demonstrations, gigantic petitions, considerable disturbances, and dangerous riots. To have refused to enlarge the electoral rolls at those times would have brought about a revolution."

Why these are almost my very words. The noble Lord continues—

"But what have you now? You have no political excitement, no mass meetings, no demonstrations, no petitions, no disturbances, no riots, and for this very good reason—that the existing electoral arrangements, although imperfect and anomalous, do not excite any very general or deep dissatisfaction."

I must say I think that such an historical retrospect with a moral of that kind does appear to be an incitement to riot and disorder. But my historical retrospect had a totally different purpose and character. The noble Lord referred to my speech at Hanley on the 7th of October, in which I said that the Tories had not held a single open public meeting, except at Darlington where the resolution was carried against them. That is the reason why the Tories do not hold open public meetings. I defy the Tories now to hold an open public meeting in any single town in the country on this question.

MR. ECROYD: I wish to ask, Mr. Speaker, whether I may answer on behalf of my constituents? ["No!" and cries of "Order!"]

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I say I defy hon. Gentlemen opposite at any open public meeting, held without tickets or conditions, to carry a resolution approving of the action of the House of Lords on the Franchise Bill. The noble Lord referred also to the part of my speech at Hanley in which I said that certain gentlemen were presuming upon the love of order and the hatred of violence on the part of the English people, and in which I spoke of the puny obstacles that would be swept away. I should have liked, if the noble Lord—although, perhaps, it might have lengthened his observations—had quoted the context of that remark, in order that the House might have seen whom the gentlemen I alluded to were, and what were the puny obstacles which I said the resolution, and courage, and love of liberty, and hatred of injustice which are the characteristics of the English people would sweep away. I had been referring to the majority by which the Franchise Bill had been rejected by the House of Lords, and I said that they consisted of 59 Peers; and it was the monstrous pretensions of those 59 persons, who were not representatives in any sense, and who are under no adequate responsibility—it was their monstrous pretensions that I described as puny obstacles which would be swept away, and which I am now certain will be swept away in the course of this agitation. With regard to my speech at Newtown, the noble Lord referred to one or two passages in it, but chiefly to that part which has been already quoted, and which I think was perfectly justified by his own observations at Edinburgh. He also quoted the statements that I laid before the meeting, and the question that I put to them—"If the Lords continued to sneer at orderly manifestations of public feeling, what will you do?" The noble Lord makes me responsible for the interjections of the crowd. Why did he not quote the answer given to that question? He has got the answer that was promptly given on the spot—"Turn them out." My question and my observations had the same meaning, and were directed to the same point as those which were made by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister the other day when he warned the Party opposite of the consequences, the inevitable consequences, of pursuing this controversy to the bitter end. There is one part of my speech at Newtown which the noble Lord did not quote, but it has been referred to out-of-doors. Lord Salisbury suggested that I should march to London at the head of my constituents, and expressed a strong opinion that my head would be broken in that case. In answer to that suggestion, I said that I would accept the challenge to head my constituents should they think it right to march upon London, provided that Lord Salisbury would head the column which was to meet them. Now I wish to say that the historical march on London that was projected by my constituents or by the forefathers of my constituents in Birmingham in 1832 was distinctly a peaceful demonstration. The great Political Union always appealed to peaceful and Constitutional means; and that meeting was to have been a demonstration only, not a demonstration of physical force, but a demonstration of the earnestness, the sincerity, and the self-sacrifice of the men who took part in it. And, therefore, in saying that I would head a similar march, I only referred to an equally peaceful demonstration. But some comment has been made on the expression that I would meet Lord Salisbury. Let the House recollect the circumstances in which that challenge was made. Who is Lord Salisbury? He is a man who has served the Crown in the highest Offices; he is the Leader of the Conservative Party, a great Peer, a man who has had a much longer and much wider political experience than I have had; and if he thought that he was justified in making such an insinuation, such a suggestion, as that I should march with my constituents on London, and that I should get my head broken, I confess that I thought I was justified in giving a bantering retort of the same character. But if the House should be of opinion that such an insinuation or suggestion was unworthy of Lord Salisbury, and is deserving of the censure of the House, I, for my part, am perfectly prepared to submit my retort to an exactly equivalent censure. I deny that in my speech at Newtown I incited to violence or disorder. I said, however, that there were two men who had conspicuously done so—namely, the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock and Lord Salisbury. I repeat that statement here, and I should not have much difficulty in proving it. If I repeat it now it is because I am sincerely anxious to repeat the warning which I have endeavoured to give in public speeches. I know that it is difficult to get hon. Gentlemen opposite to see the difference between a warning and a threat. I know that when the Prime Minister the other night spoke of the consequences that would ensue from this agitation if it were continued, hon. Gentlemen opposite called out, "That is a threat." Well, Sir, where my right hon. Friend has failed I confess that I have little hope that I shall succeed. But I say, speaking seriously, and with a sense of my responsibility, that I think I know perhaps more than most men in this House of the opinions on this question of the great masses of my fellow-countrymen. I have been in close communication only recently with very large numbers of those men, and especially with the leaders of the working classes in different parts of the country, and I say that the spirit and the temper which they are showing has filled me with alarm, and that if this controversy is pursued in the rancorous spirit in which it has hitherto been carried on by the noble Lord and by Lord Salisbury—[“No!” from the Opposition, and Ministerial cheers—] then I, for one, dread the consequences. Someone cried “No!” when I said that the controversy had been carried on in a rancorous spirit. The noble Lord said to-night that if anyone read his recent speeches—and he called the House to witness his assertion—he would find that there was not one word in them which would not pass the criticism of the Chair. I think, however, that Mr. Speaker would be very much surprised to hear some of the language used by the noble Lord in those speeches of his. I have gone over those speeches lately. It was not a very pleasant task; and I have culled a few of the choice flowers of rhetoric that are to be found in them which I should like to lay before the House. I will take my own case first. The noble Lord has described me as a “pinchbeck Robespierre.” Well, I believe Robespierre was, by the common assent of his contemporaries, called the “incorruptible.” The historical memory of the noble Lord can furnish him with the names of some persons who were not entitled to that appellation. Then the noble Lord went on to describe my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board as a “renegade democrat,” and he spoke of the Home Secretary as using the “language of a bravo with the spirit of a flunkey.” He spoke of the right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Birmingham as “a plundering cuckoo, animated by the calculating meanness of his sect.”

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: That is a mistake in the papers. I said “meekness,” not “meanness.” It was a misreport.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I might retort upon the noble Lord, as in his accusation against myself, and say that, by not publicly denying the statement, he has practically accepted the responsibility.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I did deny it, in a letter which was published ever so long ago.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The passage which referred to my right hon. Friend is, at length, as follows—it was delivered at Kidlington on January 31 of the present year—

“Those who read Mr. Charles Villiers’s speeches will find that Mr. Bright and his dear friend, Mr. Cobden, were nothing more nor less than two plundering cuckoos, who shamefully ejected Mr. Charles Villiers from the nest which he had constructed, and who reared therein their own chattering and silly brood.”

He then went on to say—

“Mr. Bright enjoyed for two years the emolument of a sinecure office. During those two years two bloody wars were waged—the war in Afghanistan and the war in the Transvaal. Very bloody and disgraceful wars they were; but Mr. Bright continued to draw his salary, and he lolled at ease in his sinecure office. He swallowed these bloody wars with the calculating meekness of the sect to which he belongs.”

Well, Sir, the noble Lord also described the Duke of Argyll and Lord Cowper as the party of “snivel and drivel.” He permitted himself to speak of the Prime Minister as an “unkennelled fox.” The noble Lord went on to say that he had read my speeches, and had found them “poor stuff.” I cannot compete with the noble Lord; but I say that the people of this country are loyal to the Leaders they have chosen, and the great majority of the people when they read such statements are filled first with disgust and then with indignation. If the noble Lord does not moderate the rancour of his tongue he will have himself only to thank for the consequences which follow, and which we, at all events, should all deplore.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Assassination.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The noble Lord is now going to accuse me of incitement to assassination. Why, Sir, I might as well accuse the noble Lord of incitement to arson and burglary, because he has to-day put the case that his friends in Birmingham could attack my house and pull down my walls. I know his friends will not do anything of the kind, and I do not accuse the noble Lord of any incitement. Do not let him accuse me of anything so absurd and ridiculous in very poor imitation of a charge once brought against Sir Robert Peel by Richard Cobden. This personal abuse to which I have referred is, after all, not so dangerous as the insults which are flung against the people of the country. Personal abuse is taken, after all, by many people in its Pickwickian sense. [LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Its figurative sense.] Well, in its figurative sense. But I believe that, although Lord Salisbury has done many unwise things in his time, he has never done anything that he will have more cause to regret than when he taunted the people of this country with their good-humour. [An hon. MEMBER: When? and cries of "Quote!"] When he described the first great important demonstration which took place in connection with this matter in Hyde Park, as "a meeting of Radicals taking wholesome exercise," and said that they were quite entitled to have their holiday in the open air. [Cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite may cheer that sentiment; but I tell them that these scoffs and jeers sink into the hearts of the people. But if Lord Salisbury has been indiscreet, what can be said of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock? The other day, when I referred to his speech at Edinburgh, he contradicted me in the face of the House, because he knew that I had not his actual words before me. I told him I would substantiate that statement, and now I am about to do it. The words I refer to were spoken on the 19th of December, 1883, at Edinburgh, and were as follows:—

"If I saw the agricultural labourers of Great Britain in a great state of excitement"—

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Hear, hear! Agricultural labourers.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN:—

"The agricultural labourers of Great Britain in a great state of excitement over this question; if I saw them holding mass meetings, collecting together from all parts, neglecting their work, contributing from their scanty funds, marching on London, tearing down the railings of Hyde Park, engaging the police, and even the military, I should say to myself these men have great and bitter grievances which have not been represented in Parliament, or have been neglected by Parliament; they know that if they had the franchise those grievances would no longer be neglected, that they would be represented and remedied; and they have made up their minds to have the vote. The fact that they have made up their minds to have the vote shows pretty well that they will know how to use the vote, and if we wish for peace, order, and stability in the realm of Britain we had better give them the vote. And on those grounds, and on those grounds only, would I consent to equalize the political position of the agricultural labourer and the town artisan, and to destroy a wise inequality which has been created by Nature and reiterated from time to time in our history by precedent, custom, and law."

I say that was the most dangerous of all the speeches made in the course of this discussion. I say that is a speech which directly incites to violence and outrage. It is a speech which directly points the moral that without violence, without outrage, no redress can ever be secured. Now, I say, in conclusion, while I earnestly trust and hope that this agitation will maintain the character which it has hitherto, speaking generally, so honourably borne, if it should lose that character, the responsibility will lie on the shoulders of men who think themselves justified in insulting the people, in taunting them with the orderly character of the demonstrations which they have made, and who think it safe to call for "great and violent pressure," and to avow their absolute disbelief in the earnestness or the reality of any political agitation which is not supported by the exhibition of physical force.

MR. P. A. MUNTZ said, he thought hon. Members would realize that it was an extremely disagreeable circumstance to him that he should, on the first occasion on which he rose to address the House, have to devote the observations he should make to the purpose of impugning the conduct and character of a right hon. Gentleman, a Member of that House; but he had a duty to perform to his constituents and the country, and therefore he had risen to answer the eloquent speech of the President of the Board of Trade. He (Mr. Muntz) had always heard that the right hon. Gentleman had a great reputation for audacity, and a doubtful one for accuracy; but he could not have conceived that any man could have had the amount of audacity which the President of the Board of Trade must be possessed of to have made the speech he had delivered that evening. It had fairly surprised him. A few days ago, the right hon. Gentleman, in answer to a Question, said that, if his information was correct, the only persons who had been guilty of disgraceful conduct at Aston Park were the roughs hired as "chuckers-out" by the Tory Party. Knowing, as he did, the facts of the case, and being cognizant of the action of the Liberal Association at Birmingham, that statement of the President of the Board of Trade had filled him with amazement. The original idea of the organization of the demonstrations which took place early in the autumn was accredited to the President of the Board of Trade and the members of the Caucus. It might, indeed, have received some assistance from the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary. It was imagined that the Conservative Party had no idea or power of organizing political demonstrations, and that a great influence would be exercised by the agitation thus originated by the President of the Board of Trade. The Conservative Party, however, wisely determined upon a counter-agitation, which had been a great success. It had gathered volume until it culminated in the triumphant reception of Lord Salisbury at Glasgow. The result of that was, that a great fear fell upon the President of the Board of Trade and the Caucus, and a council of war was held. They realized that the coming demonstration in Aston Lower Grounds would be a very great success, and that unless steps were taken to prevent so large a meeting it would probably number some 200,000 people. The right hon. Gentleman had told them that there were no Conservatives in Birmingham or neighbourhood; but he (Mr. Muntz) was a standing witness in contradiction of that statement. He maintained that he was accurate in the number of Conservatives present at the Aston Lower Grounds. As a matter of fact, there were at the meeting 120,000 Conservatives, notwithstanding the dishonest practices of the right hon. Gentleman and the Caucus.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I rise to Order, Sir. I wish to know whether the hon. Member is in Order in imputing dishonest practices to a Member of this House?

MR. SPEAKER: I did not catch the exact expression to which the right hon. Gentleman alludes; but, undoubtedly, it would be an improper and un-Parliamentary expression. If the hon. Member used it, he will, no doubt, withdraw it.

MR. P. A. MUNTZ said, he would bow to the right hon. Gentleman's ruling, and withdraw the words "dishonest practices," substituting for them the words "irregular practices." A greater insult was never offered to the working men of Birmingham than that contained in the statement that they originated the disturbance in Aston Lower Grounds. He (Mr. Muntz) maintained that they would have listened with the greatest possible pleasure, respect, and attention to the Leader of the Opposition, if they had been allowed to do so. The violent conduct which was seen was the result of the council of war to which he had already referred, at which a determination was come to to raise a fund for the purpose of carrying out demonstration by violence. In fact, a leading member of the Liberal Party in Birmingham told him that he had been asked to subscribe to the fund, and that he had declined to subscribe to anything so disreputable. Beyond that, he (Mr. Muntz) knew a good many of the artisans of Birmingham personally, and one, a man of the highest respectability, whom he had known for 30 years—a Liberal of the old school, and not of the type of the President of the Board of Trade—told him that he went to hear the Leader of the Opposition, and that he had been a witness of the proceedings, and that he was able to state, from his own observation, that the demonstration was interfered with, not by the working men of Birmingham, but by roughs hired for the purpose, who, from the method of their operations, must have been carrying out a preconcerted plan. He said that, as he was standing at a little distance from the boundary wall inside Aston Lower Grounds, he saw a number of men come up in a body and heard some of the leaders say—"We are not in the right place; we ought to be 60 or 70 yards lower down," and they moved lower down. Immediately, a man, respectably dressed—perhaps he was a colleague of the President of the Board of Trade—appeared on the wall and was joined by another, and they began helping the men outside over the wall. That proved that the entrance into Aston Lower Grounds by storming the walls was planned beforehand. A friend of his, who was fond of athletic exercises and well acquainted with the better class of pugilists in Birmingham, told him that he saw a man whom he knew to be one of the low hangers-on of the pugilistic element attacking the platform and doing other damage. The right hon. Gentleman said that no damage had been done; but if he had received one-half the amount of injury that was sustained by some of the poor women and children who were present, he would be of a different opinion. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that he had no influence or power at Birmingham; but he forgot what he had stated previously, and shortly after offered to guarantee the Leader of the Opposition a favourable reception at Birmingham if he placed himself under his direction. The fact was, that this vicious and violent outrage upon life and property was perpetrated by men instructed by the Caucus, and that Caucus was nothing more than the right hon. Gentleman, and dared not lift a finger without his knowledge and assent. The vast majority of his countrymen had a strong opinion of the political dishonesty of the right hon. Gentleman. [Cries of "Withdraw!"] Well, then, he would say of his political action. The right hon. Gentleman was a declared Republican, and yet he had accepted Office in the present Administration as a Minister of the Crown; and while a Minister of the Crown and servant of the Constitution, he attacked that Constitution on every occasion, and in every conceivable way. Such conduct did not commend itself to the minds of his countrymen; but let him settle that with his own conscience. They were all ready to give the right hon. Gentleman credit for a certain amount of shrewdness; but what were they to say of a man who had shown his imbecility by organizing this outrage, which the right hon. Gentleman would probably discover at the next General Election had done more harm to the Liberals and more good to the Conservatives than all the meetings that had been held during the Recess? Two days after this action of the right hon. Gentleman in the Aston Lower Grounds, he (Mr. Muntz) was in a colliery district of his constituency; and he would challenge the right hon. Gentleman to hold a meeting in that district. He would not dare to do so to save his life. Had his (Mr. Muntz's) mind been framed on anything like the lines of the right hon. Gentleman's, he might have accepted an offer voluntarily made to him by a man who had great influence over the colliers, and who said to him—"If you want a few thousand men I will send them down." The right hon. Gentleman talked of marching on London with 100,000 men. He (Mr. Muntz), if his mind were of the same type as that of the right hon. Gentleman, would not trouble him to do that—he could meet him with much pleasure on his favourite battle-field in Aston Lower Grounds with any number of men he liked to name, and they could settle the business there. But that threat of the right hon. Gentleman was nothing but a swashbuckler declaration. To say that the working men of this country were all Radicals was rubbish. There were two challenges which he would give the right hon. Gentleman. In the first place, he would like to hear him emphatically declare that he had no knowledge of this disturbance—and it was very strange if he had not, seeing that many of the old respectable members of the Liberal Party left Birmingham a few days beforehand, rather than be mixed up in it; and then he would challenge the right hon. Gentleman to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the whole transaction, and have all the evidence that could be produced on the subject. Let the right hon. Gentleman clear himself in that way.

MR. ERNEST NOEL said, the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), when speaking the other night with regard to what took place recently at Dumfries, said it was one of the most dastardly outrages that had ever happened. [Cries of "Question!"]

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked whether the hon. Member was in Order in referring to the riot at Dumfries?

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member would not be in Order in going fully into the Dumfries riot; but he might refer to it by way of illustration.

MR. ERNEST NOEL said, he regretted very much the occurrence at Dumfries, which was analogous to what took place at Aston. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. GREGORY rose to Order, and pointed out that the hon. Member was again speaking of the Dumfries riot.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member could not be permitted to go fully into the case at Dumfries on the Amendment before the House.

MR. ERNEST NOEL said, that if the Conservatives thought that what took place at Aston might be repeated in every constituency in the country, he feared they had before them a time of very serious injury. There seemed to be reason to apprehend that measures had been resorted to for the permanent production of scenes of disorder and violence by the Conservative Party. The disturbances at Dumfries and Aston were in complete analogy; and he learned that similar scenes were to be looked for in other parts of the country, to the very grievous injury of the State at large. What occurred at Aston provoked riot elsewhere. At the proper time he would show that in what took place at Dumfries the provocation was much greater and the riot considerably less, though it was still very much to be regretted.

MR. CHAPLIN said, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade commenced his observations by defending the Birmingham Corporation, and he was absolutely silent with regard to the charges brought against himself. The right hon. Gentleman said he thought it necessary to reply at once to the charges against the Corporation, because, if they were left unanswered, they might be injurious to local government. Hon. Members knew that the right hon. Gentleman was a Minister of the Crown; and, if those charges left unanswered were calculated to injure local government, it must be far more injurious to the Imperial Government to leave unanswered charges directed against a Minister. He (Mr. Chaplin) must, however, be allowed to say that he was greatly surprised that, even on the Ministerial side of the House, the smallest attempt should be made to vindicate or defend proceedings which had doubtless met with the reprobation of all classes throughout the country. As to the time occupied in the debate, in all probability if the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had replied to the charges against him when they were first made, the discussion would not now have taken place. ["Oh, oh!"] If the original charges were not in the Notice of Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), they were in his speech. The noble Lord said that the Conservative Party at Birmingham had, in their possession, distinct evidence of preparation for these riots by their opponents; they had evidence as to the tickets used by the Liberals, that ladders had been provided and introduced into the grounds, to storm the building in which the Conservatives were to assemble, and that gangs of roughs had been organized by the Caucus. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade must have been aware that there was a probability of those riots occurring when the right hon. Baronet the Leader of the Opposition was to visit Birmingham, and he might have done something to prevent the disturbance which occurred; but he had admitted that he did absolutely nothing to prevent them. And what was his excuse? Want of influence in Birmingham? Nothing of the sort. He said he could not have stopped the counter-demonstration, if he would, and he would not, if he could. But yet, later on in his speech, he expressed the hope that the Leader of the Opposition would overlook what had occurred, and stated that, if the right hon. Baronet would come to another meeting at Birmingham, he, who informed the House that he had no influence whatever in that town, and could not have stopped the riots, would guarantee that there should be a free and open meeting. His words were—

"If you come to another meeting in that town I will stand by your side, and you shall have a fair hearing."

As to the depositions produced by the right hon. Gentleman, it was said that they were not in a form on which a prosecution for perjury could be instituted. But, at all events, they, one and all, had been procured for the purpose of this debate. They were all dated the 27th and 28th of October, and had been got since the Notice of his noble Friend had been given. The right hon. Gentleman told them, with apparently great satisfaction, that, in the great majority of cases, these depositions had been made by gentlemen whom he termed "roughs." The House would do well to wait until they had heard the other side on that question. There could be no doubt—for against all that they had the knowledge, which was the public knowledge of the world, which was stated at the time in papers of all shades of public opinion—that there never was a question or a doubt but that this was an organized riot, and that it was deliberately arranged for the purpose of breaking up the meeting of the Conservative Party. If what the President of the Board of Trade now said was true, why was not the contradiction given before? The right hon. Gentleman was the only Member of the Liberal Party who had had the courage to give it. He vindicated his own speeches with respect to the House of Lords, while he abstained from a condemnation of the proceedings at Birmingham. As to the speech of Lord Salisbury that had been referred to, in which he spoke of the right hon. Gentleman's head being broken on the occasion of a certain march, it ought to be remembered that the noble Marquess had placed upon it a totally different construction from that of the right hon. Gentleman. No portion of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was received with more satisfaction on the Treasury Bench, than that in which he lectured the noble Lord upon his flowers of rhetoric; and that was, probably, because Ministers had felt the lash of his tongue and had something for which they wished to be revenged. When the right hon. Gentleman referred to the noble Lord's attack on the Secretary of State for the Home Department, it was refreshing to see the scion of the house of Vernon receive that vindication from the President of the Board of Trade. But what of the speeches the right hon. Gentleman himself had made? He should like the House to consider some portions of those made by the right hon. Gentleman during the Recess. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the House of Lords in a most hostile manner. He said of it—

"It is a stronghold of Toryism, prejudice, and Tory obstruction. During the last 100 years, it has never contributed one iota to popular liberty, or ever done anything to advance the common weal."

That was a strong statement to be made by a Minister of the Crown; especially of the present House of Lords and of the Leader of the Opposition in that House. He supposed Lord Salisbury was a Member of that House, and he would remind hon. Gentlemen that the Royal Commission which had been appointed to inquire into the condition of the dwellings of the poor, and from which he hoped much good would result, had been moved for by Lord Salisbury in the House of Lords. [Cries of "Broadhurst!"] He always thought that Commission was moved for by Lord Salisbury in the Upper House, and not by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stoke in the House of Commons. The day would come when the right hon. Gentleman would regret that he had spoken with such violence as he had done of the House of Lords. They would have to go to a Division soon, and having heard the accusation and the defence, he had no doubt as to the vote he should give on this occasion. From first to last it had been apparent to him that the President of the Board of Trade, throughout the whole of these proceedings, and in all his speeches during the Recess, had been animated by one object, and one alone—not to stop this controversy, not to settle this question, but to raise up a feeling of discontent and violence in the country, with the view of inflicting, as in his own conscience he hoped would be the case, irreparable injury, in which he (Mr. Chaplin) was certain he would fail, on the House of Lords as one of the Institutions of this country.

Mr. FIRTH said, he scarcely thought that the noble Lord opposite (Lord Randolph Churchill) could be congratulated upon the success which had attended his efforts in badger-drawing. If it were justifiable to compare his right hon. Friend to one of the lower order of creation, perhaps a more representative animal could not have been selected. An eminent naturalist had said of the badger that it was an inoffensive animal—[Laughter—]—provided by nature for its own defence with very powerful claws—[Renewed laughter—]—for its own defence, which latter peculiarity had been discovered by intrusive terriers before to-day. It had struck him as extraordinary that the Tories should have posed before the country, since the Aston disturbance, as champions of peace and order and vindicators of the right of public meeting. He (Mr. Firth) had had some experience of Tory methods on these very points, and he supposed that he had faced as many hired Tory roughs as anybody in the House or out of it. ["Oh, oh!" and laughter.] He was prepared for objections to this statement of fact, and he had, therefore, taken the precaution of preparing himself with sufficient evidence, which he could lay before the House if it was necessary. For a recent public meeting held by the Municipal Reform League forged tickets to the extent of 20,000 were issued by the opponents of Reform, and these were widely circulated by Conservative Associations in London. ["Order!" and "Question!"]

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. and learned Member would be in Order only in referring to this case by way of illustration.

MR. FIRTH said, that he would only make the general observation that, upon the facts of the case being brought under their notice, the Central Conservative Association declined to take any action in the matter. They had had many meetings throughout London, at which there had been organized Tory opposition, and therefore he was surprised to find the Conservative Party posing as the champions of public order. He had in his possession the statutory declaration of a man who had been employed by the secretary of a Conservative Association, of which the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) was president, to get together a number of men to break up a meeting of his constituents at Kensington. He considered the speech of his right hon. Friend a satisfactory answer to the charges of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock as regarded what took place at Aston; indeed, he had scarcely hoped that his right hon. Friend would have been able to make so complete a defence. He had not thought the riot was much to be wondered at, when in the papers of Monday there appeared the report of a violent speech of Lord Salisbury's, in which reference was made to the breaking of the President of the Board of Trade's head. What did that mean? Whatever it meant, it was not to be wondered at if the 20,000 men thought it meant a little more than the noble Marquess intended; and it had seemed to him only a natural corollary of that speech that the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock—worthy follower of a worthy Chieftain—should be tearing through the bushes at Aston, at night, to save his own head. The Caucus had been referred to; and although the Associations in his (Mr. Firth's) own borough were not connected with the Birmingham Association, he would urge that the so-called Caucus only embodied the representative principle, and in objecting to the Caucus, hon. Gentlemen opposite were objecting to that principle.

Mr. Firth

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he wished to briefly refer to a paragraph from a proclamation issued by the "Franchise Demonstration Committee" of Birmingham, to which he believed the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) was only now a contributor, but about which the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings) would be able to give information first-hand. That paragraph, after a reference to Lord Salisbury, went on to say—"Another Tory, the Right Hon. James Lowther, describes you who are going to take part in it 'as a horde of ruffians.'" The hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), speaking last summer at St. James's Hall, had also accused him of using a similar expression with reference to the participants in the Hyde Park Demonstration, though the hon. Baronet had subsequently assured him that he had been misled by an erroneous report of what he (Mr. Lowther) had really said, and had expressed very frankly his regret at having been so misled. In the whole course of his public life he had never had to retract anything. He therefore tried to discover whether he had ever described the "men of Birmingham and the Midlands," to whom the placard was addressed, as a "horde of ruffians." Well, it happened that he made a speech at Huddersfield, a few days after the August Bank Holiday, in which he had referred to the speech made at Birmingham by the President of the Board of Trade. The right hon. Gentleman had mentioned the project of a march of 100,000 men to London at the time of the first Reform Bill, and the riots which took place at Nottingham, Bristol, and other places. He had said that he had never retracted anything that he had ever said, but he had, however, written to The Times to qualify his statement by saying that he should apply to such violent attempts to intimidate the Legislature language much stronger than the mild and wholly inadequate terms which had been quoted from him in the placard to which he had referred. He distinctly applied the words which had been quoted to any persons who were capable of accepting the advice offered to them as to marching to London. [MR. MUNDELLA: Nobody ever did give them that advice.] The right hon. Gentleman opposite the Vice President of the Council evidently had not heard him when he read his statement to the effect that he addressed these remarks to the persons who were capable of acting on the suggestion of the President of the Board of Trade in reference to marching upon London: [Mr. GLADSTONE: There was no such suggestion.] With regard to the chair-breakers of Birmingham, who, he was bound to say, by their course of procedure had evinced a practical interest in the redistribution of seats that might be advantageously imitated by the Members of the Government, it would be unfair to look upon such persons as being fair representatives of the masses of the population of this country any more than it would be to regard the handful of hon. Members who habitually interrupted the debates of the House of Commons by discourteous and disorderly sounds as representing the House at large. He should not have referred in detail to that episode, but for the circumstance that the President of the Board of Trade had mentioned the placard; and, moreover, the right hon. Gentleman had asserted that the men of Birmingham were called upon to resent the insults which had been flung at them by his noble Friend below the Gangway (Lord Randolph Churchill) and by others—apparently among the others involving himself (Mr. J. Lowther), although he had, months ago, in the most public manner, repudiated the construction placed upon his language. He was perfectly prepared to leave the issue of this controversy on the statement of his noble Friend the Member for Woodstock and the explanation attempted by the right hon. Gentleman; and, as far as the debate was concerned, he thought the House would arrive at the conclusion that the intolerant spirit which evinced itself even now among hon. Gentlemen opposite was only an instance of the determination on the part of the Liberal Party, in every conceivable manner, to suppress freedom of speech in that House and out of it, and to detract as far as possible from the right of public meeting in this country.

VISCOUNT NEWPORT said, he wished to mention a small incident in reference to the hiring of roughs. He lived in the parish of Aston, close by Birmingham, and he was prevented from going to the meeting to hear the speeches of the right hon. Baronet the Leader of the Opposition and of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock; but, on returning home, a week afterwards, he happened to be talking to his gardener, who informed him that he had attended the meeting at Aston, and had found himself in the midst of the roughs, and had narrowly escaped having his head broken by a chair. The gardener stated that, finding himself close to a man who appeared to be one of the ringleaders of the disturbance, he said to him—"This is a disgraceful thing that you are doing." The man replied—"It is, and I have had about enough of it; but I have had 2s. given to me for the job, and so I am obliged to do it." And he added—"There are 70 others here who have had 2s. apiece given to them to smash up this meeting." [Cries of "Name!"] This was a plain unvarnished fact, which told its own tale, and he had felt it his duty to state it to the House. [Laughter.] His informant was an unimaginative man, who had been with him for several years, and upon whose veracity he could place the most implicit reliance. He had also heard that a fortnight before these occurrences, the Liberals were getting up an organized opposition to the meeting, and that Messrs. Tangye were at the bottom of it. In conclusion, he thanked the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) for ventilating this subject, and, in supporting his Amendment, he did so because he believed he was thereby expressing the feeling of all his neighbours who had the good name of the town at heart, and helping to prevent the recurrence of what respectable men of either Party could not fail to consider a scandal and a disgrace.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that hon. Members opposite laughed when his noble Friend (Viscount Newport) adduced testimony to show that individuals were hired to break up the meeting. ["By whom were they hired?"] By the Liberals. ["No, no!"] But he failed to see why this testimony was of less value than that which had been so freely produced on the other side. For his part, he should like to have some thorough examination into the value of the evidence which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade brought forward to show that roughs had been hired by the Tories to assault Liberals. The men who had sworn that they were hired by the Conservatives swore to the fact that they were guilty of a criminal offence. He should like to know what bribe was offered to them to take such an oath. Not, he supposed, a disinterested love of virtue. Yet, if the evidence was bought, what was its value? He wished to know whether it was credible, as stated by the right hon. Gentleman, that the roughs alleged to have been hired to assault the Liberals at this meeting, should have been allowed to wear the insignia of stewards? The right hon. Gentleman, at the commencement of his speech, had made an elaborate profession of respect towards the right hon. Baronet the Leader of the Conservative Party in that House, and he had told the right hon. Baronet that if he would come down to Birmingham alone, he (Mr. Chamberlain) would guarantee him a quiet meeting; yet, in the same speech, the right hon. Gentleman had said that he had no longer any influence in the councils of the Liberal Party at Birmingham which could be used to prevent them from committing outrages. But if the right hon. Gentleman possessed sufficient influence to enable him to guarantee a quiet meeting to the right hon. Baronet, why had he not exercised that influence to prevent the outrages which had occurred at Aston Park?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he denied that he had spoken of a Conservative meeting. What he had said was, that it was impossible to guarantee that an open meeting in Birmingham would not, in the main, be Liberal, but that he had such confidence in the good feeling of the majority of the people of Birmingham, that he was sure that they would do their best to secure a quiet and orderly meeting for a politician so highly respected as the right hon. Baronet.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR felt bound to remark that the respect professed for the right hon. Baronet by the members of the Liberal Party was shown at Aston in a very singular shape. But if the right hon. Gentleman did exercise such great influence in Birmingham as he boasted—and his speech plainly showed that that influence over the populace was so great that he could have a quiet meeting whenever he pleased—why had he not used it to prevent the recent riots? He would now turn from the special controversy connected with the Birmingham riots, which, in his opinion, had occupied far too large a proportion of the debate, to the more general question of the Ministerial language used in the Recess. He (Mr. A. J. Balfour) did not wish to dwell upon the attacks which had been made upon the private and personal character of Members of the House of Lords further than to say that so far as he had observed they consisted in about equal measure of bad history, bad logic, and bad taste. For his own part, he did not know that the personal character of the Members of that House, as a whole, was much better than that of the Members of the House of Lords. Hon. Members had, as a rule, little claim to distinction except such as flowed from their having secured the favour of not too fastidious constituencies, and had obediently followed their Party Whips into the Lobby. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to think that he was in no way bound to condemn what had taken place in Birmingham. He (Mr. A. J. Balfour) wished, however, to remind the right hon. Gentleman that in some cases not to blame was to praise, and not to declare an act wrong was to allow it by implication to be right. The right hon. Gentleman was perfectly well aware that his speech at Hanley was liable to be regarded as an incitement to rioting. Notwithstanding that fact, however, the right hon. Gentleman had never uttered one word in condemnation of the outrages which had naturally resulted from his speech, and which had disgraced his native town. The taunt of the right hon. Gentleman with regard to public meetings amounted to this—that although it was admitted that even in Birmingham there were sufficient Tories to fill a public hall, the Tories were not sufficiently dexterous to fill a hall before their opponents could fill it. The right hon. Gentleman, in whose borough the outrage had occurred, was bound, as a Minister of the Crown, to condemn it on pain of being regarded as a party to it. Unless a Cabinet Minister, in no ambiguous language, denounced outrages which were alleged, with every appearance of probability, to have been the outcome of his utterances, judgment must go by default. The right hon. Gentleman, in an impressive peroration, had told the House that he had received communications from working men in all parts of the country which had filled him with alarm; and the right hon. Gentleman added that he knew more about public opinion in this country than any other Member in that House. If popular feeling was so excited as the right hon. Gentleman represented, what did the Prime Minister think of a Colleague who did his best to fan that feeling into a dangerous flame? He wished to know what, in such circumstances, was the duty of a Minister of the Crown? Was it to moderate the feelings of the people, or to excite them? The right hon. Gentleman had used language which incited the people to disorderly agitation. He would guarantee that, if the right hon. Gentleman would place his case before a lawyer in Ireland, he would be told that if he made speeches in the Sister Island similar to those he had made in this country, he would have to sleep on a plank bed, and live on prison cocoa. Then the right hon. Gentleman made a perfectly gratuitous attack on Lord Salisbury. [Laughter.] When he said gratuitous, he meant an attack not germane to the question. He thought the right hon. Gentleman would have done better to ask Lord Granville to deal with Lord Salisbury in a place where the latter could answer for himself. The first thing which the right hon. Gentleman had complained of in Lord Salisbury was a prophecy that, under certain contingencies, he (Mr. Chamberlain) would have his head broken. But it must be recollected that Lord Salisbury's statement was made after the right hon. Gentleman had threatened to march to London at the head of 100,000 of his fellow-citizens. Those who led military enterprises must expect, of course, to undergo the chances of war; and he had no doubt the right hon. Gentleman would not shrink from the ordeal. Then they were told that Lord Salisbury had sneered at the people, because he had said that many of those who attended the demonstration in Hyde Park had done so merely to enjoy an outing. If the right hon. Gentleman thought that an incentive to outrage, how came he to regard the inflammatory placard, to which his noble Friend had alluded, as a piece of harmless chaff? Again, it had been alleged that Lord Salisbury once said that he did not observe any violent signs of public feeling; but was it fair to interpret that as meaning physical violence? The right hon. Gentleman was trying to bring violent pressure on the House of Lords. Did that mean that he was going to break Tory windows and fire Tory rickyards? [Mr. GLADSTONE here rose to express his dissent.] He was not referring to the Prime Minister at all, but to the President of the Board of Trade. The complaint that had been made against the right hon. Gentleman was not based on Party grounds, neither did he (Mr. A. J. Balfour) complain of the violence that had been used at Party meetings such as this at Aston. His belief was that the Conservative Party gained enormously by every act of outrage and violence committed by the opposite side. [Cheers and laughter.] What they did not gain was the cause of Constitutional freedom. More and more questions were being debated, not merely in that House or in the Press, but in the very presence of the constituencies. But if the only arguments that were to pass current there were to consist of noise and outrage, if the most successful politician was to be he who could break up most meetings, government by free discussion would become impossible, and our public life would become hopelessly degraded.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE and Mr. JESSE COLLINGS rose together, when—

MR. SPEAKER called on

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE, who said, that, in his opinion, his right hon. Friend (Mr. Chamberlain) had completely crushed all vitality out of the case presented by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Randolph Churchill), and that the only speech made since the speech of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Chamberlain) which had contributed anything whatever towards the evidence in the possession of the House, was the maiden speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Muntz). [Laughter.] Of course, he did not refer to the senior Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), whose speeches they had often listened to with pleasure. Although the speech to which he had referred was a maiden speech, he feared he could not use the ordinary language of commendation with regard to it, seeing that the hon. Gentleman, during its delivery, had been twice called to Order, and ordered to withdraw expressions contained in it. The hon. Member had, however, made a distinct allegation bearing on the case before the House. He said he had recently met a leading Liberal in Birmingham, who had told him that he had been asked to contribute to a fund collected for the purpose of a demonstration by violence. He had at once been asked to give the name of that gentleman. The hon. Member, however, had declined to give the name, and he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was unable to treat that statement as deserving of the careful attention of the House, unless the hon. Member were willing to give the name.

MR. P. A. MUNTZ said, he had given the President of the Board of Trade the opportunity of moving for a Committee to inquire into these matters. In fact, he challenged him now to move for one, when he should be glad to substantiate what he had said.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, continuing, said, that the hon. Member, in the course of his observations, had endeavoured to connect his right hon. Friend with these disturbances by accusing him of entertaining at that time the Liberal Association at dinner at his house.

MR. P. A. MUNTZ said, he had referred to the dinner party, so as to show that the President of the Board of Trade was in Birmingham at the time and knew of what was taking place.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he hardly thought that the House would wish him to pursue the question of what gentlemen partook of the President of the Board of Trade's hospitality. The hon. Member, by way of connecting his right hon. Friend with the riot, said that he was at the time in Birmingham. But that was no more ground for connecting the President of the Board of Trade with the Aston Grounds riot than the fact that the Lord Mayor was at the Mansion House made him responsible for the violence at Liberal meetings at Chelsea. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire produced another witness. He said that he had met a Birmingham artizan who was a Liberal, and who expressed indignation at the conduct of the roughs employed. The hon. Member did not say whether it was the Tory roughs; but it must have been, for it had been shown that no roughs were employed by the Liberal Party, and it had been conclusively shown that the Tory Party did employ roughs. The hon. Gentlemen the Members for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) and Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour) had argued that the President of the Board of Trade had admitted his influence in Birmingham when he stated that he would do his best to secure the right hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote) a quiet hearing. But the President of the Board of Trade also said that the right hon. Baronet's character and the general moderation of his language entitled him to a respectful hearing from any audience. The hon. Member said the Birmingham people had shown their respect in a singular manner. But it must be remembered that the right hon. Gentleman on this occasion was not alone, and when respectable men were in bad company, they sometimes must not express surprise at what might happen to them on those occasions. He would illustrate the difficulty of getting a quiet hearing for certain persons. On one occasion, Lord Salisbury made a speech in Chelsea—at Lillie Bridge. It was a memorable speech. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke), his Colleague, and the Liberal Association tried to obtain a perfectly quiet hearing for Lord Salisbury. He was quite sure if the noble Lord asked the Conservative candidate for Chelsea, Sir Algernon Borthwick, he would confirm this.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON: I absolutely contradict it. I was present as Chairman. ["Order!"] I only rise for the purpose of contradicting the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. Lord Salisbury, throughout the whole of his speech, was persistently interrupted by a gang of Liberals, led by a gentleman ordinarily called a fogleman. The moment Lord Salisbury had finished, these interrupters left the meeting.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the observations of the noble Lord were no contradiction of what he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had said or was going to say. Though this was the fate of the Marquess of Salisbury, he felt sure that the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) would have received a quiet hearing. But, in spite of the efforts of the Liberal Leaders, they could not secure a quiet hearing for the Marquess of Salisbury.

Sir Charles W. Dilke

It had been said the Birmingham Liberal Association was to all intents the President of the Board of Trade himself. Now, his right hon. Friend was far less connected with the Liberal Association of Birmingham than he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) himself was connected with the Liberal Association of his own borough. ["Question!"] That was the question. Hon. Gentlemen opposite did not understand the working of Representative Liberal Associations. In his own borough he always attended the meetings at which the members of the Council of the Liberal Association were elected, and they were meetings to which every Liberal in the borough was invited to come. At such meetings the Council was elected, and he always made it a rule to be present. But his right hon. Friend never attended the meetings of a similar description which were held in Birmingham. He could assure the House that he had on several occasions tried to exercise some control in his own Association with regard to such matters as meetings; but he had long since given up the attempt, because Associations of this kind, openly and freely elected, resented such interference, on the ground that they were accustomed and competent to conduct their own affairs. The hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour) went on to censure his right hon. Friend for having made a gratuitous attack upon the Marquess of Salisbury. He wished to tell the hon. Member that, in his opinion, there was no such thing as a gratuitous attack on the Marquess of Salisbury, because the Marquess of Salisbury, by his extraordinary violence of language, invited all the attacks which he had received. The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) began his speech that evening by making his main point hang on the speech which his right hon. Friend made on the Bank Holiday in August in Birmingham. That speech was itself a reply called forth by the previous speech of the Marquess of Salisbury. In his speech at Lillie Bridge, the Marquess of Salisbury used these words—"There is no great and violent public pressure." His right hon. Friend gave a temperate warning to the House of Lords, founded on that sentence of the Marquess of Salisbury, and in reply to the statement that there was no evidence of "great and violent public pressure." The right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther) also referred to that speech, and his explanation of the phrase "horde of ruffians" scarcely made the matter one bit better, but rather, as it seemed to him, a great deal worse. The noble Viscount the Member for North Shropshire (Viscount Newport) had stated that, in the knowledge of his gardener, 70 roughs had been employed on the Liberal side at the meeting at Birmingham. It was desirable, however, to have other evidence than merely second-hand statements of that kind. It would be much more satisfactory to have some of those persons produced, or, at least, their names given up. The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) had had a long time to get up his case, and was it not likely that some evidence in support of it would have been forthcoming if it could have been produced? He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was Chairman of the meeting at Kensington in May last, which was disturbed by hired Conservative roughs. ["Name!"] That was exactly what he was asking hon. Gentlemen opposite to do. His Colleague had already stated that evening the names of the persons and the name of the Association by whom the roughs were paid. They were told that some day or other the names of these persons would be produced; but a long time had elapsed, and the matter had been referred to over and over again at Question time. The noble Lord had now had a long time to get up his case, and the attack had at length been made that night. It had, however, entirely failed; it had more than failed; it had proved to be an absurd fiasco, and the House was now promised that some day or other evidence would be produced which ought to have been there that night. The hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour) said that what had occurred at Birmingham was only a small part of the question. But it was a very large part of the question a few days ago. By anticipation they had been told that it was the whole question to be discussed that evening; but now it was said to be only a small part of the matter. In the opinion of the Liberal Members it was a small part of the matter in one sense of those words, because the action of hired persons to break up those meetings, which had been conclusively proved by his right hon. Friend to have come from the other side, was part of a system which had prevailed throughout the country, and which could not be too soon or too conclusively proved to exist, in order that it might cease to exist for the future. It was essential that this should be so, if the free rights of public meetings were to continue to exist in this country. It was the Liberals who would be most affected, because they were always able to bring together the largest number of persons at their meetings. ["No!"] That was a fact so well known that it could not be disputed, and they were therefore most interested in observing the free right of public meeting. Liberals had had evidence, over and over again, of the hiring of persons to attend meetings, and this was a practice absolutely tending to the destruction of the freedom of public meeting. On this occasion, when it had been brought against Liberals as a charge, that charge had broken down, and not a single case had been proved against them. On the contrary, the charge had recoiled against those who made it. He had nothing more to say on this occasion except that he, for one, was glad that the noble Lord had brought this matter before the notice of the House. He should be disposed to doubt whether the noble Lord was quite as glad as he professed to be. No doubt, the noble Lord had been pleased with his speech; but he certainly seemed much less pleased while listening to the reply of the President of the Board of Trade. At all events, they on that (the Ministerial) side of the House had no reason to complain of, or to be dissatisfied with, the manner in which the matter had been gone into that night; and if the Motion were pressed to a Division, he could not but think the House would, by a large majority, vindicate the course which had been taken by his right hon. Friend and the Government.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, he wished to apologize to the President of the Board of Trade for the interruption he had made in the course of the right hon. Gentleman's speech; but he had thought it important that the House should ascertain the nature of the documents he was referring to. The right hon. Gentleman had described them as depositions, and to his (Sir Hardinge Giffard's) great surprise had read the names of the Commissioners appended to them. They had evidently been drawn up by a lawyer, from the phrases used in them, and they must have been drawn up in such a form deliberately, so that the persons making the statements would be responsible to no tribunal for the truth of what the documents contained.

An hon. MEMBER : They were sworn.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council would forgive him for saying that he, at any rate, had not undergone that over-pressure on the brain which was alleged to take place in some of the elementary schools.

MR. MUNDELLA : The hon. and learned Member is labouring under a misapprehension. I did not make a remark at all.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN : The documents were sworn.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, he was afraid the right hon. Gentleman did not know what the meaning of swearing in a judicial proceeding was.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN remarked, that possibly he and the hon. and learned Gentleman were not talking about the same thing. He did not pretend to have the same technical knowledge in these matters as was possessed by the hon. and learned Gentleman. All that he had meant to assert was that the documents were sworn in the ordinary way on a Testament. He did not know whether there was any other way of swearing.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, that the person who drew up the documents must have been a lawyer, and he had evidently drawn them up with the deliberate knowledge that if the witness made a statutory declaration before a magistrate not on oath, he would be liable to prosecution if his declaration was false; but if he went through the form of taking what was called a voluntary oath, he would be liable to no tribunal, even if he stated what was false. After having gone through the form of kissing the Testament and taking what was called an oath, these persons had shielded themselves from any responsibility at all. It was for that reason that he had asked the right hon. Gentleman, across the Table, in what proceedings those documents were sworn. He did not accuse the right hon. Gentleman of being a party to the transaction, because it was obviously devised by someone familiar with legal matters, and with the deliberate intention of not making the persons who made the so-called depositions as responsible if they were made in one form as they would have been if they had been made in another. He was extremely surprised that any Commissioner, authorized to administer oaths in legal matters, should have condescended to such a proceeding as to allow such an oath to be taken, and he said that as the foundation for another observation he desired to make. These oaths, as the right hon. Gentleman termed them, had been taken on the 27th, 28th, and 29th of the present month. The statements, as he understood, which they were meant to support were made before any of the depositions were made, and he wanted to know when, where, how, and under what circumstances they were obtained? The right hon. Gentleman himself, he dared say, could not answer the question; but he should like to know if he had any information on the subject. He should like very much to know from whose hands they came, and he was sorry that the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings) had not been allowed to give his explanation of the circumstance, so as to show from whose hands they came. One observation arose at once. There was a suspicious identity of language about them. They were now produced for the first time; they were applicable to persons who, as the right hon. Gentleman truly said, were named in them; but not one of these persons had had the opportunity of knowing the accusation against him, and they were brought under the notice of the House at such an hour of the evening that even communication by telegraph with the persons whose conduct was impugned was all but impossible. Taking them as they were, they purported to come from persons who professed to have been in the employment of the Tory Party for years for the purpose of breaking up meetings; and for some inducement or another which did not appear—he supposed by pressure of conscience—they now came forward to confess that they had been guilty of these evil practices for some years past, and that on the occasion in question they did all they could—to do what? The statement was a very remarkable one. He observed that there was a delightful vagueness about the phraseology. They were to go with the Conservative Party. In what respect? To tear off the badges of the Liberal Party, which, by some hypothesis, they knew the Liberal Party were going to wear on entering the meeting; and then what were they to do? They were to get upon the platform, and, with chairs and other instruments, were to endeavour to prevent gentlemen from storming the platform. Was it known beforehand that the platform was to be stormed? And that was what they appeared to have been doing. He would like to ask one or two questions of the persons who made these voluntary oaths for which they were not responsible. He confessed that he should not have thought the matter of so much importance in itself if it had not been that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, who had just addressed the House, had described these statements as conclusive proofs that the Conservatives were the people who organized all these riotous interruptions. It was rather remarkable that none of these persons professed to have had anything to do with the knocking down of the wall through which the President of the Board of Trade said 15,000 Liberals had poured. He said they had pulled off the coping of a wall, forsooth!—a wall nine feet high—together with a substantial breach in it, which was likely to cost the ratepayers £125 for the damage done. What had that to do with these conclusive depositions? None of these persons professed to have had anything to do with that part of the transaction. It seemed that these injured Liberals were so distressed by the conduct of the hired ruffians that they found it necessary to “take a little of the coping off,” and to make a breach in the wall. That was the tone in which a Minister of the Crown thought it right to speak of an invasion of that sort. But if 15,000 men entered the grounds as a counter-demonstration, it was not surprising that such a riot should have occurred.

[Sixth Night.]

Though the right hon. Gentleman had told them something about his being in Birmingham for three or four days while the right hon. Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) was there, there was one point to which he had made no reference, although it was referred to by the noble Lord. If there was to be such a meeting calculated to create animosity owing to the false pretences which it was said the Conservatives were about to put before the country, and if there was to be a counter-demonstration of 15,000 people, such as the right hon. Gentleman had described, separated only from the other meeting by a wall which could be knocked down by a ladder put against it, and which was, of course, accidentally fixed there, had it never occurred to the President of the Board of Trade that a collision might take place between two opposite parties so brought together and so hostile to each other? But if it had occurred to the right hon. Gentleman that this might happen—and it was part of the case of his noble Friend—there was another thing to which he had made no reference, nor had he said anything about. Had the right hon. Gentleman done nothing between the Saturday morning when he saw the counter-demonstration announced and the Monday night? Would any man of common sense, knowing the hostile spirit which existed at that time in different parts of Birmingham and elsewhere, deliberately say now that it was a safe experiment to bring 15,000 angry men, excited by an alleged fraud upon the public, within sight of the other meeting? Was there nothing that could have been done? Did no one take sufficient interest in the transaction? He thought that the right hon. Gentleman greatly undervalued his influence in Birmingham. He might have said—"We will expose the fraud, but do not go too near the meeting, because there is sure to be a breach of the peace." The Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was a Member had exhibited from time to time its belief in that common-sense view in regard to Ireland by prohibiting the holding of counter-meetings, and refusing to allow one demonstration to be brought in close proximity to another. He thought that the case made out by the noble Lord had not been broken down, and had not been answered by voluntary depositions, which had never been subjected to any test at all, and which the persons incriminated had had no opportunity of replying to. He could not help thinking that the Motion of the noble Lord went upon more important grounds, and might, perhaps, include others beside the President of the Board of Trade. It appeared to him, from the language of the right hon. Gentleman and of others, that it was possible, by subterfuge and innuendo, to suggest violence and outrage, and yet not directly to recommend it. If anyone were to tell a large multitude of excited people that they were being kept out of their rights by irresponsible and unworthy persons, that those persons were actuated by unworthy motives, and that the only way in which they could obtain their rights was to exhibit the courage which their ancestors had possessed in order to sweep away all puny obstacles, it might be ingenious, but what would the multitude suppose he meant? With reference to the Marquess of Salisbury, one expedient by which violence and outrage might be suggested was to misrepresent what he had said. What the Marquess of Salisbury had said had been over and over again misrepresented before public meetings; and if he were permitted, he would read what it was that the Marquess of Salisbury really did say. What the noble Marquess said was this—

"We know that there are plenty of Radicals in this country; and if it pleases them to walk up and down the roads, and spend their Sundays in the Parks, and to do other things, from which they may derive wholesome exercise, and exhibit themselves in the open air, we know that that gives no indication whatever of the real opinion of the majority of the constituencies, which is the only opinion for which we care, and by which we are bound."—(3 Hansard, [290] p. 468.)

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Hear, hear!
SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD: Yes, the right hon. Gentleman said "Hear, hear!" But was that the mode in which the right hon. Gentleman had represented the Marquess of Salisbury to the country? The right hon. Gentleman, by way of explanation, not by exact quotation of the Marquess of Salisbury's words, but by a sort of innuendo—by expansion of what he chooses to consider to have been in the noble Marquess's mind—had attributed to him what, in fact, he did not say—that he did not believe in any public feeling unless it was accompanied by violence and outrage. The Marquess of Salisbury never said anything of the sort. He defied the right hon. Gentleman to quote a word from the Marquess of Salisbury by which that accusation could be supported. But those observations had been repeated here in a perfectly unqualified sense by the right hon. Gentleman and a Colleague of the right hon. Gentleman. A noble Earl had, indeed, given a warning, predicting to the Marquess of Salisbury how his words would be regarded. For his own part, he agreed that the distinction between a warning and a threat, made under certain circumstances, was very small. The noble Earl to whom he referred—the Earl of Derby—said, on the 8th of July—

“No one who has heard or read the debate here will be likely to suppose that you object to the extended franchise; but do you suppose that the classes who have power—the present electors, or those who are to be electors—read long debates? Not they. If anybody tells them that the Opposition Leaders have said they were not fit to be trusted with a vote, they will swallow it to a man.”—(3 Hansard, [290] p. 391.)

He did not suppose the noble Earl who used that phrase would imagine that his own Colleague would be the first to act upon the hint. Who was it who, at meeting after meeting, and in speech after speech, had attributed to the House of Lords a desire to withhold the franchise from those who were not in the possession of it now? Of course, the Government must not ask the concurrence of the Earl of Derby in those statements, in regard to which the noble Earl told them that no one who had listened to or read the debates could be misled, but the class who were to exercise the power would swallow them to a man. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade was very angry and indignant at the different interpretation which his noble Friend the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) had placed upon his Welsh speech from that which he had meant; but what did the right hon. Gentleman mean by that speech? What did he mean by asking his audience what they would do if orderly meetings did not prevail with the House of Lords? What was the intended antithesis to orderly meetings? How were his auditors to act? How did the right hon. Gentleman suggest that his Welsh audience were to turn out the House of Lords? What was in his mind? What did he intend his audience to understand? When he said, as others had said, “turn them out,” did he mean by due course of law—by orderly legislation, to which the House of Lords itself would consent? He had not said so to-night. Had that observation been made by a private person, it would have been an improper one, and, if used in Ireland, it would have subjected the speaker to prosecution for sedition; but the cardinal importance of the person who made the observation must not be overlooked. It was made by a Cabinet Minister invested with the Executive government of the country, who went about the country using language which 99 out of every 100 persons would understand to mean this—“We, the House of Commons, have determined upon a certain measure, and if you, the House of Lords, do not acquiesce, you will be extinguished as a branch of the Legislature, and by force, if necessary.” [Ministerial cheers.] He quite understood the cheer from that quarter. Hon. Members below the Gangway opposite made no concealment of their views; they spoke in plain language; but the language of the right hon. Gentleman was not plain, and what he complained of in the right hon. Gentleman’s speech was that he did not speak in plain language. He spoke up to the point of how it was to be done, and then he left an excited audience to fill up the blank for themselves as to how they were to get rid of the House of Lords. Instead of appealing to the constituencies, which was what the Conservative side had always demanded, he appealed to violent mobs, and made threats of violence, more or less veiled by specious phrases and innuendoes, to the effect that the House of Lords was to be stamped out of existence, if they would not submit to the dictation of an imperious Minister.

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY M’CARTHY expressed his approval of a very large portion of the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill). The noble Lord had made some remarks on the parallel to be drawn between the utterances of the President of the Board of Trade and some of those of the Irish Leaders. No speeches of Irish Members had been more open to accusations of violence or of inciting to violence than those of the President of the Board of Trade; and yet hon. Members who sat on that side of the House had been condemned to a plank bed, and to all the ignominy and suffering which the Liberal Government could subject them to. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), the Leader of the Irish Party, for replying to an exceedingly violent and unjust speech of the Prime Minister, had been condemned to a long term of imprisonment. The President of the Board of Trade, in the opening part of his speech, had complained of the unfairness of holding a speaker responsible for any crimes which might have been committed because he did not at once deny the allegations which had been made against him. The Irish Members knew that the hon. Member for the City of Cork had been attacked over and over again, because he would not reply to the accusations that were made against him by unscrupulous and mendacious men—because he did not incessantly get up in that House and say that he was not in sympathy with murderers or with assassins. It was historically evident that the Liberal Party were willing to avail themselves of violence if they thought that by so doing they could further their views. It was well known that at the time of the Reform Bill of 1832 many of the Whig Leaders were ready to proceed to violence in order to accomplish their views, and endeavoured to induce Sir Charles Napier to lend them the support of arms. In 1866 the Reform measure was materially aided by violence. It was the violence which broke down the Park railings that eventually carried the Bill; and who was the leader and instigator of that violence? It was a gentleman named Edmond Beales; and when the Liberal Party came into Office how did they treat that instigator of violence? So anxious were they to reward him that they made this veiled revolutionary a County Court Judge. As a rule, the Irish Members took little more interest in the controversies between the two great Parties of the House than in the struggle of the Guelphs and the Ghibellines; but, in this case, Irish interests were distinctly touched. If it were a breach of the law for an Irish Member to deliver a speech which could be twisted into a violent interpretation—and many inoffensive speeches had thus been construed into breaches of the law—it ought to be a breach of the law for the President of the Board of Trade to make a speech which could equally be construed into an incitement to acts of violence. On these grounds he should have great pleasure, if the noble Lord went to a Division, in following him into the Lobby.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that he would detain the House for a very short time; but his own Colleague (Mr. P. A. Muntz) had been honoured by the approval of the President of the Local Government Board, who said that he had stated more facts in support of the present Motion than anybody until the hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard) addressed the House. The reason why there was a difficulty in producing evidence in regard to the disturbance at Aston was owing to the fact that this disturbance had been managed and organized by the Caucus. The Caucus was essentially a secret Society, and yet the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade acknowledged that he continued to be a subscriber to, and intended to remain a member of, that Caucus. He (Mr. Newdegate) was quite certain that much of the obedience of the majority of the House to the dictation of their Whips was caused by their consciousness that this Caucus organization was widely spread throughout the country. Last Session he had brought before the House the measures which the Congress of the United States had passed to prevent this coercion of political liberty. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade sat opposite to him on that occasion. He challenged the right hon. Gentleman to contradict the facts he had then adduced, and what did the right hon. Gentleman do? He got up from his place and walked out of the House. He did not attempt to show that the Caucus, which he had imported from America, and of which he was still a member, differed in any degree from the Caucus which the Congress of the United States had been obliged to coerce. Not one word did the right hon. Gentleman say. The same difficulties which the Americans had experienced existed in this case;

and if his (Mr. Newdegate's) own Colleague had refrained from giving the names of those who had supplied him with information, it was only because he knew that a system of intimidation was practised by the Birmingham Caucus—that abominable importation from the United States. He had already shown that night that he would attribute to no man an action that was criminal in itself, such as being present at an illegal riot; but he would say this of Mr. Tangye—that he was a subordinate of the Caucus, and that he dismissed a large number of his workmen from their work, in order that they might attend the counter-demonstration at Aston. They marched out from Soho, in South Staffordshire, to Smethwick, also in South Staffordshire, through the adjoining borough of Birmingham, and went straight to the counter-demonstration which was in Aston, that is in North Warwickshire. They were the men who principally took an active part in breaking down the wall. He was prepared to prove that they broke it down to the very ground, and admitted 15,000 men to the Conservative meeting. Instantly upon their arrival the disturbance broke out; instantly upon the arrival of those men violence was resorted to. He had known something of Warwickshire and Birmingham for more than 40 years, and he had told his friends that before the meeting was held which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) was to address—the meeting at Aston—they ought to be prepared for a disturbance, which might break out or break in. He had told them that they were too slow in their preparations, and he was afraid the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) was now somewhat too precipitate in the course he had taken. If he had waited a little longer, and had taken a little more time, he would have been able to collect more evidence in support of his contention. Opinions had been expressed in favour of appealing to the Law Courts in respect of these outrages. He (Mr. Newdegate) was sorry to say that the Caucus organization was not confined to Birmingham; its effects extended to that House, and he hoped that the majority of the House would rebel against the tyranny of the Caucus, as the majority of the Congress of the United States had rebelled against it.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: It is not my intention, at this late hour, to detain the House at any length; but I think, under the particular circumstances in which I stand, that it is my duty to say a very few words upon the subject of this Amendment. I say them chiefly because, having myself been present, and having taken part in the meeting to which reference has been made, I am able to state, of my own knowledge, some things which may, perhaps, have a bearing upon the question which has been raised. My noble Friend (Lord Randolph Churchill) has brought before the notice of the House the question whether the language used by, and the actions of, the President of the Board of Trade have not been such as to have conduced to the disturbances which took place at the Aston meeting? In reply to my noble Friend's speech, the right hon. Gentleman has made this answer—that he was not connected, in the first place, with anything that took place at Aston. But, beyond that, he challenges an answer to the question whether there was any disturbance at all on the part of the Liberals who attended that meeting? He tells us that there was nothing premeditated; that there was nothing organized; and that it was entirely owing to the stupid management of, and the intolerable provocation given by, the Conservative Leaders and the managers of the assembly, that the Liberals were obliged, in self-defence, to take certain steps, and he brings forward a number of statements which are vouched by depositions which he has read, and upon which my hon. and learned Friend (Sir Hardinge Giffard) has commented, to show that a certain number of persons on the Conservative side acted in a certain way. Now, with regard to the general question as to who gave the provocation, it is a very unintelligible theory to maintain that the provocation was given, not by those who attacked, but by those who were attacked. The Conservatives had organized a meeting; they had taken steps to obtain a place for that meeting, and they had not without some difficulty found a place. At all events, difficulties were thrown in the way of their obtaining the Town Hall, in which they wished to hold the meeting, and where it would have been more convenient to hold it. They succeeded in obtaining the Aston Grounds, and they had stated that they would be ready to dispose of a certain number of tickets to Liberals who might wish to attend the meeting. But the meeting was purely a Conservative meeting. It was intended to be a Conservative meeting. It was intended to bring together at a convenient centre large bodies of Conservatives to hear what was to be said on the questions at issue, and that they might express their opinions themselves. For these meetings provision was made for distributing a certain number of tickets among others than Conservatives, but, of course, taking care that such a number should not be issued as would deprive Conservatives of all right of admission to their own meeting. The right hon. Gentleman took upon himself to say that there was no organization on the part of the Liberals and no forging of tickets, and that the provocation came from the Conservatives. The theory upon which my noble Friend proceeds, and upon which we all proceed, is that the provocation was given by the Liberals, who, having obtained a certain number of tickets, went themselves and forged a large number more, and by means of those forged tickets obtained admission to the place of meeting, and when it was found that men were there who had no right to be there, on account of forged tickets, an attempt was made to prevent more from coming in, and then these men took the very summary course of breaking down the wall, and so getting into the meeting. It is said that tickets were not forged. My noble Friend read a statement which he says he had from a gentleman who communicated to him the information that there was evidence to prove that tickets had been forged. Well, I have in my hands two tickets that were actually delivered at the meeting. The tickets are exactly alike, and so exactly alike that they have even the same number upon them. The hon. and learned Member for Chelsea (Mr. Firth) told us that some time ago there was a meeting which he attended for which the Conservatives forged tickets which differed from the others only in not having the name of the secretary on them.

MR. FIRTH: I did not say that the Conservatives forged tickets; but what I said was that the Conservative Associations throughout London distributed many thousands of tickets.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: The only difference, the hon. and learned Member said, was that the secretary's name was not attached to them. Here the name of the secretary is printed on the tickets; the two are exactly the same, and they carry their similitude so far that they are both numbered "893." It may be suggested that this was an accident. But if I am rightly informed, a great number of cases occurred in which the tickets bore the same identical numbers. Therefore, it is perfectly evident that there were forged tickets. ["No!"] Hon. Gentlemen say "No!" but it is very strong presumptive evidence of the fact when we find that there were numerous tickets of the same number. We are told that there was no organization on the part of the Liberals. I very much doubt that statement. In the first place, I myself had some reason to believe that there was to be some such organization before I reached Birmingham. I came to Birmingham from Exeter that day, and on my way I stopped at the Cheltenham Station, where a certain number of my Conservative friends came and had a conversation with me on the platform. I declined to make a speech; but I had a conversation. One of these gentlemen said—"You are going to have a row at Birmingham to-night." I said—"Oh, are we? I have heard nothing of it." "Oh, yes," said this gentleman, "you are going to have a row, because a trainful of men have gone on from here, and they are going to break up your meeting." Now, I do not know more than what I was told at second-hand; but all these things point the same way—and the probabilities point the same way—that there was an organized attempt to disturb the meeting. When my noble Friend and myself got into the hall we found that the hall was in a state of considerable confusion, though the fighting was practically over, and when I had to get on to the table which stood in the place of the wrecked platform and endeavoured to make myself heard, I found how the case was. Anyone with experience of public meetings very soon knows whether there is an organized resistance, or what is called a mere spontaneous resistance. It often happens, in large meetings, composed of persons of different sides in politics, that there is a certain amount of opposition and interruption, and so forth. I had in front of me a considerable number of friends and a considerable number of opponents. It was difficult enough to get attention, and yet I thought, after a time, that I had succeeded in getting their attention; but it was obvious that there were two bands of opponents—one close on my right, and another close on my left—led by a fugleman. These bands were acting in concert, and whenever there was an opportunity of speaking, and the great mass of the people were disposed to listen to what was being said, these gentlemen to the right and left set up a continuous strain which entirely drowned the voice, so that it was impossible to make yourself heard even by speaking at the top of your voice. It is really ridiculous for anybody who was there, and saw what took place, to be told that there was no organization. I am as certain that there was an organized opposition as I am certain that this is a meeting of the House of Commons. Then, after all, what is the main charge which my noble Friend has made against the right hon. Gentleman? It is this—that he, being a Member of the Government, holding that very responsible and important position, has by his language on various occasions in the speeches he has made since the decision of the House of Lords in regard to the Representation of the People Bill, availed himself of opportunities, from time to time, for using language of an inciting character—of a character calculated to incite those people whom he addressed, not only against the House of Lords, but against all who were prepared to support the House of Lords. I have no doubt whatever that he is prepared to contend that for everything he has said he can find pretty strong sentiments expressed by somebody else on the other side of politics, or that some of the statements he has made may be more or less explained away. But, as was so powerfully put by my hon. and learned Friend just now, the great mass of the people attending the meetings addressed by the right hon. Gentleman would take his opinions in the rough, and as they were expressed. The language of the right hon. Gentleman had one meaning, and one meaning only—call it the meaning of warning or menace, or whatever you please—it was the meaning of a threat. When the right hon. Gentleman referred to the 100,000 men who proposed to march up from Birmingham to London in 1832, he said that after all that was a very moderate thing, because the intention of those 100,000 men, if they had marched up, was of an entirely peaceful and moral character. That may have been so; but it is not the impression that people generally will entertain. Generally, when that march of 100,000 men is referred to, people suppose that that march is mentioned for the purpose of intimidating and overawing the Legislature. That is the impression conveyed, and when the right hon. Gentleman mentioned it that must have been the impression produced. I am convinced that 99 out of every 100 of his audience must have had that view. My noble Friend says that is conduct on the part of a Minister of the Crown which deserves and ought to have the rebuke of this House. It is a matter of a serious character, for the question is, as the Government say, a burning question, and one upon which there is likely to be misunderstanding, and heated and angry feeling. Surely, of all persons in the world, Ministers of the Crown are those who ought to allay such a feeling, rather than stir it up. The right hon. Gentleman cannot deny that he used the language charged against him with the view to forward and press on a measure which he is desirous of promoting, and that he wished to attain his object by appealing, not to the reason, but to the fears of his opponents. That is the real meaning at the bottom of all those observations and speeches of the right hon. Gentleman to which reference has been made. It is the general and uniform tenour of the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman since the month of August upon this question. It seems to me that my noble Friend has done entirely well and was quite right in calling attention to this matter; and although the speech of the President of the Board of Trade was one of great ability and great power, yet it seemed to me that he entirely missed the point of the attack and comments upon his conduct, and that all the charges he brought against the Conservative Party in Birmingham and other places, and all the arguments he used to show that he was not personally connected with any of the proceedings which took place at Aston, are entirely beside the question as compared with the consensus of the tone of the speeches. The speech of the 4th of August clearly pointed out that meetings in the streets were to be the kind of agency which was to be employed for promoting the measure he was anxious to promote. He appealed to the people in a manner and with references which were calculated to excite the feelings of those who were appealed to, and he spoke to them in language which would have had the effect, in former times, of shaking Ministries and overthrowing Monarchies. From first to last the language used by the right hon. Gentleman has been of the same character. He must be well aware that on this question of the Representation of the People Bill we are treading on red-hot cinders. It is a question of considerable delicacy, and one upon which the position of Ministers of the Crown ought not to allow them to be led into speeches which, in their tendency to alarm and threaten, may carry away people from processes of reasoning to processes of violence and intimidation. We desire to record our opinion that such language as that, on the part of a Minister of the Crown, is language to be deeply regretted.

MR. GLADSTONE: I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman—and it is a sentiment which no motive of temporary convenience would induce me to suppress—that Ministers of the Crown are under special obligations in regard to the language they may use in addressing large bodies of people. There is no doubt that I myself have been greatly ridiculed, and persistently exposed to ridicule from the organs of the Party opposite, for contending that great responsibility attaches to Ministers of the Crown for the language they use. I might use that statement for the purpose of retort; but I do not make such use of it. I quite agree that while it is a gross offence on the part of a public man to use language—and I shall have to come to that question presently—calculated to produce disorder, that offence is still more gross if committed by a Minister of the Crown. The right hon. Baronet appeared to me rather to confuse what was made most clear by my right hon. Friend in his extremely powerful speech—namely, the distinction he drew between the portion of that speech which he made in vindication of, or apology for, his constituents, and the portion which referred to what concerned himself personally in respect of the speeches he had made. And the right hon. Baronet did this, although my right hon. Friend, in the production of evidence at great length and with great force, spoke in defence of his constituents in respect of a course of action with which personally he had had nothing whatever to do, and with which the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill) hardly made a serious attempt to connect him. Now it is necessary, as the conduct of that great community has been before us, to say something on that matter. It has been assumed that some days before the meeting was held there was reason to anticipate a serious collision between the demonstration and the counter-demonstration. Now, Sir, I contend there was no such reason at all. The right hon. Gentleman forgets the facts. The facts were these—that 10,000 tickets were distributed by the agents of the Conservative Party to Liberal Associations and Associations of working men. What was the effect of that? Obviously to set forth to the country—and I make no complaint of such attempt—that a meeting virtually open was going to be held, that masses of Liberals obtained tickets from authoritative sources; and we have the proof quoted by my right hon. Friend—namely, that a newspaper, the chief Conservative organ in Birmingham, boasted beforehand that this was no mere Party meeting, but that it was a representative and universal meeting, whose opinion was to go forth to the country as that of the community of Birmingham at large. Therefore, the right hon. Baronet totally failed in his contention. And I admit I am very much obliged to him—he is the only person who in the course of this debate has produced one ray of evidence in support of the contention that forged tickets were used. He has produced two tickets, one of which is presumed to have been forged, and on which undoubtedly prima facie presumption arises that some forged tickets were used. But with regard to the tickets that were issued. First of all, a vast mass of tickets, stated definitely by my right hon. Friend, were distributed by the Conservatives themselves to Liberals and others by Conservative agents. And my right hon.

Friend states that gentlemen and ladies who obtained tickets from Conservative authorities were refused admission, and were in some instances subjected to immediate violence on presenting those tickets. The right hon. Baronet has not attempted to deal with these facts, nor, indeed, with any fact brought forward in my right hon. Friend's elaborate and most earnest speech. There was no reason to anticipate a collision. Why were the Liberals of Birmingham to be in a bad humour when an open meeting was to be held? They were confident that in an open meeting their opinions would have full play, and they were willing to bear the result. And what is the evidence of the right hon. Baronet? As I understand him, the right hon. Baronet says that at the railway station on the day on which the meeting was to be held he was told by someone that a train had gone by full of persons who were going to wreck the meeting. And what did the right hon. Baronet say? He said he had heard nothing of it, which, I say, shows that up to a very short time before the meeting was held there was no reason in the world to anticipate a collision; and the opinion which my right hon. Friend entertains of the respect for law and order which prevails at Birmingham—"Oh, oh!" It looks very well for hon. Gentlemen opposite to sneer at those whom the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) is endeavouring to make his constituents. I am speaking of the respect which my right hon. Friend believes is entertained by the people of Birmingham for law and order, and with that respect it would have been ludicrous, it would have been absurd, if, when he knew that a meeting was going to be held for which 10,000 tickets had been issued to Liberal Associations and working men by the agents of the Conservative Party, he had anticipated an angry collision. Sir, I say it was intended, it was professed, to be a meeting of an universal and representative character. ["No, no!"] That is our contention, and we state this fact—that 10,000 tickets were issued to Liberals. You produce to us two tickets with regard to which, you presume, they were forged. We tell you the names of persons who presented themselves with genuine tickets—Scripture readers and others—who had their tickets taken from them and torn up, and who in certain instances were subjected to violence. Well, Sir, I have not a word to abate from what I said on a former night on the subject of violence. I knew when I used that language I should be supported by my right hon. Friend and by all my Colleagues. I said I would never consider provocation or incitement for the purpose of extenuating violence. Provocation and incitement, however, are very considerable temptations. The right hon. Baronet says that the provocation in this case was intolerable. I admit that we have not got yet to the bottom of the circumstances with respect to the nature of these declarations, and I will not attempt to gain any unfair advantage; but we have before us the particular persons. I remember one, whom my right hon. Friend named Coleman, was, for the simple offence of appearing with a badge with my ill-omened features upon it, struck violently on the head and felled to the ground by some of the regulators of the Conservative meeting. My right hon. Friend says that the persons who suffered this violence went over to the counter-demonstration, and everyone knows how intelligence of an event of the kind spreads like the electric fluid through a large assembly. I understand my right hon. Friend distinctly to say that that demonstration was assembled at the time, and if they were then assembled, I say that the news of that sort of violence offered to a respectable man who presented a genuine ticket, and who had conformed to the rules and usages laid down, would cause that state of excitement which leads to dangerous acts, and I think those acts which my right hon. Friend has detailed—the ill-treatment of persons presenting genuine tickets—is largely chargeable with the events which took place. Now, Sir, let us look at the evidence in this case. The noble Viscount the Member for North Shropshire (Viscount Newport) thought it a great piece of evidence to allege something which he learned from his gardener, and it would have been a good piece of evidence, no doubt, if it had been a matter within the knowledge of the gardener; but it did not purport to be within the knowledge of the gardener, and the whole object of the noble Viscount's speech was to convey to the House what he thought most important—namely, that a person, whom his gardener did not name, and whom, as far as I can judge, his gardener did not know, had said that he was a Liberal rough on the occasion in question employed with others in breaking up the meeting. That is the evidence offered by the noble Viscount the Member for North Shropshire (Viscount Newport). It is evidence of a certain kind, and I hope it will be examined. [Mr. NEWDEGATE: I will examine it.] I am glad to hear the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire say he will go into it. The hon. Gentleman says—"I am sorry, but if we had had more time we should have produced better evidence." Yes, Sir; but they are the accusers. I have heard of defenders pleading for more time, which is sometimes allowed; but it is indeed an extraordinary case in which that plea has to be put forward by the accusers.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I never said I wanted time.

MR. GLADSTONE: It was the plea which the noble Lord's hon. Friend made in his behalf. But I understand the noble Lord to say that if he had more time he could not have made a better case.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I did not say so.

MR. GLADSTONE: If it be true—and it is true—that Ministers of the Crown are under special responsibilities and obligations, there ought to be some discrimination and some consideration and care exercised in the nature of the case which is brought forward to impeach them. What evidence has the noble Lord about these meetings? The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir Hardinge Giffard), speaking with great authority, has deducted considerably from the value of the evidence produced by my right hon. Friend. I do not mean to say that he is right, and I should be sorry to say he was wrong; but I say that the papers read by my right hon. Friend are of some consequence, inasmuch as those who signed them give the names of the persons concerned, and do not scruple also to give the names of those by whom those persons were apparently bribed. That is a presumption, at all events, and it affords better evidence—evidence of a stronger character than has been given to us by the noble Lord, because there is not a single case of a name being given.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I gave the particulars of four gangs. I know that my speech was a long one, and I cannot blame the right hon. Gentleman for not remembering; but I gave the particulars of four gangs, and also several names, especially of three men—Martin, or M'Martin, and the brothers Reed, two notorious pugilists, each of whom received £20.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have not the least doubt of it; the noble Lord gave the names just as he gave the name of my right hon. Friend; but he had no vouchers. He had not a shred of evidence to produce. Why did he not give some confirmation of his statement? How can we base a case against my right hon. Friend upon evidence so vague, upon mere information conveyed to the noble Lord by no one knows whom?

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: It was given by the solicitors.

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, by a gentleman professionally employed; and that gentleman so employed has been careful not to supply the noble Lord with anything in the nature of proof, when he was in an excellent position to know that, if they were to be of any value, he must give something to vouch for the truth of the statements. I trust that full knowledge will be obtained on this subject; and I must say that while I think my right hon. Friend has shown evidence of great imprudence on the part of the Conservative Party in Birmingham, in professing to hold a representative meeting which it appears now, on the highest authority, they did not intend to be representative, and in respect of the intolerable wrong committed on those persons, simply for the offence of wearing a badge not proscribed by the rules of the meeting, and which, consequently, was no infringement at all—I think, under these circumstances, great provocation was given, the bearing of which on the acts of violence committed I will not undertake to measure, but which in itself constitutes a great offence, and one which I hope the Conservative Party in Birmingham will be careful not to repeat. The point I put is this—that no person has in the slightest degree succeeded in showing that there is any action of my right hon. Friend for which he can be impeached, as he is impeached in this Motion. My right hon. Friend has explained how difficult—how impossible—it was for him, as a Minister of the Crown, incessantly occupied with the labours of his Department and of the Government, to maintain that local activity for which, before he was distinguished in this House, he was so honourably known in the great community to which he belonged. I submit that there is not a shred of evidence before the House, and the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down did not allege that there was any action of my right hon. Friend which could be regarded as an incitement to interference with the meeting or to disorder; and now, on the contrary, he is going to vote that not only the speeches, but the actions of my right hon. Friend incited to violence and disorder. Well, Sir, I submit he has shown nothing to justify that part of the allegation of the Motion which impeaches my right hon. Friend not only for speeches, but for actions. Then with regard to the speeches of my right hon. Friend, what has been said and what is to be said? [Opposition cheers.] You will hear what is to be said. What said the hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard)? He said that, without using actually inflammatory language, my right hon. Friend had left the inflammatory part to be filled up by the audience. Well, Sir, that might be a good form of speech for a peroration; but allow me to say respectfully that it expresses a mere theory.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD: I quoted the speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Chamberlain) in Wales.

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. and learned Gentleman made no quotation which was of such a character as to be in the slightest degree in point. Sir, I am going to refer to and quote the speech—it is impossible for me to go through all the speeches; but my right hon. Friend himself made a very full statement to the House with regard to them—I am going to refer to the speech which, as far as I understand, is that upon which reliance is principally placed, and that is the speech with regard to the march on London. I must say that what my right hon. Friend said has been cruelly misrepresented. ["Oh, oh!"] Yes, cruelly misrepresented. I do not ask you to believe what I say; but I ask you to hear with respect what I have to say on the subject. Here I must refer to the speech of the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour). He said he wished that, instead of animadverting upon the Marquess of Salisbury in the Provinces, my right hon. Friend had asked Earl Granville to make the attack upon the noble Marquess in a place where the noble Marquess could have replied. Well, Sir, I have been long in this House, and it has been my fate to have been over and over again the subject of prolonged attacks and invectives in the House of Lords; but down to this night I have never imitated the example that has been thus set me. I concur with my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford, and I wish that attacks upon public men were always made in the place where those attacked could defend themselves; but, unfortunately, it is the constant practice of the Marquess of Salisbury to attack those who are not present, exercising his great powers of speech in censure and invective upon persons in this House belonging to the Government. Well, Sir, it is not in self-defence; but in this particular case in which my right hon. Friend has been made the subject of attack it is absolutely necessary I should refer to it. Now, Sir, as to the march upon London. What was the passage spoken by my right hon. Friend with respect to the march upon London? The speech was made on the 4th of August, and the passage as to the march on London was—it is with difficulty I can read the print—

"100,000 men in Birmingham and the surrounding districts who were sworn to march on London, if need were, in defence of their liberties. The peace was broken in many parts of the country, and there were at Derby, Nottingham, and Bristol fierce outbreaks of popular passion, accompanied by a great destruction of property."

Now, Sir, that is the recital, and that is the basis of the assault on my right hon. Friend. What words did my right hon. Friend use immediately after that recital in his speech? After saying there was to be a march on London, after saying that there had been these breaches of the peace in the country, he went on to say—

"He had hoped that we had left those days of disorder far behind us."

[Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Had hoped?] Certainly, "had hoped." I am quoting from something in the third person—

"He had hoped that we had left those days of disorder far behind us."

A most natural and simple explanation, and one which ought to have been exempted from the slightest criticism. What did the Marquess of Salisbury do? ["Read on!"] Does the hon. Gentleman who cries "Read on!" know what follows? No, Sir; he does not. My sight does not enable me to read, so, without knowing what follows, he calls "Read on!" simply for the sake of causing me embarrassment if he can. Well, Sir, what says the Marquess of Salisbury upon this? At Kelso, on the 13th of October, the Marquess of Salisbury began by speaking of another speech of my right hon. Friend, in which he had said—

"I think that these Gentlemen in the House of Lords presume on your patience, on your love of order, and on your hatred of violence."

And then he says—

"That the English people had shown courage and resolution."

And that statement is treated by the Marquess of Salisbury as an incitement to violence. Do you think, Sir, that, under these circumstances, it is the duty of Ministers, or of anybody else, to go to the people of this country, when they have the formidable obstacles in their front that they have now, and say to them—"Love order and hate violence?" It is certainly one's duty to advise the people to love order and hate violence; but am I to say nothing else? Am I to make no appeals to them? Am I never to remind them of the dignity and the force that attach to the well-considered resolution of a great nation? Are we to cast aside all the natural, legitimate, and powerful weapons of our warfare? I would go all lengths to exclude violence, and on that ground I object to the speech of the Marquess of Salisbury. But while I eschew violence, I cannot—I will not—adopt that effeminate method of speech which is to hide from the people of this country the cheering fact that they may derive some encouragement from the recollection of former struggles, from the recollection of the great qualities of their forefathers, and from the consciousness that they possess them still. Sir, I am sorry to say that if no instructions had ever been addressed in political crises to the people of this country except to remember to hate violence and love order and exercise patience, the liberties of this country would never have been obtained. The Marquess of Salisbury goes on to say—

"I only hope that if Mr. Chamberlain incites the people to riot, he will head the riot himself."

Is that a wise method of speech? ["If!"] Right hon. Gentlemen opposite think it is a wise method of speech; I think it is a most unwise method of speech. Even if the words of my right hon. Friend fairly bore the character attributed to them, the speech of the Marquess of Salisbury is an aggravation of the incitement; it is extending and deepening the mischief; and, therefore, it is not a speech which ought to have been made by the Leader of a great Party in this country—

"I only hope that if Mr. Chamberlain incites the people to riot, he will head the riot himself. I hope that if he is going, according to his threat, to march to London from Birmingham, we may see him at the head of the advancing column."

I believe the reference in that passage was to the speech of the 4th of August. Then the Marquess of Salisbury did not scruple to say that Mr. Chamberlain had threatened to march on London, when Mr. Chamberlain had recited the intended march upon London in a series of facts belonging to the year 1832, with reference to which he immediately said—

"He had hoped that we had left those days of disorder far behind us."

[Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Had hoped?] Had hoped; certainly, had hoped, and nothing was more proper than for him to say "he had hoped," when the Marquess of Salisbury had come into the field to revive this painful and dangerous subject by charges which were utterly groundless. He had hoped that these things had been universally abandoned; but he now found that a great Nobleman, the Head of the great Tory Party, was prepared to revive them. That is my comment on your "had hoped." Well, Sir, the Marquess of Salisbury, having expressed the hope—

"That Mr. Chamberlain may be sent at the head of the advancing column," he goes on to say—which I suppose is a warning and not a menace—

"and my experience is that those who will have to receive him will be able to give a very good account of him."

Having forced upon him this declaration, which he never made, of an intention to march upon London, the Marquess of Salisbury makes another declaration—namely, that when my right hon. Friend marches upon London he will be met by another column which will be able to give a very good account of him—

"And that Mr. Chamberlain will return from the adventure with a broken head if nothing more."

Sir, I have made solemn declarations on the subject of violence; and I want to know whether hon. Gentlemen opposite think that that language is wise language, prudent language, tolerable language, when used by a man in the position of the Marquess of Salisbury? Now, my right hon. Friend, on a late occasion, adverted to this passage from the Marquess of Salisbury's speech. It may be that he did so in a spirit of banter; but, in answering the speech of the Marquess of Salisbury, he pursued for a little the thought, and used expressions assuming that the events of which the Marquess of Salisbury had spoken were to take place. My right hon. Friend has said to-night that he anticipated the House would not approve of this language of the Marquess of Salisbury; and that if the House disapproved of the provocative remarks which drew forth his retort, he was perfectly willing his own words in answer should pass away, and should, in like manner, be subject to the censure of the House. My right hon. Friend is not at all a defender of such language, and I am very sorry that, for the first time, I have been compelled to take notice of words spoken by a person in the other House; but they grew so essentially out of the main charge against my right hon. Friend that I could not avoid doing so. My answer to the charge is, that it has not, upon the report of my right hon. Friend's speech, a shadow of foundation. When he made that speech he himself supplied the barriers against the possibility of mischief by speaking of these proceedings as proceedings which he had hoped—he had hoped until he heard what a person to whom I will not further refer had to say—he had hoped that such things were left far behind, and were never to be heard of again; and I therefore submit that my right hon. Friend, upon this point, upon this passage in his speech of the 4th of August, has afforded no ground for criticism; and that if there be any ground for criticism in what followed, he has expressed how content he would be that the answer which he made should be abandoned. There is no ground for such a Motion as the present. Every hon. Gentleman is asked to pledge himself that the actions and the speeches of my right hon. Friend deserve censure. My right hon. Friend has, as to his actions, shown that there is in what he has done nothing that can possibly be construed into incitement to riot and disorder. As respects his speeches, I think he satisfied the House as to their character when he went over them; and I have myself stated to the House what I believed to be the acts principally relied upon. The House, I trust, will do justice in a case of this kind; and, while guarding to the best of its ability, and guarding impartially—guarding, not against Liberals alone, but also against misled and misguided Conservatives—the principle that no encouragement is to be given to violence in any shape or form, decline to pronounce an unjust sentence upon one who does not deserve it.

MR. GORST: I am not going to attempt to make a speech. I only wish to ask leave to read a telegram, in justice to a gentleman who has been accused, without Notice, of very disgraceful conduct. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, on the strength of these sworn documents, accused a Mr. Jarvis, of Birmingham, a candidate for the representation of one of the wards of Birmingham, of having hired roughs to exercise violence to Liberals attending Conservative meetings. I hold in my hand a telegram which was sent at midnight from Birmingham by Mr. Jarvis, and I desire to read it to the House. It is addressed to the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), and is as follows:—

"Just seen telegram of Mr. Chamberlain's charges against myself in the House of Commons to-night. They are a deliberate fabrication, which I will swear on oath."

MR. O'DONNELL: I am sure that, in view of that communication, the indulgence of the House will be given to the Prime Minister, if he has any further remarks to make.

Question put.

Main Question again proposed.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Mac Iver.)

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

QUESTIONS.

EGYPT—THE RAILWAY BOARD.

DR. CAMERON asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, If his attention has been called to the following statement from its Egyptian Correspondent, published in The Times of October 21st:—

"The [Egyptian] Railway Board consists of Mr. Le Mesurier, an English resident; M. Zimmerman, recently rendered famous as the self-styled representative of France; and a Native Pasha. I have reason to believe that Sir Andrew Clarke recently telegraphed to Mr. Le Mesurier asking whether the staff was sufficient to work the increased traffic. Mr. Le Mesurier promptly replied in the negative, and stated the nature of the aid required. Sir Andrew Clarke despatched a certain number of mechanicians at the cost of the British Government. M. Zimmerman refused to allow them to be employed. At the present moment I can certify that four men are now in Alexandria receiving pay varying from £50 to £65 monthly, the latter sum being £10 less than the pay for a month of the General Commanding in Alexandria, by whom these men are employed as messengers. I should add that they might be employed in the Soudan: but the men decline to go there, as their contract was to serve in Egypt proper;"

if he would say whether this statement is correct; and, if so, whether the men in question are being paid by the British or Egyptian Government, and what office drew up the contracts under which they engaged?

MR. BRAND: I will give the hon. Gentleman all the information I have. The facts are as follow:—On the 4th of September a telegram was sent from the War Office to Mr. Le Mesurier inquiring as to the condition of the railway between Cairo and Siout, and asking if anything was required from England to perfect the line, either material or personnel. On the following day Mr. Le Mesurier telegraphed through the General Officer Commanding in Egypt to the War Office requesting the Secretary of State to send a certain number of employés to assist the administration of the Egyptian railways in meeting the pressure likely to result from the transport of troops and supplies for the Expedition to Khartoum. Steps were immediately taken to meet this demand. Civilian employés were engaged and sent to Alexandria. Their terms of engagement were for service in Egypt for three months certain from the date of embarkation at varying rates of pay; and, in reply to a further inquiry, the General was informed that the salaries of these men would be chargeable on the funds of the railway administration, seeing that they would be employed on the railway, and that a considerable profit would be realized by the railway from the increased traffic caused by the transport of the Expedition. This is how the matter stood so far as the War Department was concerned. With reference to the paragraph from The Times quoted by the hon. Member, I have to say that, my attention having been called to it on October 21, I requested Sir Andrew Clarke to telegraph to the General Officer Commanding in Egypt, asking if the facts, as stated, were correct. The reply was as follows:—

"Four civilians sent to Le Mesurier have been employed at Alexandria as traffic inspectors, not messengers, at pay £25 monthly, except one man at £50. Two of them were placed at the disposal of General [who now reports that boats having been passed he had no further use for them."

This reply not having been deemed complete, the following further telegram was sent on the 28th instant from the War Office to the General Commanding in Egypt:—

"Please ask Le Mesurier whether extra railway civil staff not employed as reported in The Times and why. Wire reply."

To this the following reply was received from the General yesterday:—

"Telegram was sent after interview with Le Mesurier. Statement in The Times incorrect. Letter follows."

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—POLICE PROTECTION — SIR AUGUSTUS STEWART, RAMILTON, CO. DONEGAL.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Is the police protection granted to Sir A. Stewart, Ramilton, county Donegal, charged to the district; and, what outrages have been committed in the neighbourhood to justify this?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER), in reply, said, that police protection had been granted to Sir Augustus Stewart, of Ramilton, as several outrages had occurred in the district. It was not considered that at present the police could be safely withdrawn, as last month Sir Augustus Stewart received a threatening letter.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—ARREST OF CHARLES MATHERS.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Is it the fact that Charles Mathers was arrested on board a vessel at Queenstown on July 10th, when absconding with the funds of the Dublin Bakers' Trades Union (£81); that he was allowed to escape from the local bridewell; has he been recaptured; if not, what steps have been taken to discover his whereabouts; who is to blame for his escape; have the money (£31 10s.), passage ticket, watch, &c. found on his person been detained by the authorities; why are they not handed over to the Trades Union, seeing that its officials gave security for it in event of Mather's re-arrest; and, what are the intentions of the Government?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER), in reply, said, that Charles Mathers had been arrested at Queenstown on the 12th of July on a charge of embezzling the sum of £80, the property of the Dublin Bakers' Union. The sum of £28 10s. found upon his person had been handed over to the Bakers' Society.

MR. HEALY: When?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, that he had not the date. The prisoner had also a gold watch and chain and a passage to America in his trunk, with some clothing, and for which no application had yet been made.

MR. HEALY stated that he had put this Question at the request of the Bakers' Society. If the authorities handed over the money, why did the Society wish the Question put, and when was the money handed over?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): I will inquire.

PUBLIC MEETINGS (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT PORTADOWN.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, How many persons are to be proceeded against in connection with the recent riots at Portadown; will the cases be tried under the Prevention of Crime Act; is it true, as stated in the Belfast papers, that the resident magistrate, Captain Whelan, and the Sub-Inspector of Police, were both off duty on the night of the riot; and, if it be found that Captain Whelan was off duty, whether the Government will direct an investigation into the cause of his absence, before he is allowed to take any part in adjudication upon the case?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, it was intended to proceed against 80 persons charged with being concerned in the Portadown riot. An explanation had been called for from the Resident Magistrate and the Sub-Inspector, who, as alleged, were both off duty on the occasion.

CUSTOMS (IRELAND)—EXAMINATIONS FOR OUTDOOR OFFICERS.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Secretary to the Treasury, When the examination of candidates, by Civil Service Commissions, for situations in the Customs in Ireland, will take place?

MR. COURTNEY: I presume the hon. Member alludes to the examinations for outdoor officers. These are held simultaneously in the Three Kingdoms when required. At the present time there is an excess of such officers, and there is no immediate prospect of a competition being required. Due notice will be given when one has been arranged.

COMMISSIONERS OF NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—SALARIES OF INSPECTORS.

MR. BIGGAR asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether any circular or document has been issued by the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland, to their Inspectors, reprimanding those gentlemen for agitating for increased remuneration on the basis of salaries paid to the English Inspectors; and, whether the Irish Inspectors were further reprimanded for seeking the support of Members of this House?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER), in reply, said, that the Circular issued by the Commissioners of National Education to their Inspectors did contain a reprimand for those who did not seek increased remuneration through the National Board. His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant considered that the proper channel for those connected with education was mentioned in the Treasury Minute of 1867, which required that there should be no attempt to influence private Members of Parliament.

MR. HEALY: May they bring public influence upon Members of Parliament?

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—SUB-INSPECTOR MARTIN.

MR. BIGGAR asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether a number of complaints have been made from many persons in Killeshandra against Sub-Inspector Martin; and, whether, under the circumstances, the Government are prepared to remove him to some other county?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) in reply, said, that there had been complaints made against Sub-Inspector Martin, which had been reported to the Inspector General of the Royal Irish Constabulary, who, however, considered that that officer had always endeavoured to do his duty. Sub-Inspector Martin had, however, applied to be transferred to another district; and his application would be acceded to on the first vacancy.

CITY OF DUBLIN LICENSING SESSIONS—MR. THOMAS W. RUSSELL.

MR. BIGGAR asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether it is a fact that, at the licensing sessions in Green Street, Dublin, a person named Thomas W. Russell, secretary of a temperance association, is allowed by the presiding Recorder, the honourable Frederick Falkiner, to make objection to any application he desires, and to occupy the time of the Court in delivering statements against applicants; whether the said Mr. Russell has any locus standi to make objection in cases where he is not a parishioner; whether the Recorder invariably asks Mr. Russell's advice to guide him in his decisions; whether, at each session, a large number of applications are struck out of the lists without being heard; whether the said Recorder has publicly stated his determination to cancel every licence he can; and, whether, if he holds such views, the Government will relieve him of the business of the licensing sessions, as they have done in the case of the County Revision Court?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER), in reply, said, the Recorder was not answerable to the Government for the way in which the Licensing Act was administered. The Government had no knowledge that the Recorder ever had entertained or expressed the opinion suggested in the Question. There was no intention of altering his duties as proposed.

EXPLOSIVES ACT—STORAGE OF DYNAMITE AT CANVEY ISLAND.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether nine vessels loaded with dynamite are moored in a Thames creek off Canvey Island, and are guarded by a small number of Coastguard men who have other duties to perform; and, who is responsible for the control of the storage of this explosive matter?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: This matter to which my hon. Friend's Question refers has engaged my attention for some time. I was quite aware of the danger of these stores, and I have requested the Local Authority to take charge of them; but I have not succeeded. I have induced the Admiralty to take some charge of them—though they are not responsible for them—through the Coastguard. These being floating vessels, the men on land can do but little. When my hon. Friend asks who is responsible for the storage of explosive matter, I am sorry to say I cannot answer that Question. I will refer to that matter, if I may be allowed to say a word about it, because a good deal of attention has been given to it lately, and some complaints have been made of the action which it is supposed I am inclined to take upon it. The real truth is, that the Explosives Acts were drawn mainly with a view to prevent mischief from explosions of dynamite to neighbouring houses and persons, and they were pointed in that direction; but recently a danger which does not seem to have been sufficiently contemplated has arisen, and that is the theft of dynamite from these stores. All over the country a great number of stores were built which have been carefully surveyed, certified, and inspected. A great quantity of dynamite was left in these stores, and no one was there to take care of them. There was no reason why anyone with a bad purpose should not go in the night time with a cart and take away as much dynamite as he liked simply at the cost of knocking off a padlock. It seems to me that is a very unsafe condition of things; and it also seems to me that persons who engage in a dangerous trade of this kind, and who keep magazines, ought to have some responsibility for the safe custody of them. I know very well that there is a great alarm on the part of the trade that this would be very costly and injurious to them. While this circumstance must, of course, be considered, yet the paramount interest in this matter is the interest of the public. All the inspection and Inspectors, and everything else, are a farce, if you take no precautions to guard the places where this dynamite is kept, and if any unauthorized person can go and carry it off in any quantity he likes. At Limerick, in the dead of the night, the whole contents of a store, amounting to 595 lbs. of dynamite, were carried off; and, again, there was a theft of dynamite recently at Greenock. I am considering as carefully as I can about the interests of the trade, and how to provide some better means of protection to prevent those stores being left entirely unguarded.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN: May I ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman if he does not consider that it would be better to place all the stores of explosive matter afloat under the control of the Admiralty?

MR. HEALY was understood to ask whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman would take care that legislation on subjects of this kind would not be hurried through the House without ample consideration?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I shall be glad to avail myself of any facilities which the hon. Member may offer to pass any Bill which I may contemplate.

MR. HEALY: I did not oppose the Explosives Act.

THE MINISTRY—THE CHIEF SECRETARY TO THE LORD LIEUTENANT OF IRELAND.

MR. FIRTH asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in filling up the vacancy in the office of Chief Secretary for Ireland, consideration has been given to the possibility of securing the services of any Irish Member of Parliament familiar with the requirements of Ireland? In regard to this Question I desire to make a personal explanation. I do not put this Question with reference to any Member of this House. I do not yield to anyone in my appreciation of the high personal and public qualities of the Gentleman recently appointed to the Office.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I should like to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether any Irish Member has raised any question with regard to the nationality of the Chief Secretary; and whether, in his opinion, the nationality of the Chief Secretary makes any difference as long as the present relations between this country and Ireland exist?

MR. GLADSTONE: The opinion of the Government is that when a vacancy occurs in the Chief Secretaryship for Ireland, or in any other political Office in which it is their duty to advise Her Majesty, or to arrive at a decision themselves, their obligation is plain and simple. It is to endeavour to place in that Office the Gentleman who, all things taken together, and all circumstances bearing on the case taken into view, seems to them to be the fittest person for it. They go on much wider grounds than those suggested by the hon. Gentleman, who seems to think that there is some peculiarity in the present connection between England and Ireland, which makes it necessary to have regard to the nationality of the Chief Secretary. They consider that to draw a distinction between Scotchmen, Irishmen, or Englishmen, to the prejudice of one or the other, would be a most unwarrantable assumption on their part, and detrimental to the public interest. My right hon. Friend who has just been appointed Chief Secretary for Ireland, by the favour of Her Majesty, has been chosen on the grounds of his personal merits and qualifications, without the slightest disparagement to the great ability of any other Gentleman who might have been placed in that position. It appeared to me that, in giving that advice, we best discharged our duty. With respect to the choice of Irishmen, I do not think there is anything which gives us greater pleasure than to be able to advise their appointment to great posts. We have recently had the great satisfaction of advising the appointment of Lord Dufferin to one of the highest places which it is in the power of Her Majesty to confer.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—LOWER MIDDLE CLASS EDUCATION.

MR. ROUNDELL asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether Her Majesty's Government will be prepared to issue a Royal or a Departmental Commission, to inquire into the state of the Lower Middle Class Education, and to report as to the steps to be taken for making suitable provision for the education of the classes of children at present unprovided for by either the Public Elementary or the existing Secondary Schools?

MR. MUNDELLA: I can assure my hon. Friend that the Education Department is fully alive to the importance of the subject of lower middle-class education, and is watching with interest and sympathy the efforts that are being made to supply the serious deficiencies in this branch of education. We do not think, however, having regard to the facts of the case, that it is immediately desirable to institute a public inquiry into the subject. We have already before us, as my hon. Friend is aware, the Report of the Departmental Commission for Wales; and we are anxious, as soon as we have an opportunity, to pass a measure which will make provision for intermediate education in the Principality. In Scotland the Educational Endowment Commissioners are applying themselves vigorously to the revision and better appropriation of Scotch endowments; and I believe that with their aid, and with the powers already in possession of the Education Department, efficient secondary education in Scotland may be provided without further legislation. England alone remains to be dealt with; and here it must be admitted that the supply of intermediate schools is inadequate, and that the organization of secondary education is one of the most urgent questions of the time. But I hardly think that information on the subject is what is required. We have the elaborate Report of the Public Schools Inquiry Commission of 1867, consisting of 20 volumes, the recommendations of which have not been nearly carried out. The Government is pledged to the appointment of a Committee next Session to inquire into the working of the Endowed Schools Acts. This will necessarily cover much of the ground which will be traversed by such an inquiry as that suggested.

LAW AND POLICE—THE CLEATOR MOOR RIOTS, CUMBERLAND.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the report, in The Carlisle Journal of the 28th October, of the evidence given, at the Cumberland Assizes, by John Douglass Sempill, superintendent of police and deputy chief constable, upon the trial of a man named France, who was acquitted of complicity in the dynamite explosion at Cleator Moor; whether Mr. Sempill stated that, while France was under remand at Whitehaven, a constable from Longtown, named Tomer, whom the witness described as "an experienced detective officer," was put into the prisoner's cell, in plain clothes, for several hours; whether the witness stated that Tomer was shut up with the prisoner for the purpose of taking care of him, but that "if the prisoner had made any statement, he should have inquired into it;" whether France states that the detective officer represented himself as a fellow prisoner, pretended to be drunk, swore at the police, and attempted to inveigle him into a statement respecting the charge against him; and, whether an inquiry will be held into the conduct of Tomer, and of the officers responsible for directing his visit, and admitting him to the cell of an untried prisoner?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he had had heard nothing of this matter until he saw the hon. Member's Question yesterday. He had sent it to the Chief Constable in Cumberland for inquiry, and he would answer the hon. Gentleman when he had received the information.

MR. O'BRIEN said, he would renew the Question on Monday.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—ACCELERATION OF MAILS, CO. MONAGHAN.

MR. HEALY asked the Postmaster General, If it is the fact that no benefit accrues to any town or district in Monaghan by the acceleration of the mails from England, and why no provision has been made for extending the benefit to this portion of the Country?

MR. FAWCETT said, the hon. Gentleman was under some misapprehension in supposing that there was no acceleration to Monaghan. For instance, take the town of Monaghan. The day mails arrived there at 12.15 now instead of at 1.30, and at Glasslough they arrived at 12.40 instead of at 1.40.

MR. HEALY remarked that the Postmaster General had only mentioned one town and a village; and he wished to point out that, except in regard to them, the entire county had practically not the smallest benefit from the acceleration of these mails.

CRIMINAL LAW (IRELAND)—TRIAL OF CORNWALL AND KIRWAN.

MR. SEXTON asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, If it is the fact that none of the jurors who came up to be sworn in the conspiracy case of the Queen against G. C. Cornwall (late Secretary to the General Post Office, Dublin), and Martin Oranmore Kirwan (late Captain, Galway Militia), were challenged or directed to stand aside by the Crown; and, whether the Crown will pursue a similar course in the cases of Mr. P. M. Fitzgerald and the Tubbercurry prisoners? The hon. Member further asked, whether the Solicitor General had any information of the course pursued by the Crown this morning in the case of James Ellis French; did the Crown order any jurors to stand by?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER), in reply, said, that he had no information showing what took place this morning; and in regard to the trial of Cornwall, he believed it was the fact that no juror was ordered to stand aside.

MR. HEALY: One Roman Catholic.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): He could not bind the Crown in regard to their action in the Tubbercurry cases; but he had no doubt the only desire of the Crown was that a thoroughly impartial jury should be obtained.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to give Notice, as I do not share the opinion of the hon. and learned Gentleman about the desire of the Crown, that I shall feel obliged to proceed with the Amendment to the Address which stands in my name.

ARMY—ROYAL HIBERNIAN MILITARY SCHOOL.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Secretary of State for War, with reference to the subject of equalising the rates of pay of the Educational Staff of the Royal Hibernian Military School, Dublin, with those of the Royal Military Asylum, Chelsea, If he is aware that the interpretation put upon paragraph 489 of the Royal Warrant of 10th June 1884 is that the past services of the Staff of the Royal Hibernian Military School shall be ignored, and the new scale of remuneration take effect only from the present year; whether he is aware that each member of the existing Staff has completed more than the prescribed term to entitle him to the maximum rate of pay sanctioned by the Warrant; and, whether he is aware that the head master, after a service of thirty-nine years, has been given £60 per annum less than is laid down in the new scale, and the second and third masters only the initial rates, though they have served seventeen and fourteen years respectively; and, if he will take steps to have this grievance removed?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Each of the masters referred to has had a substantial advance of pay, and the Regulations of the Treasury preclude the grant of more than the minimum rate allotted to an appointment by a new Warrant when that rate is in excess of the salary or pay previously held.

THE LAW COURTS—SEATING AND LIGHTING.

MR. HORACE DAVEY asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it is the fact that boilers used for lighting the Royal Courts of Justice were removed only one week before the opening of the Courts, and that there are now no means of heating the Courts; whether the apparatus for lighting the Courts with electric light has not also been removed, and there are now no means of lighting the Courts except oil lamps; why the opportunity of the Long Vacation was not made use of for making the necessary repairs and alterations; and, when he expects to be able to provide light and heat for the Courts?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the heating apparatus of the Law Courts had been in perfect order since the beginning of the present term. The boilers referred to were for the purpose of the electric light, the machinery for which had previously been in a temporary building outside, but was now to be permanently placed in the crypt inside. Whilst the works were in progress the building could be efficiently lighted by the ordinary lamps.

Mr. W. J. Corbet

SOUTH KENSINGTON—THE INTENDED EXHIBITION OF INVENTIONS.

MR. COLERIDGE KENNARD asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, having regard to the recent admission by the Director of Army Contracts as to the inability of Her Majesty's Government to supply themselves with a necessary munition of war without resort to Foreign manufacturers, stated to be in sole possession of a protected "secret composition," he can see his way to safeguard the commercial interests of exhibitors of inventions at the exposition now being projected by the authorities of the South Kensington Museum for the ensuing year?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, the Exhibition proposed to be held at South Kensington next year would make no difference in the status of inventors. Inventions already patented would be protected, provided the steps mentioned in the Patent Act were taken. The exhibition of unpatented inventions would not for a reasonable time prejudice the right of inventors to apply for a patent.

MR. COLERIDGE KENNARD gave Notice that, in consequence of the reply of the right hon. Gentleman, he should take an early opportunity of calling attention to the subject.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE MAAMTRASNA MURDERS—CONVICTION OF MYLES JOYCE AND OTHERS.

MR. HEALY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he has made or will make himself acquainted with the dying depositions of two men executed with Myles Joyce; whether they were taken by and before a resident magistrate; whether each deposition was made independently by each of the condemned men in his own cell without any knowledge or communication of what the other had said or done; whether any copies of the depositions have been made; if not, in whose custody do the originals remain; and, will any steps be taken to secure them from being mislaid or lost?

MR. GLADSTONE: This is a Question which resolves itself into many points. In regard to the first of them—whether the First Lord of the Treasury had made or would make himself acquainted with the dying depositions of two men executed with Myles Joyce—I may remind the hon. Member that I had not, in the course of the debate, assumed to make the smallest authoritative reference to the contents of those dying declarations. I took them simply as they were presented in the accounts given by Irish Members, who believed themselves to have obtained substantial information about them, and any argument I made was made simply on these accounts so presented to me. With respect to my own acquaintance with those documents, or with any other documents bearing on the Maamtrasna case, I really think it is going a little beyond the ordinary functions of a Questioner to cross-examine a particular Minister as to what are the Papers which he has or has not read, and in what particular manner he has fitted himself to enter into the case. I think the hon. Member will see that he has unconsciously gone a little beyond the proper limits in putting his Question to me; and I must respectfully, in all courtesy, decline to answer what Papers I have read or not read. It might be, on some subjects, a Question not easy to reply to. I do not say that that is so in the present case; but, on the principle I have stated, I must decline to answer. As to his third and fourth Questions, which relate to the depositions themselves, I would say that any Questions of that kind should, properly speaking, be put to the Representatives of the Irish Government in this House; but I do not think the Government are prepared to give information with respect to the contents or the particulars of these depositions. The Prerogative of mercy has never been a branch of the Executive power that has been cast in medio before the whole Cabinet. It has always been the special and responsible function of the Home Secretary on this side of the water, and of the Viceroy on the other side; and it is my opinion, and I believe the opinion of my Colleagues, that in that concentrated and very solemn responsibility there is, on the whole, a much better security for the judicious exercise of the Prerogative of mercy than if the cases it involves were to be dealt with by the whole Cabinet. That is the reason why I am unwilling to do what tends to bring the Prerogative of mercy under review, and also of my disinclination in this particular case to recede from what we feel to be our duty in all cases of the administration of justice in that great branch of justice—namely, the Prerogative of mercy. As to the Question whether steps will be taken to secure the safe custody of those Papers, I think I can assure the hon. Member that there is no reason to apprehend their being lost from any want of due care. Certainly, they are Papers for the safety of which it is the duty of the Irish Government to have peculiar regard.

MR. HEALY said, he wished to disclaim any idea of cross-examining the Prime Minister on his speech; but he had put his Question because he understood the right hon. Gentleman to have said that he had a mind open to conviction.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether the chief warder of Kilmainham Prison has been questioned as to the statement alleged to have been made by Thomas Casey, the informer in the Maamtrasna case, that after Philbin, the other informer, had had an interview with Mr. Bolton, and when Casey had made no communication, they were put out alone into the prison yard?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): The chief warder had been questioned, and Casey's statement was without any foundation.

MR. SEXTON inquired if this warder was the same as the warder mentioned in James Ellis French's letter?

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—CASE OF THE BROTHERS DELAHUNTY—DYING DECLARATION OF PATRICK SLATTERY.

MR. KENNY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Upon what grounds the Irish Executive has decided to ignore the dying declaration of Patrick Slattery, in which he stated that he had been used to suborn false testimony against the brothers Delahunty, upon which evidence they were convicted and sentenced to penal servitude for life; and, if, as in the case of Kilmartin, the Lord Lieutenant will consent to an inquiry, for the purpose of sifting the evidence, and guarding against a miscarriage of justice?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER), in reply, said, that the Lord Lieutenant had carefully considered the declaration in question. His Excellency had already fully considered the case, and had been advised that there was no ground for any further action in regard to it.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE DUBLIN MURDER TRIALS—COMPENSATION TO MR. FIELD.

MR. WARTON (for Colonel KING-HARMAN) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether it is true, as stated in United Ireland, that the payment of the special rate struck for compensation to Mr. Field, under the Crimes Act (Ireland), was refused by the proprietors of that paper, and by the proprietors of The Nation newspaper; and, if this be true, what steps the Irish Government have taken, or intend to take, in the matter?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, that there were some arrears uncollected in that case, including certain sums due from the persons named in the Question. Steps would be taken to collect those arrears.

ARMY—SERGEANT INSTRUCTORS IN MUSKETRY.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is the intention to promote the Sergeant Instructor in Musketry to the rank of Quartermaster Sergeant, in a similar manner to that adopted in the case of Paymaster and Orderly Room Sergeants, viz. after three years' service in the appointment, or to classify them as prior to the Royal Warrant of July 1881; whether it is the intention to deprive the non-commissioned officers and men now serving of their deferred pay on completing twenty-one years' service, although they enlisted as boys, and had completed twelve years previously to the issue of the Royal Warrant of July 1881; and, whether it is also the intention to deprive them of a halfpenny per diem of their pension for every year served as boys?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: There is no intention of altering the status of sergeant instructor of musketry from that of colour sergeant which he now holds. He still belongs to the combatant ranks, and has promotion in them to look to. The orderly room sergeant and paymaster sergeant serve under different circumstances, and have no prospect of combatant promotion. It is not contemplated to deprive any class of non-commissioned officers or soldiers of any of their deferred pay. As regards boy service, the effect of recent Regulations is precisely opposite to that implied in the Question. Formerly, service under age did not count in any way towards pension. Now it is allowed to count; but a halfpenny is deducted from the pension for each year under age. Thus, a soldier can now claim a pension, though somewhat reduced, earlier, by the amount of his boy service, than he formerly could; while, if he serves to the time at which he could formerly claim pension, he would retire on an increased pension.

FISHERIES (IRELAND)—THE INQUIRY AT PORTRUSH.

MR. BIGGAR asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether he will instruct the Fishery Commissioners, who are to hold their inquiry at Portrush on the 4th November, to inquire and report on the facts and decision of the magistrates in Coleraine on the 25th July, and affirmed by the Recorder, Mr. Neligan, without costs, on the 25th inst.—the fishermen declare that the boundary line defined by the Recorder is unintelligible to fishermen?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER), in reply, said, that he did not think he would be justified in giving any direction; but he would communicate with the Fishery Commissioners, and ask whether they thought the matter called for any action on their part.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—PROCEEDINGS AGAINST PUBLICANS AND OTHERS AT SKIBBEREEN, CO. CORK.

MR. DEASY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, By whose orders proceedings were instituted against certain publicans in Skibbereen, county Cork, by the police, for having displayed flags from their windows on the occasion of the recent visit of the Baroness Burdett Coutts to that town; whether he authorised such conduct on the part of the constabulary; if not, whether any notice will be taken of it; and, what steps will be taken to prevent its recurrence?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER), in reply, said, he had been informed that no proceedings were taken against certain publicans in Skibbereen for displaying flags from their windows. The District Inspector, on his own responsibility—and he thought inadvisedly—prosecuted some persons for lighting tar-barrels. The cases were dismissed. The District Inspector had been reprovved for his action.

DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS (OCT. 30)— LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL AND
MR. CHAMBERLAIN.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I wish to ask the President of the Board of Trade one or two Questions with reference to the documents which he read to the House last night. I wish to know whether I am right in understanding that he is in possession of other documents than those which he quoted of the same character? I do not know whether I should call them sworn documents, as they were of a doubtful nature. Has the right hon. Gentleman any more of them besides those which he quoted to the House? If so, can he say how many they are, and give the names of the parties who fabricated them? I would also ask him whether he will cause me to be furnished with legally-attested and certified copies of all the documents of that kind which he possesses, in order that the parties who are aggrieved by the statements made in them may be enabled, without the slightest loss of time, to take immediate criminal proceedings against the parties concerned in fabricating and procuring those documents?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I think, Sir, that, in the course of my speech last night, the noble Lord made an interruption, and I replied that I would be very happy to place at his disposal copies of any documents I read.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Legally-attested copies?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: If the noble Lord interrupts me it is impossible that I can answer his Question. I said that I would furnish him with copies of any documents that I used, or was going to use, in the course of my speech. The noble Lord, after my speech was concluded, communicated with me, and asked me to carry out my promise and furnish him with copies of those documents. I told the noble Lord that the documents that I had used had gone to the Reporters' Gallery; that probably they would appear verbatim in the Press, and that that might be sufficient for his purpose; but that, if it was not, on hearing from him again, I would give him copies. I observe that the reports in the Press are not quite verbatim; and I, therefore, understand that he would like to have actual copies. I have already directed that copies shall be made, and they will be at once forwarded to the noble Lord. He asks me now whether I will let him have legally-attested copies. I can assure him that I will not throw the slightest difficulty in the way of any legal investigation into these matters. Beyond saying that I am not inclined to go at the present moment. The noble Lord will know when he receives the copies whether any more is necessary. He asks me whether I have any other evidence of this kind.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: No; pardon me. I asked the right hon. Gentleman whether I was right in understanding him to say that he had other documents of a similar nature to those quoted, but that there was not time to read them to the House.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: That is exactly what I say. The noble Lord asks me whether I have other documents, whether I will say how many they are, and whether I will give the names of the persons who, as he says, fabricated them. The question whether they are fabrications or not is one which I hope will shortly be tried. But, in answer to the noble Lord's other Questions, I say that I have in my possession a good deal more of similar evidence; but I do not think it desirable or necessary, under the circumstances, and with the probability of a further inquiry being held, to furnish him with copies of that at the present time. I am sure that he will have quite enough on which to base the investigation which he has promised.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I think that the right hon. Gentleman does not quite understand the Question that I have put to him. The reason why I have asked him for legally-attested copies of his documents is because by no possibility could legal proceedings be founded on them unless they were so attested. Then I further ask him whether the documents which he quoted were the actual original documents, or were only copies; and, if they are only copies, who are the persons who are at present in possession of the originals? Again, I ask him whether it is correct that he has other documents of a similar nature, implicating members of the Conservative Party in Birmingham in offences of a like character; whether or not he will produce, for the purpose of inquiry into this whole matter, all the documents which he has in his possession, and will keep nothing back from the House and the public?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: In reply to the noble Lord's Questions, my answer, in the first place, is, that I think it a most extraordinary thing that the noble Lord, who has made charges himself, and has never produced one tittle of evidence in support of them, should ask me to disclose, not only all the evidence on which I rely for the statements that I made in this House, but also all the additional evidence I may have for other charges, which, at some future time, it may be my duty to make. Sir, I decline that altogether. In regard to the Question whether I will supply the noble Lord with legally-attested copies of these documents, I have to say I do not think it necessary that I should be put to the expense and trouble of doing that at the present time. I am not a lawyer; but if the noble Lord or his friends institute legal proceedings in this matter, I believe they will be able to get an Order of Court, or whatever it may be called, to obtain the documents in the formal shape which is necessary to base proceedings upon them. But I can assure the noble Lord that, as far as I am concerned, no technical difficulty shall be allowed to stand in the way of any legal investigations that may be instituted.

MR. LEWIS: I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade whether the originals of the documents he produced yesterday are in his possession?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Some of the documents which I quoted were copies, and others were originals.

MR. GORST gave Notice that on Monday next he would ask the Attorney General, Whether his attention had been called to the conduct of Messrs. Horton, Hooper, and others, who had taken the depositions of J. Walsh, Enoch Bird, T. Hadley, Peter Levenson, and others, at Birmingham; and whether the administration of oaths for the purpose of providing sworn documents to be produced in that House was not prohibited by Section 13 of the Act 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 62, for the suppression of unnecessary oaths; whether such disobedience to a Statute was not a misdemeanour; and, if so, what steps Her Majesty's Government would take to bring these offenders to justice, and revoke the commissions to administer oaths which they had thus abused? In consequence, however, of what had fallen from the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock, if there was any reason to suppose that this subject would be a matter of judicial inquiry with regard to the conduct of the Commissioners, of course he would not put such a Question?

MR. LEWIS gave Notice that on Monday he would ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he would be good enough to specify which, if any, of the originals of the documents mentioned on the previous day had been in his possession?

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— KHARTOUM.

MR. REPTON: I beg to ask the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War, Whether there is any further intelligence from Khartoum to day?

ORDER OF THE DAY.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.] [SEVENTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Main Question [23rd October,] "That, &c."—[See page 69.]

Main Question again proposed.

AMENDMENT (MR. MAC IVER)—DEPRESSION OF TRADE.

MR. MAC IVER said, he rose to move an Amendment to the Address in the following words:—

"But humbly to direct Her Majesty's attention to the depressed condition of commerce and agriculture, and regret that Her Majesty's gracious Speech contains no reference to a subject of such paramount importance."

Nothing could be further from his wish or intention than by his Amendment to anticipate the demand for an inquiry that was being made into the depressed state of agriculture. It did seem to him, however, that, as representing a large and important trading constituency, he had some right to be heard on a question such as that raised by his Amendment; and it also seemed to him that, as no one else stood forward, it was his duty to do so under the present circumstances, which were only too well known, not alone at Birkenhead, but in many other centres of industry. The shipping of the Port of Liverpool was greater than that of the Port of London; and as one-half of the port of Liverpool was in his constituency at Birkenhead, he add not think that he was unreasonable in asking the House to join him in expression of regret that at a time like this the condition of commerce should not have been considered important enough to justify any mention in the Queen's Speech. His, he ventured to think, was not the only constituency where, to those who were out of work, the means of living were of more importance than any consideration of the Franchise Bill. At Birkenhead, so far as he knew, they cared little or nothing about what the Prime Minister described as "the great object for which Parliament had been summoned." The all-important question to people who were out of work was—"How were they to live?" And, although it might be very bad political economy, he (Mr. Mac Iver) was very much inclined to agree with the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley) that the Government had other duties more important than legislation, and that the very first of those duties was to take such reasonable means as might be in their power "to provide the people with bread and cheese." He regretted that the Government had been so blind to the condition of matters around them in every centre of industry as to suppose that they could satisfy starving men with a Franchise Bill. He wished to approach the consideration of this question entirely from a non-political point of view, because it seemed to him that in the House of Commons they thought sometimes too much of Party questions and not enough of those great social problems such as that which he wished now to bring before the House. He wished to say that he had the greatest sympathy with the Question which had been addressed to the First Lord of the Treasury by the hon. Member for Sunderland with reference to shipbuilding in the Royal Navy; and knowing as he did the present condition of our Navy, and that ships could be now cheaply and advantageously built at those ports where there was so much distress, he thought that the hon. Member had been justified in asking that the Government should take some such steps. But, in reply to the hon. Member's Question, the Prime Minister went out of his way to administer a severe rebuke to his devoted follower for venturing to raise a question of this kind. The position was now far too grave to be treated as a Party question. Manufacturers and those engaged in agriculture were bound up in each other, and neither could prosper without the other, a truth that was too often forgotten. Agriculture was still the greatest pursuit in this country, and more people depended upon it for a livelihood than upon any other source; but manufacturers sometimes forgot that, and, unfortunately, there were mischievous politicians whose occupation would be gone if they had not a fertile field in which to sow trouble and to foment jealousies. He was not engaged in agriculture, and had nothing to do with it; but, whatever might be the outcome of the proposed inquiry, he would wish that any change that was made should be a change that would be fair all round to every industry in the country. Cheap food might be bought too dear, and the ruin of agriculture meant the destruction of our home markets for manufactures. Surely the incidence of taxation, the removal of our own burdens, and the endeavour to place those burdens upon foreign producers rather than upon producers at home, were subjects which to-day ought once more to be calmly considered and not left to angry controversy. He had no sympathy with those politicians whose political existence depended upon setting class against class, the manufacturing artisans against the agricultural labourers, and who saw in a state of affairs such as this a field for sowing dissensions. When speaking in "another place," Lord Kimberley had argued that there was distress all over the world, and that the condition of other countries was worse than our own. That was partly true. No doubt, trade was not good in the United States or on the Continent; but it was impossible for any Member of the Government or the House of Commons to make any accurate comparison as to the state of trade here and elsewhere. Those who were opposed to him pointed triumphantly to the statistics of the Board of Trade; but, for his own part, he was inclined to doubt the Board of Trade statistics; he had less faith in statistics and in newspaper information than was the case with many hon. Members opposite. There were certain practical considerations which had more reality about them than any amount of Mr. Giffen's statistics or of newspaper paragraphs, from whatever source they might be contributed. He had practical experience of the depression in trade now existing all over the country. He was a shareholder in some woollen mills in Cheshire; and he had received, a short time ago, a communication announcing that they were in liquidation. The fact was, anyone connected with the management of shipping had the opportunity of knowing exactly whither the trade of the world was going. For example, he was interested in certain steamers running to and from the River Plate, a great part of whose business was the carrying of wool. It was impossible at that moment to load a cargo of wool for importation into England; the demand for wool came from France and Belgium, and not from this country. Again, shipbuilding in France, though not in a very prosperous, was in a fairly prosperous condition; their shipyards were not empty as the English yards were. He knew this from his own experience, though, in answer to a Question he had put to him, the President of the Board of Trade confessed that he did not know what the state of the shipping trade in France was. That fact, in itself, was sufficient to justify his Amendment. The Suez Canal Returns, published on the authority of the Leith Chamber of Commerce, showed that, owing to the bounty system, French shipping passing through the Suez Canal had doubled, while British shipping had only increased 7 per cent.

MR. MUNDELLA: What is the relative proportion?

MR. MAC IVER said, he had not the figures then with him; but he was perfectly ready to furnish them to any hon. Member who wished to see them. For his own part, he had been a good deal about the Mediterranean, and had noticed that there had been a remarkable increase in the number of French steamers trading in that quarter—that, whereas formerly they only saw an occasional steamer carrying the French flag, at the present day that flag was seen everywhere. Would the House believe the statement that under our economical Post Office, which went to Germany for the materials for its post-cards, the people of Malta were, at the present moment, actually dependent on French and Italian steamers for the conveyance of their English mails? Of course, a good deal of money was saved; but there were national considerations which ought to take precedence of all others in regard to matters of military and naval importance connected with a great naval station like that of Malta. He held in his hand the Report of a Steamship Company with whose management he had nothing to do, but in which he had the good or ill fortune to be a shareholder. In that Report the Directors stated as a reason why they were unable to pay a dividend that one all-powerful factor was Free Trade, the definition of which, as far as this country was concerned, might be described as the giving away of every privilege and receiving nothing in return, in consequence of which they saw the foreign trade being gradually absorbed by other countries, under a system of bounties and protective duties. The Report went on to say that the agriculturists, though blessed with an abundant harvest, could only sell it at ruinous prices, while the markets of the world were closed to England by the system of duties and bounties, and the labouring classes, though getting bread more cheaply and abundantly than before, were unable to obtain employment, without which cheap food was no blessing. He strongly and emphatically blamed the President of the Board of Trade for much of this. He would not say the President individually, because he had not the slightest personal feeling towards him, but the Department over which he presided. He would remind the House that one evening last Session, when, after many attempts, he (Mr. Mac Iver) was fortunate enough to get the first place on the Notice Paper for a Motion to inquire into the constitution and functions of the Board of Trade, he was at once "counted out" by hon. Members opposite, and thus deprived of the opportunity of bringing the matter before the House. Many persons thought the President of the Board of Trade had met the case by proposing the appointment of a Royal Commission on Merchant Shipping, and that one of its duties would be to inquire into the functions of the Board of Trade. But this was not the case, the fact being that the Reference to the Commission was of a much narrower character; and they still had in that Board a Department which he (Mr. Mac Iver) maintained entirely failed in its duty, which, in point of fact, was not a Board of Trade at all, and was certainly not a Department in the sense in which that House had passed its Resolutions in favour of the appointment of a Minister of Commerce and Agriculture. He might describe the Board of Trade as useless and mischievous, and as something which ought to be abolished. The view he took of the Department was, he felt sure, pretty much the view taken by those engaged in the sugar trade, as well as by the shipowners, and he might also say by the sailors. The shipowners had a keen appreciation of the state of the law under which our British shipping was handicapped. They knew how the existing law hindered and hampered the British shipping trade, while protecting the foreigner, to the injury of the English owners. As to the sailors, he might state that he was not long ago invited to be present at a meeting of British seamen, who, instead of supporting the Board of Trade, wanted to denounce the President of that Department as an enemy of his country. The ground of their denunciation was that they were in want of employment; and the state of the law was such that they, as British seamen, were placed at a great disadvantage, while foreigners, who really were not sailors at all, came over and successfully competed with them. He would here say it was too much to assume, as many did, that the taxes on importations were necessarily borne by the consumers. [Laughter from the Liberal Benches.] Hon. Members below the Gangway laughed; but could they produce other authority for their incredulity than newspapers inspired by the Board of Trade? Every commercial man knew that the import tax was not necessarily paid by the consumer. It was not long ago that he was lunching at Liverpool in company with Mr. Paul, a partner of the firm of Ross T. Smyth & Co., and a loyal supporter of Her Majesty's Government, and that gentleman had said, in reference to the question what would be the effect of an increase or diminution in the rate of freight on the corn trade, that whenever the rate of freight went up, those abroad who had to sell their wheat were obliged to accept a lower price, while, at the same time, nothing came from the consumer. Mr. John Stuart Mill, in his Principles of Political Economy, Vol. 2, p. 405, said—

"The imposition of a tax on a commodity almost always diminished the demand, and it was laid down as a principle that a tax on imported commodities, when it really operated as a tax and not as a prohibition, almost always fell partly on the foreigner who had the goods, this being a mode in which a nation might appropriate to itself at the expense of the foreigner a larger share than belonged to it of the increase of productiveness."

Mr. Mill added—

He thought there was "no one in the House who would not agree with him that what was called Free Trade had somewhat disappointed everybody. It had certainly not worked out as its original promoters had hoped. Still, there was a tendency on the part of the Government to dispute this. He wished to put before the House three propositions—first, the Amendment he had placed upon the Paper; secondly, to concur with him in the reasonableness of the demand for an inquiry; and, thirdly, he was ready to suggest, though he did not think that the right occasion, a remedy. But supposing his remedy took the form of a tax on imports, he maintained that there were many imported luxuries about the taxing of which there ought to be very little doubt. We imported last year of silk fabrics alone to the value of £12,000,000, of artificial flowers to the value of £500,000, of musical instruments to the value of nearly £1,000,000. What our imported manufactures amounted to was a point of some importance, because here there was a real dispute. He had heard the President of the Board of Trade speak of their annual value as £25,000,000, the Prime Minister had spoken of it as £45,000,000; it appeared to him that it was as much as £107,000,000. The figures on which he relied were at the service of anyone who liked to see them; but how could the same figures yield such different results as £25,000,000, £45,000,000, and £107,000,000? The explanation of the discrepancy lay in the mode in which Mr. Giffen and his assistants at the Board of Trade prepared their accounts. Sugar, for example, which we imported to the amount of £20,000,000, came, according to Mr. Giffen's classification, under the head not of manufactures, but of articles of consumption; and so, likewise, did oleomargarine. He thought he had said enough to justify the Amendment which he had put on the Paper. It seemed to him that our present commercial system was wrong altogether. There was one other matter to which he thought he should be justified in making a reference. An idea very widely prevailed that certain Members of the Government, as well as certain Members of Parliament, were interested in firms abroad who had entered into competition with British manufacturers. He did not know whether it was true or not, but perhaps the hon. Member for the West Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Holden) would inform the House if there was any foundation for that allegation. Then a similar rumour prevailed with regard to the Vice President of the Council (Mr. Mundella), who was credited with being connected with a foreign firm, and he (Mr. Mac Iver) thought it was only due to the right hon. Gentleman that his attention should be called to the subject. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would say whether it was a fact that he had no connection at the present time with the firm of A. Mundella & Co., Chemnitz, Saxony, which had been established in opposition to manufacturers in this country? Another point to which he (Mr. Mac Iver) would also desire to call the attention of the House was this. A great portion of our Revenue was now derived from Income

Tax. A great deal had been heard about our investments abroad, and it seemed to him that many of these investments escaped Income Tax altogether. That, at least, was the inference to be drawn if the description of these investments given by Mr. Giffen were true. The burden which those investments ought to bear was borne wholly by the industries of this country. In conclusion, the hon. Member urged that the question was deserving of serious consideration, as a very large balance of Income Tax on foreign profits was still unaccounted for. He begged to move the Amendment which stood in his name.

MR. ECROYD, in rising to second the Amendment, said, he desired to disclaim any intention of discussing the question on Party grounds. It could not be denied that there was at the present time a very large amount of industrial depression. Such a state of things affected closely the interests of the working population, and the subject ought, therefore, to interest equally hon. Members on both sides of the House. He accordingly invited the co-operation of hon. Gentlemen opposite in the discussion of the subject. His hope was that the Government might remedy the omission in the Queen's Speech, and take into consideration, without delay, the desirability of proceeding to appoint either a Royal Commission, or a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament, to consider this question in all its bearings. The depression in trade was almost universal. There was, however, one great branch of trade which must be excepted—namely, the worsted and woollen trade, which was now in a better condition than it had been in for some time. That was, no doubt, due to the influence of the previous long-continued and tremendous depression, which had the effect of largely reducing the number of firms engaged in this trade. The reality of the grounds on which his hon. Friend based his Amendment was made plain in the communication from a Trade Unionist, which appeared in The Times on Thursday. The writer of that article said that the depression was very widespread; that trade was evidently declining; that profits were becoming less; that wages were being reduced; that in many industries short time was being resorted to; and that in many places the works were being closed. He thus gave a gloomy forecast for the coming winter. The writer also pointed out that the great industries of Lancashire, Staffordshire, the Midlands generally, and of South Wales were in a very unsatisfactory condition from the point of view of Trades Unionists, and that in the Metropolitan area 30 per cent of the dock labourers were out of work. Such a state of things, the writer argued, indicated that it was incumbent upon Parliament to consider favourably any Motion that might be brought forward for the purpose of inquiring into the causes of the distress that existed among the industrial population in all parts of the country. He hoped that the Amendment would not be pooh-poohed by the occupants of the Treasury Bench, and that they would not be put off by references to statistics in regard to the decrease of pauperism, the maintenance of the receipts from Income Tax, and the increase of the rateable value of property. Pauperism had, no doubt, diminished, but the diminution was in great measure due to the manifest spread of temperance and thrift, and to the existence of Friendly Societies and other organizations of that kind which afforded assistance to working men when out of employment. Then before the increase in the rateable value of property was taken as evidence of internal prosperity, it must be borne in mind that formerly property was much undervalued, and it was also necessary to consider what proportion of rateable property was occupied by persons connected with foreign industries, and how much of it by persons who derived their wealth from foreign investments and undertakings. Neither were the Income Tax Returns a real index to the changes which took place in the industrial earnings of the country. It was well known that occupiers of land paid Income Tax at a fixed rate whether their profits were large or small, so that whether a farmer made a profit of £200, or suffered a loss of £300 upon his year's trade, he paid the same amount of Income Tax. The same thing often occurred in the case of persons engaged in manufacturing industries. Many small tradesmen and manufacturers made a return which, when accepted, was maintained through good years and bad years. Then the Returns of Income Tax were swollen by incomes derived from foreign property owned by persons living in this country, and from income the source of which lay in the external trading operations of the country. Now, with reference to the question of agricultural distress, in spite of the late good season, all must admit that the English farmer had little reason to congratulate himself on his financial prospects. It was true he had had a harvest, which, although not abundant in quantity, had been excellent in quality; but, on the other hand, he was receiving for his grain the lowest price he had ever received, and he had to contend with a great depreciation in the value of his cattle and sheep. If these matters were taken into consideration, it would be found that the agricultural depression was pressing as severely on the occupier of the land as it had done at any time during the last seven or eight years. From the national point of view, a reduction of rents would be no remedy whatever for this state of things, because a considerable reduction of the incomes of landowners would be as greatly felt by the nation as if the loss had fallen on any other class. A reduction of rents, or of the value of building land, was an indication of decay in any country. It was not only a consequence of adversity, but a herald of coming adversity. A reduction of the income of property owners necessarily told upon trade throughout the country, and stopped expenditure upon the improvement of the land itself. The result of that in the long run was to throw out of work a vast number of labourers, artisans, and manufacturers of various kinds. It increased the indisposition of the wealthy to embark more capital in property of which they believed the prospects to be exceedingly doubtful, and it induced a disposition to "hedge" to some extent by investing money in foreign lands and property. Thus the money that ought to have been, and would have been, invested in this country was now being used to increase the means of that competition abroad which was reducing the income of all classes connected with the industries of this country. He looked with apprehension at the probable effect of the great disappearance of profit, and shrinkage of rent, which had taken place during the past 10 years, and were still going on, for the same thing which had happened to the owners and occupiers of land had happened on a large scale to the owners of property connected with trade, commerce, and manufactures, and to those who were conducting the operations of our varied industries. He was thankful to acknowledge that the position of the workmen themselves had thus far been better maintained relatively than had the position of the owners of property and the conductors of industries, whether agricultural or manufacturing. But they could not lose sight of the fact that if depression first of all took away profit from the cultivators of the soil and from the conductors of industries, it compelled them to appeal for a reduction of rent, and make that a condition for the further prosecution of their industries. Thus the owners of property were necessarily the next to suffer. Two buffers, as he might call them, had been interposed between the industrial classes and the disastrous effects of this depression. The first of these was the profits of trade and manufacture; and it had practically disappeared. The second was the rent, not only of land, but of buildings; and with the exception of a few centres where foreign productions were imported and distributed, or where accumulated wealth spent itself in a thousand ways, there had been a serious reduction of value in that description of property. In the end the depression must fall upon the industrial classes. One effect of the agricultural depression and of foreign competition in our tillage area was that it had displaced labour on a large scale. A short time ago he had a conversation with a farmer of 1,000 acres or more, who told him that he had only one man in his employ under 30 years of age. The reason, he said, was that all the younger people believed that tillage farming in this country was done for. That appeared to open out a very serious prospect. The farmers had suffered under extreme depression during the past few years; but they were now threatened with another serious difficulty—namely, that of obtaining labourers, as men were now unwilling to engage in what they believed to be a sinking and doomed industry. The rural districts had been the fountains from which a healthy population had been drawn into our towns, and if they were depopulated, the first fatal blow would have been struck against the future success of the industries of this country. He regretted that in this condition of affairs Her Majesty's Speech contained no word of sympathy for those industries which were so deeply depressed, no promise of inquiry, and, what was still more important, no indication of relief from that unjust burden of local taxation which, in spite of the emphatic votes of that House, was still pressing on our industries, agricultural and manufacturing, and disabling them in the terrible competition with foreign countries. It was a remarkable fact that since 1870 the two occasions on which wheat had reached the highest price were those periods in which our industries had been best employed, and when there was a tendency to an advance in wages. In 1871-2-3, when the average price of wheat was 57s. 6d. per quarter, all industries were most active and wages were higher than they had been before. In 1879 and 1880 there was again a higher price of wheat than had prevailed previously. Wheat rose to 45s. and 48s. per quarter, and again there was a movement in our industries, a gleam of hope, and, to a certain extent, an advance of wages among our industrial population. On the other hand, on every occasion during those 14 years when the price of wheat had been at its lowest, there was extreme stagnation of trade and a gloom hanging over all our industries which resulted in a reduction of wages. He hoped, therefore, they had heard the last of the ancient superstition that the sale of produce at prices so low as to contribute to the ruin of those who produced it could conduce to the general welfare of the country. If our present system had not proved good for either our agricultural or industrial interests, in Heaven's name in whose interest was it maintained? It was maintained in the interest of the consumer, who did not happen to be also a producer; it was maintained in the interest of that class who, living in this country, employed their capital in foreign countries where Protection prevailed, and profited by that Protection which was directed against our own industries. The depressions of trade had become chronic, and the prophecies of Free Traders were no longer believed by any class. They had so often been falsified that they would not be believed again by the great mass of Englishmen. In the face of a Dissolution which could not be far distant, he hoped the Government would so far cut the ground from under the feet of their opponents as to grant a complete investigation. Periods of depression had become of more frequent occurrence and of longer duration than they used to be. The recoveries had become more transitory, and, like a flash in the pan, the gleam of hope had disappeared directly. This had been the state of things for the last eight or ten years. He appealed to the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. S. Smith) to say whether among the agencies which had contributed to the demoralization of the industrial population of this country anything had been so far-reaching as the violent and sudden fluctuations produced by foreign tariffs? An instance was given the other day by the President of the Board of Trade. The French Shipping Bounties having permitted the import of foreign-built vessels for a fixed period, the effect had been to increase for that time the amount of shipbuilding in this country; but the moment that period terminated shipbuilding for France was stopped here, and repairing was transferred to the French shipyards. A more notable example was furnished by the trade in iron rails with the United States. An enormous demand there produced an activity of trade here; but at the slightest contraction of demand the duty, like a sharp knife, cut off the trade of this country, to the demoralization of the workpeople in our great centres. First, wages were rapidly advanced; the temptation to expenditure was irresistible; and the result of the sudden check was seen in destitution like that of "starving Jarrow," as it was described in a newspaper heading. The manufacturers of mixed fabrics at Lyons and St. Etienne had been using English cotton yarns, the supply of which was cut off under the violent system of Protection adopted by France, which must be injurious to the well-being of the country and of its manufactures in the long run. Some thought that the solution of the difficulty would be that the French Government would be obliged to admit English yarns at a reduced duty, or, possibly, free of duty; but all past experience taught them that the ultimate solution would be the establishment by the French of fine spinning mills under English overlookers. We must now look at these matters in the light of past experience, and give up dreaming of a state of things continually promised and never realized. We were told, on the one hand, that our manufacturers experienced difficulty in meeting foreign competition, and, on the other hand, that the imposition of a duty on foreign goods would weaken our own competition with those foreign rivals. These propositions were absolutely contradictory and mutually destructive. The foreign rivals whose goods displaced our own belonged to Protected nations, and worked under import duties. Now, if the imposition of Protected duties incapacitated and disqualified manufacturers for foreign competition, how was it that French and German textile and iron manufacturers were successfully invading this free market? We were suffering not only from positive Bounties given, but also from Protective duties imposed. If 30 per cent were levied in Germany upon imported woollen goods, the manufacturer there had created for him an artificially profitable internal market, whose profits furnished him with resources to invade the free market of England, and to undersell those who were working under Free Trade. Thus, foreign manufacturers were enabled to dispose of goods for which, under a system of Free Trade on both sides, they could not have succeeded in finding a market in this country. Our industries, agricultural and manufacturing, had ceased to grow with the growth of our population. It was perfectly certain that to a large extent the new concerns which were started were more a displacement of old ones than a real increase in our productive industries. The export of coal, taking the five years from 1869 to 1873, and comparing them with the five years from 1879 to 1883, had risen 45 per cent in quantity. It was a remarkable fact that in regard to steam engines and all kinds of machinery there had been an immense increase in our exports. As compared with the five years 1869-73, the five years 1879-83 showed an increase of steam engines exported amounting to 40 per cent, and of other machinery and mill work the exports had increased 55 per cent. But the discouraging side of the question was that we had been exporting the implements of production instead of the products of our own industry. In cotton piece goods, for instance, our exports had diminished nearly £3,000,000 in value. There had been practically no growth in our exports of cotton manufactured goods in the last five years as compared with 10 years ago. All healthy growth had absolutely ceased. So in woollen and worsted goods there had been a diminution of our exports in 1879-83 compared with 1869-73 amounting to 30 per cent in value. In cutlery and hardware the diminution was 15 per cent, in earthenware  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, in linen  $6\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. [Mr. JESSE COLLINGS: Raw iron and wool?] If less was received for raw iron, it followed surely that less was paid in wages. In the same years which witnessed these large diminutions in our exported manufactures there was an enormous increase in the export of coal, steam engines, and machinery, in spite of the decline in prices. But there was no healthy growth; there was positive diminution in the exportation of the articles which we manufactured. Were reductions in wages ever before so prevalent with food so cheap and raw material so abundant? With wheat at 32s. a-quarter, and sugar at 2d. a-pound, was industry ever so depressed? All this indicated that we had entered upon a different period, a different order of things from what had ever previously existed. He did not advocate any particular remedy; this was not the proper occasion for doing so; but he had made out a case in favour of a full, complete, and impartial inquiry. We were overwhelmed with manufactures, which were the fruit of a lower standard of comfort than prevailed among our own work-people; with imports of wheat, which were the fruit of a less skilful and scientific agriculture than our own. He commended these considerations to the hon. Members for Morpeth (Mr. Burt) and Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst), who represented labour in that House. Those Gentlemen were anxious to prevent undue competition within this country; but how long were we to be subject to one-sided and unfair, and, therefore, ruinous competition from outside the country? The low prices of imports benefited to a small degree even our artizans in their capacity of consumers. But how high a price did we pay for this in the depression of rents and profits, and the inevitable depression of wages which must certainly follow? In every centre of industry the consequences of this unlimited competition were being felt, whilst a comparatively small class of persons were making enormous incomes by foreign investments. There was no part of the United Kingdom upon which this grossly unfair system had produced more unfortunate results than Ireland, which depended so largely upon home productions. Then we had lately been discussing the important question of the dwellings of the poor; but no improvement of their dwellings could be either general or permanent unless they were fully employed and fairly paid. He had been informed that in the East End of London 30 per cent of the labouring population were unemployed. What wonder that they were badly housed! We should be told that we were not suffering more than the Protected nations, and that we ought to be thankful that we were not worse off than they. Had it come to this, then? Was that all that could be said after 40 years of our one-sided Free Trade, and in face of the fact that we possessed a Colonial and Indian Empire with which those nations had nothing to compare? The question was of so complicated a character that it could only be adequately dealt with by a Royal Commission or Joint Committee. He asked for nothing more than a fair field and no favour. Less than that he was sure that the country would not endure. The policy of allowing one industry after another to be destroyed, and the employment and remuneration of our working classes to suffer, was a policy not worthy of the spirit and energy of this country. He would suggest that the development of the resources of India might be stimulated by a carefully considered system of differential duties. He would also be glad to see a much larger outlay on railways and roads, so that the products of that country might more easily be exported, and India become a rival of the United States. He would gladly welcome an expenditure of £20,000,000 or £30,000,000 per annum in that direction, which would ultimately be largely productive of profit to our Indian Empire. There was no question that the present condition of affairs was alarming in the extreme. There was no doubt that the inhabitants of nearly all our great centres of industry were united in believing that some means must be taken by the Government to remedy the present depressed condition of our industries and manufactures. These at present were fiscal questions; but they could easily become social questions of the most dangerous character, leading to demands entirely inconsistent with the firmness of the foundations of the security of property of every kind. In conclusion, he sincerely hoped that so deep an interest might be shown by hon. Members in these great questions affecting the condition of the labouring poor, that they, being assured of the sympathy of those whom Providence had placed in a position of greater influence and comfort, might desire not to undermine, but to sustain, the foundations of property, assured that in so doing they were best securing a full share for themselves of those good things, now so abundant, which had been created for the benefit of all.

Amendment proposed,

To insert in the ninth paragraph, after the word "us," the words "but humbly to direct Her Majesty's attention to the depressed condition of commerce and agriculture, and regret that Her Majesty's gracious Speech contains no reference to a subject of such paramount importance."—(Mr. Mac Iver.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. MUNDELLA said, his object in rising was to refer to a personal matter which had been brought before the House by the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver). He wished, however, first to say that he differed entirely from almost all that had been said by the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Ecroyd), whom he greatly respected in fields other than the field of politics, as he knew of his hon. Friend's relations with his own workmen, and of the zeal with which they served him. He should have taken no part in this debate, but as he was leaving the House, this morning, between 2 and 3 o'clock, the hon. Member for Birkenhead tapped him on the shoulder, and said he was going to call attention to the fact that he established foreign industries abroad in competition with British industries at home. He thought it was deplorable that they could not conduct their debates without these constant references to personal matters. It was deplorable to see that they were, night after night, discussing personal questions when they had the Business of this great Empire to attend to. The hon. Member for Birkenhead stated that he had set up foreign industries with the view of their competing with British industries. The hon. Gentleman mentioned, in addition, that the hon. Member for the North-West Riding carried a great deal of British capital abroad. He thought, on the contrary, that his hon. Friend had brought a great deal of foreign capital to England. As far as he personally was concerned, he was almost ashamed to make a statement to the House. The facts were these, and he would show the House what use was made of them up and down the country. Hon. Members opposite had denounced him by name, in the most unmeasured terms, as an employer who carried his machinery and capital abroad. Indeed, he believed it had been alleged that his object in advocating the Factory Acts was to limit the hours of labour at home, so that advantage might be taken of the long hours of labour abroad. This was the revival of an old story, circulated at the time of his original election for Sheffield, nearly a quarter of a century ago. In 1853 he was a partner in an old-established concern in the town of Nottingham. Having thrown all his energies into the business, and he had worked very hard—as he always did in connection with everything he took up—his health broke down completely, and he was ordered to go abroad. During his absence the concern was converted into a Joint Stock Company, and when he came back he took his share in the undertaking, and continued his active connection with it till a short time after he became a Member of the House of Commons. It happened that in 1860, or 1861, when the American War broke out, there was an old-established business in Nottingham, which had a branch in Germany, where the old handlooms were very widely utilized for German and American business. But the German and American business came to a standstill, and his firm bought the whole of the plant and machinery of the concern. He went over to see the business in Germany, and he thought it would be a very good thing to continue it, because it gave an opportunity of insight into the whole system of German manufactures and education. He wished more manufacturers would make themselves acquainted with the method of their foreign rivals. He had already told the House that his active connection with the business ceased soon after he became a Member of Parliament. He had since been a small shareholder, but his maximum interest in this foreign enterprise never at any time reached the sum of £3,000. As he did not know to what extent the large business in Nottingham had gone on increasing, though he knew they had greatly extended their business, he had telegraphed that day to know how much they had increased their English capital and plant, and a gentleman very well known in Nottingham, and a good supporter of hon. Members opposite, replied that the Company's capital had trebled since the foreign concern was acquired—that was the capital applied to English industry. The building and plant had increased four-fold. He had now shown how far he was a manufacturer abroad, and how far he had injured English workmen by his connection with foreign affairs. But why was it wrong to import anything from abroad? How was it on the other side of the House, and among the advocates of Fair Trade? He found that noble Lords and hon. Gentlemen were proprietors of great stretches of land and cattle ranches in foreign countries for the purpose of manufacturing food. He did not say that the noble Lords and the hon. Members opposite who owned large tracts of foreign land were wrong in sending the produce of their square miles of American territory to this country, because anyone who imported cheap food into England was a national benefactor; but it was rather strange to see them taking their place among the most prominent friends of the English farmer. He left hon. Members opposite to reconcile the consistency of those two facts. Having disposed of the personal question, he should wish to say a few words upon the general question before the House. Both the hon. Members who had addressed the House from the opposite Benches had spoken as though the Resolution on the Paper was one asking for a Committee of Inquiry; but the fact was that there was no question of inquiry before the House. He would just like to inform the House of the facts which had been brought to his notice as to the state of things in foreign countries. The argument of the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver) was that we ought to have Protection all round; but could the hon. Member point to a single foreign country where Protection was in force that was better off than ourselves? During the Recess he had seen a good deal of the condition of the manufactures, commerce, and agriculture in the different States of Europe, and he had ascertained that Europe, as a whole, had been suffering from depression during the last 10 years, and that that depression was increasing year by year. The Chamber of Agriculture in their Report for 1882 said that it was impossible to say whether the immediate causes of agricultural depression were permanent or not, because good and bad seasons appeared to come in cycles, and with them agricultural prosperity or depression. What was the state of agriculture in France? Everybody who had the most elementary knowledge of the matter knew that matters were far worse in France than they were in this country, and that they were equally bad in Germany and in Switzerland. In the latter country, indeed, the rate of interest on money lent on mortgage had been obliged to be reduced from 4½ to 2½ per cent, for fear that the mortgagors should throw up their mortgages. That was the condition of things all over Europe. In some districts he had been assured that not a good barrel of wine had been made there for the last 20 years, while in others it was said that they had not had a good crop of cereals for the last 10 years. [An hon. MEMBER: There was a good crop this year.] Yes, this year, for the first time for years; but it was not yet harvested. In Belgium the state of the iron trade was infinitely worse than with us. The miners there were working half-time, and their wages were something less than 10s. a-week. But while there was distress in every Department in France, there was no demand for Protection, except among the agricultural classes, who had already got it. The difficulty with French workmen was to get food, and the French Government was sending every week 50,000 francs here or there to keep these people alive. The writer of an excellent article in the October number of The National Review, on the subject of the depression in France, said that the demand of the French working men was for cheap food and the admission of British cotton duty free, and that all that was required to restore prosperity to France was the reduction of taxation upon all the necessities of life. Was that the direction in which hon. Members opposite desired that the Government should proceed? In this country we imposed but a small duty upon the necessities of life; and for his own part, instead of increasing that duty, he should be glad to see it abolished altogether. If we could put the labouring classes in a position to get more food for their money, we should, in effect, be increasing their wages. What we in this country wanted was to export our products, because the home trade would not suffice to take our manufactures. Then the hon. Gentleman had said that the amount of French shipping passing through the Suez Canal had nearly doubled, whereas the amount of English shipping had only increased by about 7 per cent. He had never heard a more extraordinary statement than that. In considering that, it must be remembered that the increase in French shipping was mainly due to purchases made in this market, and that the increase of 7 per cent in English shipping was a vastly different thing, and represented a much larger increase than was represented by the doubling of the French shipping, for at least 80 per cent of the shipping passing through the Canal was British. From a statement of the shipping which he had in his hand it appeared that the total tonnage of British ships clearing in cargo or ballast in British ports in the years 1878-9 and 1882-3—that was to say, the two last years of the late Government and the two first years of the present Government—was in 1878, 35,291,000 tons, and in 1879, 37,434,000 tons, while in 1882 it was 43,607,000 tons, and in 1883, 47,039,000 tons. The foreign shipping, on the other hand, was in 1878 only 16,304,000 tons, and in 1883, 18,000,000 tons, so that there had been a much smaller proportionate increase in foreign shipping. Then the hon. Gentleman had said that the cotton trade was a declining industry.

Mn. ECROYD explained, that he had not said that the trade was declining, but that it had ceased to develop a healthy growth.

Mr. MUNDELLA said, that the hon. Gentleman had compared the periods between the years 1869 and 1873, and the years 1879 and 1883. But that period comprised those tremendous years of inflation when steel rails, now selling at £5 a-ton, were selling at £20 a-ton, and when iron was three times its present price. It also included the period of the Franco-German War, when, in fact, the whole manufacture of Europe was thrown upon this country, and, therefore, it was hardly fair to compare those two periods. Within the period 1879-83, every kind of manufacture was lower than it had ever been in the memory of man. In the cotton trade the quantity of raw material imported in 1878 was 1,176,500 lbs.; in 1879, 1,173,326 lbs.; in 1882, 1,461,900 lbs.; and in 1883, 1,510,600 lbs. As to the exports, of course, the price of shirtings and such articles depended on the price of the raw cotton at Liverpool; and in 1878 the quantity of cotton piece-goods exported was 3,618,665 yards; in 1882, 4,349,391 yards; and in 1883, 4,538,889 yards; so that regularly in that department of industry there had been a large increase in the exports. Then there was an enormous increase in the annual amount of the deposits in the Post Office and Trustee Banks. In 1878 the amount was £19,344,000; in 1879, £19,547,000; in 1882 it rose to £23,354,000; and in 1883 to £24,123,000, or an increase of nearly 20 per cent. Then, again, what were the facts with regard to the Income Tax? In 1879 the returns under Schedules A, B, C, D, and E amounted to £578,000,000, and in 1882 to £601,000,000. Now, he would give the other side of the picture and give some account of France, which was a Protective country, and had been for some time carefully nursing her trade. During the eight months ending August 31, 1882, 1883, and 1884, the value of the principal manufactured articles exported from France was £48,895,000, £45,836,000, and £41,493,000 respectively; and the total exports, including agricultural produce, were, in 1882, £92,217,000; in 1883, £87,611,000; and in 1884, £81,617,000. Let them look at the contrast of the two countries, and see which system was producing the better results for its people. The hon. Member had said that the nation had been fed upon promises for the last 40 years. All he could say was that anything more terrible than the general suffering of the population 40 years ago, it was impossible to describe. When he was a youth it was for the handloom weavers a life of chronic starvation; they never had enough to eat, and the condition of the artisans in the Midland counties was one of terrible and constant suffering. This did not begin to amend until the Corn Laws were repealed. The wages earned at that time on the average by a man and his family were about 7s. a-week; while the sons and grandsons of those same men were now earning from 30s. to £2 or £3 a-week. That, he believed, applied to the whole of the working classes of the country. Besides that, let hon. Members contrast the consumption of food per head in France with the consumption of food in this country. They would find the preponderance largely in favour of England, showing that our people could afford to buy more food than their French neighbours. They all knew that at the present moment there was a great depression. They could not expect that the results of the last 10 years should pass away at once. He believed that the present cheapness of food in this Kingdom was the one thing that would carry it through this crisis better than any other nation in Europe. At Sheffield, lately, the Board of Guardians contracted for bread at 14 lbs. for 1s. The farmers' friends would, no doubt, say that this was deplorable. He thought that farmers themselves would benefit by this. They would grow some other things that would pay them better than wheat. It was the improvement in the means of the people that created the demand for meat, and this was due to Free Trade. It had been stated that when the price of food was high, then the industries of the country were prosperous. That was not his reading of history.

Mr. ECROYD explained that what he stated was, that during the years 1871, 1872, and 1873, which were prosperous years, wheat was at 57s. 5d.

Mr. MUNDELLA said, that this was on account of the Franco-German War, which inflated all prices. The hon. Member for Birkenhead suggested that we should tax imported luxuries, such as silk. What would come of that? Would it be fair that the farmer's wife or daughter should have to pay more for their ribbons and silk dress—if they could afford one—while the farmer's wife got no more for her dairy produce? If they once began they must tax all round. This had been clearly shown by the right hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote). At present many of our Colonies and foreign countries came to the London markets to buy their silks, and coming to buy silks they bought something else. And silk being bought here employed our ships to bring it here and take it away again. London became a depôt market. Now, what was the remedy for the depression? They must make Englishmen the most intelligent, the most thrifty, and the most competent workmen in the world, and then they would have nothing to fear from foreign competition. They must extend the scientific training, not only of workmen, but of manufacturers and manufacturers' sons. He warned the House that if we neglected this higher education, so surely would our industries suffer as the French industries had suffered in the contest with Germany. To mention one instance, Professor Roscoe very clearly pointed out that by far the larger proportion of the raw materials used in the manufacture of colours were imported from Germany and Switzerland, which themselves imported our gas refuse, and subjected it to the necessary chemical processes; £3,000,000 were thus lost to us. In the case of sugar, the technical skill which was brought to bear in Germany enabled them to extract a larger proportion of saccharine matter than any other nation, and as the result they had beaten the French out of their own markets. Was it not also humiliating that the English people were obliged to go to Germany for their gunpowder? Hon. Members opposite, he supposed, would not put a Protective duty on that. They would not deprive British guns of the best gunpowder. What science could do for Germany, science could surely do for England. The success with which science was in Germany brought to bear on manufactures, had led to the remark that in this matter Germany was par comparing for France a Sedan, which w be more disastrous to her industries *a*live. Sedan was to her arms. e in the

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, that the question before the House was far beyond anything of a personal character, and he was sure the time of the right hon. Gentleman might have been better employed had he attempted to reply to the able, exhaustive, and statesmanlike speech of the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Eeroyd). He thought the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver) was justified in bringing this Amendment before the House, and in calling attention to the fact that Her Majesty's Government, in the Speech from the Throne, had thought it proper not to refer in any way to, or to show any sympathy with, what he might call the exceptionally depressed state of every British industry at this time. They knew from what they had seen and heard that not only were wages being reduced and short time being adopted by most of their manufactories, but that their markets were glutted, and that the profits of many of their manufacturers amounted almost to nil. He should like to say a few words with reference to the state of agriculture, which, after all, was the oldest, the most important, and the most necessary of all our national industries. He did not hesitate to say that agriculture at this moment, although they had had a good harvest, was in quite as depressed a condition as it had been for several years past. The last good harvest they had in this country was in 1874. It was an average good harvest. They were not suffering very much at that time from cattle disease, and their competition from foreign agriculture was not quite so intense as it was at present. Last summer had been the best season they had known for many years. The ingathering of the harvest had been the best he could remember, and there was almost an immunity from cattle disease. But what they had to contend with was low prices and foreign competition; and the effect of those prices had been to cause agriculture to be more depressed at the present time than it had been during the nine consecutive years since 1874. He should place a few figures before the House in relation to this view. In 1874 wheat was 55*s.* a-quarter; in 1884 it was 32*s.* This meant a difference of 23*s.* a-quarter. Any practical agriculturist in the House would know that a fair average crop was about three-and-a-half quarters per acre, and, therefore, the loss as between 1874 and 1884 was £4 per acre. He reminded the House that the price of wheat in 1846, when the Corn Laws were abolished, was exactly the same as it was in 1874—namely, 55*s.*; and they were told at that time that there was no probability of their seeing wheat at a lower figure than 55*s.* [Cries of "No, no!"] That was stated at the time. How did the case stand with regard to barley? Barley in 1874 was 45*s.* a-quarter; in 1884 it was only 31*s.* 9*d.*, a difference of 13*s.* a-quarter. Was that the effect of the abolition of the Malt Tax? If so, he thought he might say that its abolition had been of no advantage to the agriculturists, or even to the poor man. Oats in 1874 were 28*s.* 10*d.*; in 1884 the price was 18*s.* 11*d.*, or a difference of 10*s.* a-quarter. He thought that anyone who had had any practical experience of agriculture must see that, under such circumstances, profit on the cultivation of cereals in this country was altogether hopeless. We in this country were heavily handicapped by rates and other burdens which were not paid in other countries. The soil and the climate of other countries were so much more favourable than ours that it was perfectly hopeless for the British agriculturist to compete with the foreign agriculturist. It was formerly said that freights were a protection of the agriculturist; but that protection was now gone, and the amount of freight was no element in the calculation. What was the future of stock? He thought they ought to be very thankful to the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) for the arduous efforts he had made in order to protect the cattle of stock-breeders from foreign disease; and he did not think that in this connection they ought to forget the other much-abused House of the Legislature. In 1878 the Conservative Government brought in a Cattle Protection (Disease) Bill. There were no more vehement opponents of that Bill than the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, the President of the Local Government Board, and one or two others, and he might say the bulk of the Liberal Party. That Bill contained almost precisely the same provisions as were embodied in the Act passed last year. He wanted to ask hon. and right hon. Gentlemen what would have been the difference to the agricultural interest if, during that interval of six years, they had had the same immunity from disease which they might have had by the Conservative Bill of 1878? How many hundreds of thousands of cattle had been sacrificed, their breeding and dairy qualities destroyed? How many hundreds of farmers had been reduced to bankruptcy and almost to beggary? The responsibility for those farmers who had failed owing to losses through cattle disease rested on the Liberal Government. He did not hesitate to say so. Cheap meat depended more on the healthy condition of the home stock than on the importation of live stock or dead meat. Store cattle at this time did not sell at the price it would have fetched last year, and yet the farmer had had to keep and feed it during the interval. What were the remedies suggested for this state of things? In the first place, they were told to convert the whole of their arable land into pasture land. That, however, was sooner said than done. The House must remember that this process was going on very rapidly. But it was really a very questionable benefit in a national point of view. He did not hesitate to say that one acre of arable land would produce far more for man and beast than an acre of pasture land. The House must also bear this in mind, that if they were going to convert all arable land into pasture, the question had to be faced as to whether they were to be entirely dependent on the foreigner for their daily bread. What was to become of the agricultural labourers, for whom hon. Gentlemen opposite manifested such a profound interest? If they looked at the Census of 1881, they would find that the agricultural labourers had been gradually diminishing in point of numbers. In the last 10 years the agricultural population had been reduced 10 or 12 per cent. If, therefore, they were going to convert arable land into pasture land, there would be less demand for the services of the agricultural labourer, and he must drift into the towns. He did not think that would be a happy result. Then with regard to the question of Protection. He had never advocated Protection; he had never attempted to deceive anyone that Protective duties would be adopted in this country; but he maintained that the Liberal Government had made no greater mistake than when they reduced the 1s. duty. That duty was paid by the foreigner. It was a registration duty, and the price of bread had not been increased the one-hundredth part of a farthing by it. What would have been the effect of the 1s. duty had it prevailed now? We imported last year 16,000,000 quarters of wheat and about 4,000,000 quarters of flour—20,000,000 quarters in all. The 1s. duty on that would have amounted to £1,000,000. In all cereals we introduced something like 37,000,000 quarters, including maize, oats, and barley. The 1s. duty on that amounted to £1,850,000. He asked any hon. Member whether it would not have been fair and just if that amount had been given in alleviation of exceptional burdens which the agricultural interest now bore? It would have cost the country nothing. The poor man would not have paid the one-hundredth part of a farthing more for his bread than he now did. It was true that he had advocated some readjustment of our local burdens. He did not for a moment suppose that any readjustment of local burdens would be a compensation to the agricultural interest for the distress it now suffered. It was, however, a matter of justice; that was the reason why he advocated it. They contended that when Protection was taken away from them another promise had been made that they would be relieved from the exceptional burdens which were imposed upon them, because they enjoyed certain privileges. Those privileges had been taken away, but the burdens had never been removed. They had peculiar claims on the Liberal Party, who had not only taken away Protection—of which he did not complain—but had imposed all those exceptional burdens on them, such as the police, the lunatics, the highways, sanitary matters, and last, but not least, education. It was true that the Conservative Government had given them some subventions; but the Education Rate had absorbed all those subventions. When the Education Act of 1870 was brought forward he had ventured to oppose it, because he said he did not believe in the limits which the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) and the Prime Minister indicated as those of the probable charge; and he had himself predicted that in 12 years' time it would amount to about £2,000,000. Well, the Education Rate was now £1,995,000.

MR. MUNDELLA asked how much of that sum was paid by the rural districts?

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, he was speaking of the whole amount for the urban and rural districts, and it was of the exceptional burdens on real property that he complained. The right hon. Gentleman had referred to the Royal Commission. Now, that Commission, which was not a Party one, alluding to the repeal of the Corn Laws, stated that the pressure of foreign competition had far exceeded the apprehensions of those who were in favour of the Corn Laws and the expectations of those who had opposed them. That was a valuable admission. Why, he asked, had the Government not considered the recommendations of the Royal Commission? One of those recommendations was that the cost of the indoor poor, including the lunatics and the district schools, should be transferred from the ratepayers to the Consolidated Fund; another was that certain local licences should be given to the local authorities in alleviation of local burdens. Why had the Government ignored those recommendations? Some time ago, a Resolution was carried in that House in respect to a Minister of Commerce and Agriculture. And what had the Government done? They had appointed a Committee of five or six persons. He never believed in a Committee; it was like a Corporation, it had no responsibility. They were told that the Lord President answered for Agriculture in the other House, and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in that House. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster seemed to have "flitted," and to have gone to a serener atmosphere, and they were told that his place was to be taken by a right hon. Gentleman than whom no one more deserved promotion. But what did his right hon. Friend know of practical agriculture? Surely, they ought to have a Minister with some experience of agriculture. The only alteration that had been made was that they had scratched out the word "veterinary" and put "agricultural" on the door, and they had altered the colour of agricultural statistics from blue to buff. He believed they had got another clerk, but what he did nobody could find out. He would refer to the case of butter. With that article, butterine, oleomargarine, and half-a-dozen other odious compounds came into competition. Surely, the Department of Agriculture ought to see that those compounds should not be sold in this country, at least unless they were clearly designated, and their true character was made perfectly plain to all, so that they should not come into competition with genuine home produce. In New York it was made penal to manufacture oleomargarine, and it was sent over here. He did not see why it should not be made equally penal for anybody to make those compounds here, or, at all events, if they did they should be required to designate them. The want of union and unanimity was the bane of the agricultural interest. They were as sheep without a shepherd, and their opponents, who knew it, sowed dissension among them on the principle divide et impera. There was no interest in this country of a tenth part of the importance or with a tithe of the grievances of agriculture which would not have more influence. And why was that? Because other interests could combine and agitate, and because, unfortunately, no concession was obtained except by means of agitation. The admittedly just demands of the agricultural interest had been continually shunted and shelved and indefinitely postponed. The promises and pledges made to them had been broken or remained unfulfilled. What they complained of was, not only that the Government had refused relief to them, but that they had, in defiance and in spite of what had been done in that House, totally disregarded the deliberate judgment of Parliament. Knowing that agriculture had now for a long period of years been seriously depressed, the Government, during the whole time they had been in Office, had denied them a word of sympathy or of condolence, and they had ignored an industry which, he believed, was the foundation of this country's greatness, and which he hoped might long continue to be its chief mainstay.

MR. DUCKHAM said, he had been very interested by the able speeches which had been delivered that evening, and he felt, like every other speaker who had addressed the House, a difficulty in pointing out a remedy for the very serious depression under which both agriculture and trade alike suffered. The inquiry which the Royal Commission on Agriculture held was most exhaustive, extending over three years. The voluminous Report of that Commission had been long in their hands; but he failed to see that any part of that Report pointed to a return to Protective duties. As a matter of fact, the people of the country would never submit to have their food again taxed for the advantage of the owner of the soil, and so long as that was the case, agriculturists could never submit to the taxation of imported manufactured articles. The imposition of Protective duties on imported manufactured articles would simply cause a rise in the price of manufactured articles to the agriculturists and others, while agriculturists, with the produce of the soil, would have to compete with all the world. Therefore, to look to Protective duties as a means of redress for the present state of things, was illusory. It was well known that when Lord John Russell introduced the Bill for the repeal of the Corn Laws, the noble Lord said that a readjustment of local taxation must take place. That readjustment, however, had never taken place; but, on the contrary, imposition after imposition had been heaped upon real property. At the time of the repeal of the Corn Laws, and for five successive years, there was a severe depression experienced. The depression was as severe then—possibly more severe—than it was now. He, for instance, sold wheat at that time at 4*s.* 8*d.* a-bushel. It was quite true that was not so low a price as the present; but then good fat wethers were sold at 4½*d.* per lb. These prices were ruinous to the producer, and he only mentioned them to show the severe depression under which agriculture laboured in 1849-50-1-2-3. At the outbreak of the Crimean War, the price of wheat went up from 5*s.* to 11*s.* a-bushel, and that brought about a very severe competition for farms, a competition which was fostered under the cruel and arbitrary Law of Distress—a law, thank God! now very materially altered. After the Crimean War, came the American Civil War, then the Franco-Prussian War, and then the Russo-Turkish War, all of which wars tended to buoy up the price of agricultural produce. The effect of the advent of the Franco-Prussian War, particularly, was that the trade of the country rose by leaps and bounds; wages rose, every kind of expense for the occupier of the soil as well as for the manufacturer rose, and now it was that we were beginning to experience the evils of the errors which were fostered at the time of the wars he had mentioned; the prices of agricultural produce increased so largely that people were induced to take land at ruinous rents. Again, the agriculture of the United States had not then been developed; it was now, however, being developed to a remarkable extent. At the time of the repeal of the Corn Laws, no one ever dreamt of the monster vessels which were now trading between the United States and England, bringing corn to this country as ballast, sometimes even paying for it to be put in their holds, thus conveying it across the ocean for less than nothing. Furthermore, for nearly half-a-century, the agriculturists of the country had had to fight against severe losses in their flocks and herds. Those losses entrenched upon capital, and many men were ruined. When the Cattle Diseases Bill was before the House last Session, he urged the necessity of the measure being passed, and he was thankful to say that the result of the adoption of that Bill was that the flocks and herds in Great Britain and Ireland were now healthy. The importation of meat was greatly diminishing, a fact which ought to be satisfactory to all those who were possessed of the idea that foot-and-mouth disease was indigenous to the soil of the country, that the disease had become acclimatized, and that no effort of the Legislature could free the country from the disease, or guard against its importation. Only that day he was informed, at the Agricultural Department, that not a single case of foot-and-mouth disease had been landed in Great Britain since the passing of the Act; but he had just been told that that state of things was not the consequence of legislation. He, however, maintained that it was the consequence of legislation. He did not mean to say that there had been any absolute interference. There was no necessity for any interference. All that the Agricultural Department of this country had done was to send to foreign countries, warning them that if they sent any animals here suffering from foot-and-mouth disease their importation would be prohibited. It was that warning which had had such a salutary effect. Our trade was now free, we had meat cheaper, and our importations were less by £1,500,000 sterling in the first nine months of the year compared with the corresponding nine months of last year. It had been said by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Preston (Mr. Eeroyd) that this country should endeavour to send more rails to India, so that that great country could be opened up and its products brought to us. Why, in point of fact, it was the importation of Indian wheat that was now lowering the price of wheat in this country, so that we could not possibly compete with it. It was even driving the United States out of the market, and the more India was opened up the more severely should we feel the effect in the price of our bread corn. It was said by the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) that the harvest this year had been the best in respect to the yield of corn that had been known for many years. The hon. Baronet's experience was very different to his (Mr. Duckham's), or that of anyone connected with agriculture with whom he was acquainted. He (Mr. Duckham) wished the fact was as stated. The hon. Baronet also made a rather marked allusion to some efforts of his (Mr. Duckham's) upon the occasion of the Division which took place two years ago upon the Motion with regard to Local Taxation which was made by the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell). He (Mr. Duckham) voted against the hon. Member for South Leicestershire, because the Government promised relief of local taxation, coupled with the establishment of County Government Boards. He had been an advocate for County Government Boards for many years, and, in the belief that they would have the two measures combined, he supported the Government as against the hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Pell's) Motion. It had been said that the Liberal Government had done nothing for agriculturists. He had known some little of the world for many years, and for the last half-century he had paid some attention to political affairs, and he maintained that the present Government had done more for the agriculturists than had been done for them during his lifetime. Take, for example, the repeal of the Malt Tax. ["Oh, oh!"] Yes; hon. Members opposite might cry "Oh, oh!" but he could remember working with them in favour of the repeal of the Malt Tax. He joined deputation after deputation to the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister to urge the advisability of the repeal of the tax; indeed, for very many years the Malt Tax was used by the Conservative Party as a war cry; and now, as soon as the Act was passed, it was jeered at and laughed at, and it was said to be nothing at all in favour, but rather against, agriculturists. As a matter of fact, the repeal of the tax had not done the amount of injury to the farmers some people asserted it had. Owing, however, to the altered habits of the people, there was not the same amount of beer drank as formerly. The harvests had not been as good as formerly, and the same quality of barley had not been grown. Those who happened to grow a fine quality of barley could command a high price. Following the repeal of the Malt Tax there was the Ground Game Act. How many hundreds of farmers had been ruined through the devastation of their crops by ground game? He maintained that the Act which gave to the tenant the right, the inalienable right, to the ground game, which so destroyed his crops, was one of the finest measures which ever passed through the House of Commons in favour of the occupier of the soil. Following the Ground Game Act, they had the Corn Averages for regulating the payment of tithes. That measure was greatly wanted; before, all was chaos and confusion. Up to that period the tithe averages were regulated by the Imperial bushel; but almost every market in the Kingdom had its own conception of a bushel. As regarded weight—wheat, in some markets, was sold at 60, others at 62, and others at 80 lbs.; but now there was a standard weight for wheat, barley, and oats, so that, if the Excise did their duty, there could be no mistake in the regulation of tithe payments. Again, there was the subvention of 25 per cent towards the maintainance of the main roads, which proved a great boon to agriculturists. They were told that the subventions that were given by the late Government were all that were given for the relief of local taxation; but the subvention of 25 per cent in respect to the main roads was something substantial. Then, Sir, the late Government passed a measure giving compensation for agricultural improvements; but it was a permissive Act, and, therefore, was barred on all sides. The Agricultural Holdings Amendment Act, passed by the present Government, was compulsory, and no matter what capital a man laid out on his farm with discretion, he was sure to receive compensation for it. Then the Law of Distress was one of the most cruel and arbitrary laws that ever existed in the country. The Law of Distress was no longer such an oppressive measure as it formerly was. It always appeared to him arbitrary in the extreme to give power to the landlord to seize agisted stock, and sell stock belonging to another person for rent due from the tenant. Again, the landlord could not now distrain for the full amount of rent due without first deducting the just claim of the tenant for improvements effected upon the holding. Much had been said about the Minister of Agriculture. He should certainly like to see the Agricultural Department made more complete. An interest of such magnitude ought to have a Head with a proper title; but he supposed that, like other things, the appointment was a work of time. The success of the Cattle Diseases Act was due to the manner in which the Agricultural Department had acted since the passing of the measure; and too much praise could not be given to Earl Spencer, as the Head of the Department in Ireland and the Heads of the Department in England, for freeing the country from disease, and for maintaining the health of our flocks and herds. In conclusion, he would express the opinion that no good could arise from the adoption of the Amendment now before the House. That Amendment had, no doubt, provoked a very interesting discussion; but its adoption could have no good result, especially when the House could do nothing more than had been done to meet the depression which existed. It was now a matter between landlord and tenant, beyond the necessity of that substantial relief which had been promised to be given to the local burdens, and he trusted that such relief might be given at no distant date.

MR. MARUM said, that he felt bound to support, upon behalf of the Irish Parliamentary Party, the Amendment of the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver) in the following form:—As an Amendment to the Address, to add—

“But we humbly direct Her Majesty’s attention to the depressed condition of commerce and agriculture, and regret that Her Majesty’s gracious Speech contains no reference to a subject of such paramount importance.

He would first refer to the depression of agriculture in Ireland, as they were almost entirely an agricultural community, with but little trade save in Ulster. He held in his hand the official statistics, which certainly presented a lamentable picture of our home husbandry.

GENERAL SUMMARY OF CEREALS, GREEN CROPS, &c.

	1883. Acres.	1884. Acres.	Increase in 1884. Acres.	Decrease in 1884. Acres.
Cereal Crops ..	1,678,691	1,599,629	—	79,062
Green Crops ..	1,230,283	1,221,413	—	8,870
Flax ..	96,943	89,197	—	6,746
Total under tillage ..	3,004,917	2,910,239	—	94,678

Now, statistics of agriculture showed that the continuing decrease of the number of acres under tillage had been going on for a good many years, and between this and last year the decrease had amounted to no less than 94,678 acres. In 1846, the beginning of the Free Trade period, of the entire surface of Ireland there were 9,000,000 out of 15,000,000 acres under a rotation system of farming; now that rotation system was reduced to about 4,500,000; so that they had declined in this regard some 50 per cent, to say nothing of the reduction of the population. This would be all very well if the land so changed in its aspect were suitable for the change; but there was, unfortunately, now a quantity of land suitable for arable purposes, but not suitable for grass, and, in point of fact, at present quite unproductive. As to the condition of tillage, he quoted the language of a high authority on the subject to the effect that not since "Black 1847" had the prospects of the Irish farmers looked so gloomy as at the present time—as the year which, for agricultural purposes, might be said to have closed, was one of the most disastrous on record. Its dire effects had not yet made themselves felt; but, given a hard winter to cap the climax, and then it would be seen that stock would be in a state of semi-starvation, and the small farmers and the agricultural labourers of the country in no better plight. Of wheat there was very little sown; and, since the unfavourable accounts they heard of the price, it would affect but very few; and the same remark applied to barley, which was more than an average crop where sown, but, as its cultivation was utterly ignored, save in a few districts, the fact of its being good or bad would not affect the common weal. The oat crop had been fearfully short in most places, both as regarded corn and straw. Even on the fine plains of Tipperary the oat crop was never worse since 1826; but even that was easily accounted for, as the limestone substratum absorbed the heat to such a degree that vegetation utterly collapsed, and it was a moot point in most districts whether one single barrel of corn would be available for market, if the farmers were only to keep what would support themselves and their families until next harvest. Of the root crops, mangolds and turnips might be written down as a complete failure, particularly the latter, the average of which would not exceed six tons per acre. Potatoes were a fair crop in many districts, and were, as a rule, free from disease, while their table qualities were never better. In quantity they were far below the average of the previous four years; but their immunity from disease counterbalanced that drawback, and they were now nearly all dug out, and stored and pitted dry, which was a great desideratum. Pigs carried a poor price throughout the entire summer months, never once touching £3 per cwt, while most of the time 10s. per cwt. less was about their figure, and now the quotation was only 4s. The hay crop was a very poor one, and hence it was fetching a high price now; and, given a few hard, winterish days, there was every prospect of its going up to a much higher figure. Then, as to the condition as to stock, he would remind the House that in the 1846 period the cattle in Ireland, when there were 6,000,000 acres of pasture, amounted to a fluctuating quantity, averaging about 2,500,000, of black cattle; the sheep numbered from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000, at which latter figure they stood in 1863; and horses about 500,000. Now, in 1884, with 11,000,000 acres in grass, there were 4,000,000 of cattle, 3,243,000 sheep, and about the same number of horses as before; so there was very little more stock on 11,000,000 acres than there were in 1846 on 6,000,000 acres. That was a very alarming fact. But it would be said—Let man and scientific industry disappear; let the country merge into a purely pastoral condition. He would not here discuss the matter on the mere ground of the loss of wealth and population to the State itself; but he would appeal to the self-interest of the Irish land classes themselves. About 35 years ago, at the Free Trade epoch, on their 15,000,000 of acres of cultivable land of the Island—they had over 8,000,000 of inhabitants, with 9,000,000 acres under a rotation system of scientific husbandry. They now had under 5,000,000 acres under such husbandry, with some 5,000,000 likewise of inhabitants. Were the reduced number better off now than the larger number had been? Secondly, what was "covering" the 4,000,000 acres now let down into permanent pasturage since 1846? In 1868 they touched the highest figure of sheep—just 5,000,000. In 1883 they were just above 3,000,000 of sheep. They were stationary at about 4,000,000 of cattle. Such appeared their maximum production. Other live stock was in sympathy with these data. When the rainy seasons, which culminated in 1879, set in, the farmers were very hard hit; but then one section at least of them escaped altogether. Those were the graziers; but that section of the farming community had been the hardest hit of any this time, as cattle were worth a trifle less now than they cost in the spring months; and, with a lot of their cattle still on hand, a hay famine, or nearly equivalent to it, in the country, the outlook of the graziers was anything but an enviable one. Those whose main dependence was on sheep were no better off than their beef-raising neighbours, as the sheep, too, had been fearfully depreciated in value, in many cases fully 33 per cent under former years' quotations. Good butter was sold in 1879 at 80s. per cwt. During the past summer it was not quite so low; but the "make" was fully a fourth below that of the year above. named. Now, the question arose, had any remedies been proposed by the Government? So far from that being so, he regretted to say that no single step appeared to be contemplated in that direction. About three years ago mention was made in the Queen's Speech of the agricultural depression; since then the question seemed completely to have dropped out of the Royal mind. He, like the preceding speaker, did not ask for Protectionism, though he observed that at the Cobden Club one speaker maintained that if we had Free Trade in one thing we ought to have it in all, and, therefore, in land. Let them have universal Free Trade or Protectionism. They had Free Trade now with a vengeance as to the products of land; let them have the Law of Primogeniture and Entail repealed, and all costs of transfer of land abolished, so that land itself could pass in small quantities, and as free as its products from hand to hand. He had little faith in the Government principles of partial Free Trade, whilst feudal restrictions kept the land out of the hands of the people, and amongst a privileged class alone. What he professed was that Free Trade principles should be fairly tested; but he by no means admitted that obliterating the land classes would be beneficial to Nationality or Imperialism, or that reducing the population of the United Kingdom to the level of mere "Cosmopolitans" would tend to the stability or maintenance of the British Empire. On the contrary, the Free Trade principle tended to teach the population that, provided a man grubbed and vegetated well, it was immaterial under what flag the land of his habitation flourished. The land classes were the kernel and bulwark of the individuality of nations. Under agriculture nations rose and commerce beheld their decline and fall in the history of mankind. So early as 1636, Lord Stafford made a Report to the King and Council, in which he expressed his fears that—

"They (the Irish) might beat us out of the trade, by underselling, which they were able to do."

In 1672, Sir William Temple, writing to the then Lord Lieutenant, says—

"Regard must be had to those points wherein the trade of Ireland comes to interfere with any main branch of the trade of England, in which case the encouragement of said trade ought to be declined, or moderated, and so give way to the trade of England."

And in 1698, in reply to an appeal from the English Parliament, William III. stated—"I will do all in my power to discourage the woollen manufactures of Ireland;" and he kept his word. In the Reign of Queen Anne an Act was passed allowing Irish manufactured goods to the West Indies, provided they were sent in English ships, subject to duty. Again, in the Reign of George I. Acts were passed "for the more effectual suppression of the woollen manufactures of Ireland," and so on till the Volunteers of Dungannon inscribed on their cannon, "Free Trade or else——" He (Mr. Marum) contended that some compensatory equivalent was due from this country to Ireland. They must now look at these things in the light of past experience, and give up dreaming of a state of things continually promised and never realized. They were told, on the one hand, that their manufacturers experienced difficulty in meeting foreign competition; and, on the other hand, that the imposition of a duty on foreign goods would weaken their own competition with those foreign rivals. Those propositions were contradictory, and mutually destructive. The foreign rivals whose goods displaced their own belonged to protected nations, and worked under import duties. Therefore, if the imposition of protective duties incapacitated and disqualified manufacturers of foreign competition, how was it that French and German textile and iron manufacturers were successfully invading this free market? They were suffering not only from positive bounties given, but also from protective duties imposed. If 30 per cent were levied in Germany upon imported woollen goods, the manufacturer there had created for him a profitable internal market, and the trade there furnished him with resources to invade the free market of England, and to undersell those who were working under Free Trade. Thus, foreign manufacturers were enabled to dispose of goods for which they would otherwise have difficulty in finding a market. Hon. Gentlemen were anxious to prevent undue competition within this country; but how long were we to be subject to unrestricted competition outside the country? The low prices of imports benefited, to a small degree even, our artisans in their capacity of consumers. But we paid a high price for this in the depression of rents and profits, and there was going on a depression of wages also. In every centre of industry the consequences of this unlimited competition were being felt, while a small class of persons were making enormous incomes by foreign investments. There was no part of the United Kingdom upon which this grossly unfair system had produced more unfortunate results than Ireland, which depended so largely upon home productions. So much as to commerce. Now, as to home agriculture, the Richmond Commission, which made a very exhaustive inquiry, recommended certain remedies, not one of which had been applied. They reported that bad seasons and foreign competition were the two great causes of the agricultural depression. With regard to bad seasons, the hon. Member for the City of Dublin (Dr. Lyons) had made proposals for planting trees, which, if adopted, would have the effect of checking the effects of rainfall, and benefiting the climate and increasing the productive power of the country; and Irish Members had pressed for arterial drainage, which also would have a very considerable effect on the soil and climate of Ireland; but in neither case was anything done. And as to foreign competition, when the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) carried Motions in two different years for the relief of local burdens, nothing was done. The gross valuation of Ireland was £10,600,000, and her local taxation was £3,500,000, or about 33 per cent. That was on the nominal value; but local taxation in Ireland was about 50 per cent of the actual or marketable value at this moment. The shifting of some of the local burdens by the re-adjustment of local taxation was one of the recommendations of the Richmond Commission; but it was entirely ignored; and how was it that a Motion on the subject twice carried in successive years in the House was also entirely ignored in a Constitutional country? Now, that Commission, which was not a Party one, alluding to the repeal of the Corn Laws, stated that the pressure of foreign competition had far exceeded the apprehensions of those who were in favour of the Corn Laws, and the expectation of those who had opposed them. That was a valuable admission. Why, he asked, had the Government not considered the recommendations of the Royal Commission? One of those recommendations was that there should be a transference, under the Poor Law, of the indoor poor relief, including the lunatics and the district schools; another was, that certain local licences should be given to the local authorities in alleviation of local burdens. Why had the Government ignored those recommendations? Some time ago a Resolution was carried in that House in respect to a Minister of Commerce and Agriculture. And what had the Government done? They had appointed a Committee of five or six persons. In Ireland they had lost within 30 years a population equal to that of one European State—Switzerland—nearly over 3,000,000 of the pick and flower of the people, who went to enrich and develop the resources of every country but their own. The loss of that industrious population left their inland towns falling into decay; it took away so much local demand from their local shopkeepers and traders. The shops of the South of Ireland were empty of customers by the depopulation of the country, the resources of which were but half developed. And the Government, instead of trying to keep the instruments of labour at home, and furnish customers for their shops, were anxious and ready to grant £1,000,000 sterling to promote further emigration. Take the county he had the honour to represent—Kilkenny. At one period the population was 202,000 souls; it was now under 99,000 odd. Shopkeepers now had but one-half of their former customers, instead of having the number doubled, as would be the case if the Government of any other country of the globe, not to speak of ourselves, was ruling our destinies. What was the valuation of the population lost? Why, they had emigrated at the rate of 100,000 for 30 years past.

The slave was sold for £80 to £100—nay, the bounty paid during the American Civil War ranged from £80 to £150. Viewed as industrial elements at £100 per head, they had suffered a drain of £10,000,000 sterling per annum during that period, which, if capitalized, would represent one-third of the National Debt. Trade in Ireland was paralyzed; instead of the Government taking hold of their railways to counteract the effect of foreign competition by low internal rates, it allowed the population of this impoverished country to be fleeced by high charges, to the destruction of home commerce and agriculture. He would give the tables. As regards the passenger traffic the following facts and calculations appeared—

	Number of Passengers.	Journeys per head of Population.	Receipts per Passenger
England ..	612,972,444	23	8½d.
Scotland ..	52,069,451	13·6	11d.
Ireland ..	19,308,292	3·8	16d.

Here, again, Ireland presented a bad appearance—on paper. It would thus appear that, as far as passenger traffic was concerned, railway facilities were utilized in England nearly twice as much as in Scotland, and seven times as much as in Ireland. But the Richmond Commission recommended a very considerable re-adjustment of railway rates as well as other rates, now that America was brought absolutely as a town park within reach of the great English centres of population; but nothing had been done. Ireland was a purely agricultural country, and should be legislated for on agricultural principles, and not from a simply commercial point of view. Its economic interests were, to a great extent, antagonistic to those of England. But when that and like considerations were put forward, the House should not imagine that Irish Members were altogether absorbed in a mere hostile separation idea. He, for one, maintained that unless they had an opportunity of legislating from an agricultural standpoint, and as long as they were legislated for from a purely commercial point of view, they could have little hope of prosperity. If the principles of Irish Government were not altered, Irishmen naturally desired to alter the governing power itself.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH: The discussion which has taken place has had the effect of eliciting a very interesting speech from the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Eecroyd), and also one from the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council (Mr. Mundella). I think it is highly desirable that the question of the depression of trade should occupy the attention of the House for at least one evening, when it is remembered how much suffering there is in all our large commercial communities, and how natural it is that people who are out of work and starving should think that Parliament ought to consider this sad state of affairs, and devise the best remedies possible. I will go so far as to say that the proceedings of this evening will be read with much greater interest by the great mass of the people than even the exciting proceedings of the night before, and I think it is a far more legitimate thing to expend time upon. As to the depression from which we are suffering, I may speak, as representing one of the largest commercial communities in the country, with some degree of personal cognizance of the facts; and I am sorry to state that in the great community of Liverpool we have scarcely ever before experienced so severe a crisis as that through which we are at the present time passing. I have known of more acute crises lasting for a few months; but the present depression is not of that kind. It is a dull, weary, dragging period of bad trade, affecting specially the shipping interest, and also every trade in which the community is engaged. We have, indeed, been passing through a very stagnant state of trade in England for many years past, and the serious nature of the crisis arises from the fact that it has been more or less prolonged for a period of 10 years. I think I am within the mark when I say that the great manufacturing trades of the country have, with little exception, had bad times for 10 years past. The great cotton trade of Lancashire, of which I have had some experience, is certainly enjoying but little of its former prosperity. There have been long periods of depression when the bulk of the manufacturers have not been covering cost. It is vain to ignore the fact that the prosperity of the country has received a very severe check during the last decade, such as has not been known since the introduction of Free Trade. That great buoyancy which distinguished British trade for the 20 years that followed the repeal of the Corn Laws has entirely disappeared, and the profits of all classes of manufacturing and commercial adventure have been almost nil for some time. I have made a rough calculation as to the average profits on manufacturing business during the past 10 years, and I question whether all the manufacturing and mining industries throughout England have yielded more than 2 or 3 per cent per annum on an average. During that time several concerns have had to live without paying any dividend to the shareholders at all. This is a serious state of affairs, and one that ought to engage the attention of the House. Personally, I do not feel so much interested in it from the side of the capitalist as from that of the labourer. The labouring class of this country is at present suffering very severely, and in all the great centres of population large masses of people are unemployed in whole or part. A friend of mine told me only the other day that recently he visited one of the large schools in the East of London, and that he was informed 400 children came to that school without breakfast, their parents being out of work. Further, I was told that on the public wharves of London four times as many men sought for employment as were able to get it. This is a state of things too common throughout the country. There are, however, brighter sides to the picture. Thus the woollen trade has at last, after long depression, taken a start. I think, too, I see some signs of improvement in the cotton trade, and I am told some of the minor industries are beginning to look more cheerful. But the fact has to be faced, that this great commercial country, which for years made such wonderful progress by leaps and bounds—as the Prime Minister in one of his speeches described it—has for some years past shown a tendency towards retrogression. There are, no doubt, many causes for this that lie upon the surface—one of the principal is, that we have lost that unique supremacy which we had for so many years. The Great Napoleonic Wars gave great advantages to this country. We were the first to introduce steam machinery, and, up to 30 years ago, had almost a monopoly of the great trades of the world; but the Continental nations, and especially the Germans, through their devotion to scientific education, their industry, and their admirable technical schools, have come quite abreast of us, and anyone who reads the valuable Report of the Technical Commission will see that all the apparatus of industry on the Continent is equal to our own. We have also to admit the fact that the Free Trade policy of this country has not been imitated by the rest of the world. Nearly all the great civilized nations have clung most pertinaciously to the system of Protection, and many of them have even gone backwards by raising their tariffs. The general condition of British trade now may be said to be this. That we have only the control of the neutral markets—India, China, and the Colonies, and the less advanced States of the world, such as the South American ones. But as to the great civilized countries—the United States, France, and Germany—we have less trade with them than we had at an earlier period. In fact, we have much less command of their market than we had 20 years ago. Now, as to the remedy for that state of things; I have listened with much interest to my hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Ercroft), and have before had occasion to read with attention some of his pamphlets and speeches on this subject. I think, though I cannot agree with him in his views, that the country is indebted to him for the very original manner in which he brings under discussion fresh views, to some extent, upon our commercial relations compared to those which existed before. I will go to this extent with him—that if it were possible to bring about reciprocal Free Trade in a statesmanlike and practical manner, there is a great deal to be said for it. ["Hear, hear!"] No person not blinded by prejudice can deny that reciprocal Free Trade is better than one-sided Free Trade. [Conservative cheers.] I am afraid, however, I shall not receive the same amount of applause when I proceed a little further. After carefully considering the solution, I am not able to see that there has been any practicable scheme put forward. The fact is, the position of our country, speaking broadly, is that of a large importer of the first necessities of life. Nearly half our population live by foreign food. Nearly half the raw materials of our trade are produced by foreign labour, and it is of the utmost importance to us to have cheap food and cheap raw materials. It is not possible to tax such articles without injuring ourselves far more than we injure those against whom the tax is directed. On the other hand, this country is the largest exporter of common articles of manufacture. We are excelled by some foreign countries in articles of taste; but it is vital to us to be the cheapest producer of the coarser manufactures. The only condition on which we can hold our predominant position is that we are the cheapest producers. Therefore, as respects the largest part of our trade, it is not possible for us to go in for a system of restriction or Protection; but I cannot see the strong objection which the right hon. Gentleman below me (Mr. Mundella) has to taxes on imported articles of luxury. I consider this to be a fairly debatable question; and I think that with such articles as, say, silks, articles of taste and vertu, brandies, wines, and other such articles, fiscal considerations should prevail, and I will not admit that the cry of danger to Free Trade should hinder us from placing a duty on articles consumed, or almost entirely consumed, by the richer classes. However, the relief we should thus obtain would go but a very small way in the direction my hon. Friend wishes. His views are much wider. His object is to band together all parts of the Empire into something like a Zollverein, in which exchange shall take place among 300,000,000 of people, exclusive of the outside world. There is no one who has advocated this so ably as my hon. Friend. I may, perhaps, concede this much—that if it had been practicable we might have tried it with advantage 50 years ago. If we could have foreseen our treatment by the rest of the world, and even by our own Colonies, some of whom have treated the Mother Country more like a stepmother, it might have been a very reasonable thing that it should have been made a condition that there should be absolute Free Trade between all parts of the British Empire, and that we would not undertake the protection of the Colonies on any other condition. It might have been a reasonable thing that we assured certain advantages to our Colonies on condition that they adopted this principle; and had we done so, we should be doing a much larger trade with our Colonies than we now are; and it is not altogether impossible that by the leverage thereby afforded we might, to some extent, have broken down the restrictive tariff of the United States. But, in my judgment, the time has passed away for statesmen to undertake such an immensely difficult task. Our Colonies, which were then young, have grown to man's estate. Colonies like Canada and Australia would resent any attempt to impose upon them compulsory Free Trade. A large part of our population is fed by imports from the United States, and depends upon that supply almost for existence, and it is a sheer impossibility to shut out such a supply. These are my general views as regards what is called Reciprocity; but I do not look upon the scheme as so utterly absurd as some do. I do not believe in Free Trade as a sort of "Fetish," as some do. I believe that Free Trade, like all economic doctrines, is limited and qualified by practical considerations; and I have never felt disposed to regard the United States or our Colonies as so utterly devoid of common sense in adopting the system they act upon as most of our economists do. Free Trade must be founded on practical, as well as theoretical, considerations; but, looking at this subject practically, I am not able to see how we possess in this country the leverage to bring about, to any extent, reciprocal Free Trade. We have to face the fact that the economical position of this country is determined for us by inexorable laws we cannot overleap. We are a small Island with a dense population—with the exception of two or three small countries, the densest population on the face of the globe. We draw half the food of this population from abroad, and I am sorry to think the amount of food produced at home is diminishing. We are growing less in the aggregate than we were 20 years ago. It comes to this, therefore—that the growing population of the country must be fed increasingly with foreign food. At the present time nearly half the population are so fed, and in the not distant future three-fourths must be so fed. These are facts that govern us, and we cannot, as far as I can see, alter them by legislative means; but I will glance at one point of great importance, though it is slightly aside from the main subject of this debate. I do believe that in this country there is one great leak which drains a large amount of the wealth of England. We spend in this country, in spite of the spread of the temperance movement, which we all hail with satisfaction, £125,000,000 sterling a-year in strong drink; and I shall carry the general opinion of the House with me when I say a great part of this, at least, is mere waste—as much waste as if it were poured into the Thames. It involves, further, a great waste of the labour power of the country, and adds heavily to our burden of pauperism and crime. My belief is that it is quite within the power of legislation, and opinion out-of-doors would support such legislation, to place such restrictions on this traffic as would save for the country one-third of the amount I have mentioned—say, including indirect losses, £50,000,000 sterling.

The main elements of our national position may be described briefly as follows:—We have a decreasing production of food at home; a trade nearly stationary; at all events, a non-elastic trade. We exported £240,000,000 last year, and 12 years ago £250,000,000. It is quite true the fall in prices, to some extent, accounts for this. [Mr. MUNDILLA: Much more.] Nevertheless, the trade of the country is very stagnant; profits are extremely small; and a very considerable portion of our population have the greatest difficulty to exist. Another point is that with this decrease of the means of living, as I may call it, we have a most rapidly increasing population. The House may be surprised to hear that in the last 10 years we have added to our population in this Island as many people as in the 600 years following the Norman Conquest. Unless Members have studied the question, they will be surprised at the leaps and bounds by which the population of Great Britain has increased—not including Ireland—it has risen from 10,500,000 to 31,000,000 in 1884, and by the end of the century it will nearly reach 40,000,000—that is to say, within the century we have nearly quadrupled the population of this Island. We have to face the fact that about half have to be fed by foreign food, and the time is near when they will principally depend on that source. Now, I confess to me this opens a prospect anything but cheering. It is fraught with serious—indeed, with anxious considerations for both philanthropists and statesmen, and I think this question ought to be faced and discussed far more fully than it has been. We should not wait until we have to struggle for existence with revolution or desperate Communism. We have a large margin of our labouring class in a semi-starving condition, and that margin is increasing. We shall be deceived if we look to the statistics of pauperism. Pauperism appears to decrease, because we are applying more rigorously the workhouse test; but outside the workhouse there is an enormous mass of miserable, half-fed, half-starved, destitute people. I can speak of my own constituency, and I believe I am within the mark in saying that there are 20,000 dock labourers there who for several years past have not had more than three days' work in the week as a rule, and whose average earnings have not been more than 15s. a-week. I am told that the case is worse in London, and in all our large towns there is the same miserable state of things. This element among our population will increase, and the pressure of existence will become greater. How can you relieve it. I have pointed out one direction where you might find a great deal of relief. Sobriety of habits will afford much benefit for a time; but it will not permanently tide over the difficulty. We have to face a growing mass of people in this country who never under any circumstances can be maintained in comfort; and for practical relief we must turn to that Greater Britain, 60 times the extent of Great Britain, where the people are now one or two to the square mile, while here we have 450 (in England and Wales) to the square mile. It is just, it is necessary, it is right that our surplus population should find a home in this Greater Britain. If the county of Kent had a population 100 times as dense as the rest of the Kingdom, should we not see the absurdity of perpetuating such a congestion of population? So it is in England, as compared with the Colonies. I am told that Manitoba alone could grow food for the whole population of Europe. I could dilate upon this, and travel far beyond the limits of this debate; but I hope at a future time I may be allowed to go more fully into this social question, which I have studied closely for 20 years. I have been in the closest contact with the suffering classes. We have a section of the population unskilled, intemperate, and incapable of earning a decent livelihood, and useless for emigration, because they have learned nothing of value in their youth. I am driven step by step to the conclusion that we shall never get rid of this helpless mass of semi-pauperism until we undertake the training of the young in a more thorough manner—until we give the children of this miserable class an industrial training which will fit them for earning a living in the Colonies if they cannot get it at home. I will not proceed further, inviting as the subject is. I am obliged to the House for having given me the opportunity of expressing some of the thoughts and feelings which lie deep in my breast. The subject is a grave and serious one, and I am thankful that the House has had this opportunity of discussing it in its various bearings; and I am sure the people of this country will be grateful to the House for taking this subject into its earnest consideration.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, he thought the House was greatly indebted to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver) for introducing this question to the House, and also to his hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Eeroyd) and the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Mundella) for their most interesting speeches. He had also listened with great interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. S. Smith), who possessed so special a knowledge of the subject of trade. This question was too grave a one for Party politics. Both sides of the House should look at it as part of a great and important whole, and endeavour by every means in their power to solve the difficult problem. If, some years ago, they had formed that Zollverein which the hon. Member had mentioned, no doubt it would have been an exceedingly good thing; but it was not too late even now to do something of that kind. If we found arms and muscles for our Colonies, why should we not make some stipulations in favour of our trade? All the speakers had shown how wrapped up in one another were the interests of agriculture, trade, and commerce. When agriculture prospered, trade and commerce prospered, and it was but natural when people had money in their pockets they would spend it, and no one could spend his money more profitably than in his own country. He was sorry that nothing was said in the Queen's Speech about the depressed condition of agriculture, especially when they remembered that in the Speech dismissing them for the Recess Her Majesty said—

"I acknowledge with thankfulness the favourable season, and the prospect it affords of an alleviation of the pressure which has so long and so severely affected the agricultural industry of the country."

A word of commiseration at this time would have gone far to show that Her Majesty's Ministers were alive to the present condition of agriculture and trade, notwithstanding the magnificent harvest weather we had had, and for which, indeed, we were most deeply grateful. Let them look for one moment at the present condition of the agricultural industry and at the present price of wheat, and he would venture to say that no one could assert that wheat could be grown at a profit in this country. The Economist was a very moderate and fair paper; and taking its calculations, based on the present price of wheat, the loss per acre was £2. He had some other calculations by him; but they were none of them lower than £2. Were they going to allow the great industry of wheat-growing to be absolutely destroyed? Some time ago we had 4,000,000 acres of wheat under cultivation in this country; at the present moment only 2,600,000 acres were under that crop. Taking it in round terms, the yield of wheat was 9,504,000 quarters; but large quantities of that would be used as feeding stuff—as much as 504,000 at least—thus leaving 9,000,000 only to meet the requirements of this country, which were put at 26,000,000 quarters. If 4,000,000 acres were now under cultivation, as they were a few years ago, the produce would probably have been 15,000,000, instead of 9,504,000. They must remember that in case of war, if all these prophets were right who had been looking into the state of the Navy—he knew himself something of the state of the Army—they would, in case of any reverse, be beset with the greatest difficulties in regard to the food supply of this country, and what kind of an indemnity would be exacted from us under such circumstances? He meant—which God forbid!—in case of a defeat, when we had no supplies in the country. The 17,000,000 quarters of imported wheat this country would consume during the year represented £25,500,000, taking the price at 30s. a-quarter. How were they to get that money back from abroad? Some hon. Members with whom he talked said that investments abroad furnished the funds which paid for those imports; but he found those gentlemen who insisted on free imports were mostly men with fixed incomes derived from investments from abroad, to whose advantage it was that the highest purchasing value should be given to their money regardless of the consequences upon the condition of commerce and agriculture at home. He would turn to another point. He had before him the price of wheat for the last 104 years, and it was a very curious fact that for the last half of this year the price of wheat would be lower than any which had occurred during that period. It was quite true that in 1780 the price was £1 16s., which was at present the lowest price on record; but during the first half of this year the price had fallen to £1 17s. 8d., and for the latter it would recede below £1 16s. With regard to the crops, he took The Times report, which was an excellent one, and found the average stated at 29½ bushels per acre. He believed, however, it would not thrash out over 28 bushels per acre. They knew that barley was not an average crop; they also knew that the colour was not good, and, as a consequence, the price was not good also; they knew that oats were a bad crop, beans and peas nothing like an average crop, though potatoes were remarkably good and cheap. The truth was that farmers would get but a very small return for such of their crops as were plentiful, in consequence of their being so cheap this year. Taken as a whole, this year had not come up to even an average year. No doubt, stock had increased owing partly to the saving of heifer calves for dairy and other purposes, and partly to the difficulty of selling stock resulting from the foot-and-mouth disease, particularly in Ireland. He was deeply grateful that foot-and-mouth disease had for the time, at all events, been extinguished. No greater blessing could have been conferred upon this country than the extinction of that subtle disease, which had been brought about by the restrictions on the importation of cattle; and he hoped that the Lord President would take care that on no account should cattle be imported from infected countries. The right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) had said that those restrictions would make meat much dearer, whereas the fact was that meat had become much cheaper. The increase in the dead meat trade from Australia and New Zealand had far more than made up for the loss of food occasioned by the restrictions on the importation of live cattle. The price of mutton had fallen during the year from 1s. to 1s. 6d. a-stone, and of beef from 8d. to 9d. a-stone. Another difficulty which farmers had to contend with was the abnormally high price of store stock, which scarcely allowed the smallest margin of profit to the farmer. In his opinion, agricultural depression had never been as great as it was at the present time, and had never lasted so long. The right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) had put the loss to the tenant farmers, caused by agricultural depression at from £130,000,000 to £150,000,000; but he was afraid that it would reach over £200,000,000. In this state of things half of the present occupiers of farms would be unable to continue in their holdings unless something were done for their relief. The great difficulty had always been to say what ought to be done. He would be justified, perhaps, in saying that it was sufficient for the farmers to put their case before the Government of this great country, and to leave them to devise a remedy for the state of things that existed. He, however, was prepared to make one or two suggestions in a non-controversial spirit. He remembered that years ago the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) carried a Resolution in favour of the relief of local burdens by a majority of over 100, when a Liberal Government was in Office; but no notice whatever had been taken of that Resolution until a Conservative Government came into power, when certain subsidies in aid of the local rates were granted to the agricultural interest. Another Resolution with regard to Local Taxation had been carried by his hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) in the last Session; but no notice

had been taken by the Government of the views of the majority of the House. What he now suggested was that some more such subsidies should be granted. Relief ought to be given in respect of the main roads, the police, and the indoor paupers. An opportunity should also be given to the landowner to free his land from tithes on equitable and easy terms; but such terms should especially be just as regarded the interest of the clergy. This was a question that was rapidly coming to the front, and which deserved serious consideration. As to the question of Free Trade, he was not one of those who argued that there ought to be an import duty on corn; but at the same time he would say that a greater mistake was never made than when that 1s. duty on corn was taken off. He saw no reason why that 1s. per sack should not again be replaced, and even 1s. per sack. No one felt it, and it would be found a great help and leverage towards the payment of local taxation. He believed that, by a fair re-adjustment of the Customs duties on such articles as had been suggested, the taxation on Customs might be raised by something like £10,000,000 a-year without hurting the consumer at all. Was this the only wise nation in the world? He did not suppose there was a man in the House who would say that Prince Bismarck was a fool; and when they found the wisest statesman in Europe keeping his country in the strongest bond of Protection, they must admit that he had some good reason and some good cause for the course he had pursued. Surely an inquiry could do no harm. He would say to the Government—"If you are so strong in your saddles that you think you have it all your own way, and have nothing to do but shake your horse's reins in order to win in a canter, let us have the inquiry we ask for." The agriculturists would ride their horses as well as they were able, and all they asked was that a fair and impartial inquiry should be allowed them; but whether that inquiry was granted or not, he thought that, at any rate, they who sat in Parliament had a right to demand that there should be a fair consideration of the question in all its bearings, and that the agriculturists should have a fair adjustment of that local taxation which was now raised upon real property alone, which class of property was, at the present moment, least able to bear it.

Sir Walter B. Barttelot

MR. W. FOWLER said, he thought there had been some exaggeration as to the situation of the country, at any rate as regarded the state of trade in the manufacturing districts. He understood that in the great Union of Manchester there never was so little pauperism as at the present moment. That did not show that the industries, round Manchester at all events, were quite so depressed as they were led to understand. He was also told that there were 2,000,000 spindles now being put up in the cotton district, which, with other facts, hardly bore out the statement of the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Ercoyd) as to the condition of Manchester and the cotton trade. While he quite agreed that the condition of agriculture was very serious, and he might almost say naturally alarming, he did not think that they should go away with the impression that the whole country was on the verge of ruin. He thought the Government had been perfectly right in not putting this paragraph into the Queen's Speech, because it would have given the impression that Parliament could do something by inquiry to get rid of the present condition of things. But he did not believe our difficulties were such as it was in the power of this House to deal with. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) told them the other night at Leamington that foreign competition was destroying agriculture and paralyzing trade. He was not prepared to agree with him. In his opinion, the nine bad seasons we had passed through had much more to do with it. In 1851 the price of wheat was very little higher than it was now, and meat was about half the present price, and yet the farming interest was not so depressed as at present. That showed that some cause was at work besides the mere scale of prices. Then again, as they had been told by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, the same depression existed in France and Germany and Switzerland. They could not control the seasons, and one good season would not restore a better state of things. He was free to confess that the cultivation of wheat was not profitable at the present moment. But wheat was not our only crop. He should like to ask whether those who came there to instruct them as to what was necessary for the renovation of agriculture had gone as fully into the question as they ought? He would like to point out once more how enormous was our importation of articles which we could perfectly well grow at home. Let them take only two groups from the last Returns. First, taking live cattle, sheep, and pigs. Of these, there were imported in 1864 to the value of £4,275,000; in 1874, £5,265,041; and in 1883, £11,983,754. Secondly, the import of other provisions, such as beef, mutton, pork, bacon, hams, poultry, game, eggs, butter, and cheese, amounted in 1864 to the value of £12,500,000; in 1874, £25,300,000; and in 1883, £40,500,000; and the total value of all the provisions imported in those three years was respectively £58,658,000, £112,496,000, and £157,500,000. Look at eggs and butter separately. They imported in 1883 eggs to the value of £2,732,000, and butter to the value of £11,773,000. He thought they might well consider whether more of these articles might not be produced at home. They had the best markets in the world, and, perhaps, the highest price in the world for such articles was paid in England. But hon. Members did not discuss such questions. They came demanding other remedies. Again, that evening Local Taxation had been brought forward. For his part, he asked for justice as to Local Taxation. He would join with anyone in reducing the burdens on the land if they could be shown to be unfair. But he denied that any such proceeding would act as a remedy for present troubles. The losses by taxation were as nothing compared to the effect of prices. He supposed that if all that was asked as to local taxes were given, it would not aid the farmer to the extent of 2s. an acre—[Cries of "Not 1s."]—and, therefore, this question of Local Taxation was not so important as it looked. If the farmer had lost 2s. in the last year by taxes, he had lost 32s. an acre by the fall in wheat since October, 1883. But there were other questions behind far more serious. The fact was that their old friend "Protection" was at the bottom of the matter. But Protection would do the farmers no good unless they got a higher price for their corn. He should like to read a few words which, on the 11th of February, 1851, Mr.

Disraeli used when speaking on this subject—

"If I give my opinion, which I do most sincerely, that a moderate fixed duty would not raise the price to the consumer, I wish perfectly to guard myself from being supposed to suggest it as any favour to the agricultural interest."
—(3 Hansard, [114] 410.)

He evidently did not think highly of it as a remedy for distress. And Sir James Graham, on the next day, in the course of a speech, said—

"You may convulse the country—you may endanger property—you may shake our institutions to the foundations; but I am satisfied that there is no power in England which can permanently enhance by force of law the price of bread."—(Ibid. 528.)

Hon. Gentlemen opposite must, therefore, dismiss from their mind this idea of putting on a duty. It could not be done, and would not be done. The remedy must be found elsewhere—in their own skill and industry. It was not to be found in any hocus-pocus arrangement of duties. The improvement must be obtained by their intelligence, good sense, and by the power of the money which was so abundant in this country. To give the farmer the idea that this House was able to do much for him by way of legislation was to delude him; and to have put a paragraph in the Queen's Speech would have been only to deceive him. They had heard a good deal of the depression in trade. No doubt the iron, coal, and shipping trades were now, and had been for some months, depressed. But the great cause of the loss of profits which was so much felt by capitalists was the low condition of prices all round. Prices had not been so low since 1848. It had been said that times of high prices were good times; but they were sometimes bad times. There might be high prices and very low profits, and low prices and fairly large profits. At present there certainly was a great diminution of profits, and capitalists were not receiving the income for their capital which they used to do. The poor man, however, was not suffering a similar loss. His wages were not being materially reduced—certainly not in proportion to the fall in profits. On the other hand, they must remember that in the coal and iron mania of 1871-2, though wages were high, they were as nothing compared with the enormous profits that were being made. The poor man's turn had now come. His wages were not materially reduced, and he was far more comfortable than he used to be. Hon. Members might ask for the cause of this tremendous fall in prices. It had been set down to the scarcity of gold. He did not believe there was any such scarcity. But there was an enormous supply of every article. That arose from cheap carriage by land and water. The railway and the steamship brought enormous supplies of everything, and hence the fall in prices. In one year freight from America had fallen 50 per cent. Nor was this the only influence at work. The telegraph had a powerful effect. It was not necessary now to hold great stocks of goods. They could be ordered by telegraph, and the old system of business was a thing of the past. An hon. Member had told him that the old merchant was no longer needed. The telegraph had extinguished him. These things could not be altered by Parliament. Hon. Members would not, he supposed, wish to get rid of the railways, the steamers, and the telegraph; but they would like a little protective duty—a kind of differential duty in favour of our Colonies. But on what was this duty to be imposed? If it was imposed on the raw material our trade would be ruined, for we should no longer be able to compete with foreign countries. Was it to be on manufactures? If so, on which? Silk had been the only one mentioned, and the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council (Mr. Mundella) had disposed of that. The fact was that they could not deal with this matter by any legislative Act, but by educating the people and increasing their skill, so as to enable us to compete in the race of the world. It was for the House to pass laws which should leave the people free to do their work. The people could take much better care of themselves than could Parliament. The condition of the people depended more upon their own habits and their own efforts than upon Acts of Parliament. If the people were wasteful in spending money in drink or in other things, no Act of Parliament could prevent them from coming to grief. The House of Commons could not prevent disaster overtaking men in trade who did not do their duty; and, therefore, in his opinion, it would be the greatest folly in the world for the House to hold out an expectation which it could not fulfil. The more he looked into this matter the more he was satisfied that they had done right in getting rid of the protective system root and branch, and in declining to ask a contribution from the people for the benefit of one particular class. The fact was, they could not do this thing; they could not return to this system. If any class of men ought to be protected, they ought to begin by protecting the farmer. They had taken away his protection in 1846; and if they were going to introduce Protection, they must begin by first protecting him. The landed interest were bound, however, to look after their own affairs without assistance from the House of Commons. In his opinion, the system of law by which the land had been held for centuries in this country was one which had done a great deal to repress the landed interest. He did not believe in this system of one man holding the land while the rest of the family were dependent upon him. It frequently happened that under this system the land became starved and impoverished. He did not think any alteration of the law would make a great change; but if a natural state of law had existed for the past 100 years, the state of the land would have been much better than it now was. The present position of things was one which brought one in contact with events which were rather extraordinary, no doubt; but still with events which they could not control by the power of the House. He asked the House to reject this Motion, because he believed that to accept it would be to hold out expectations which would be quite futile and illusive in their character.

Mr. CHAPLIN asked the hon. Member who had just spoken what were the remedies which he proposed for the alleviation of the present distress? The hon. Member said that if the people of this country spent their money in drink they must suffer for their misdeeds; if they were wasteful and extravagant they must pay for the wastefulness which they committed; if they were careless in trade they must suffer likewise. He ventured, on behalf of this class, to repudiate those innuendoes against the working people of this country. These were not the causes of the sufferings which prevailed so widely at present. As far as the hon. Member and his Friends were concerned in the suggestion of a remedy, the future of the working classes of the country might be one of despair. He was astonished that no Member of the Government had attempted to reply to the speech which had been made by the Seconder of the Motion. He had heard the greater part of the speech of the Vice President of the Council; but, instead of replying to the speech of his hon. Friend, the right hon. Gentleman had favoured the House with a great variety of details regarding the amount of his investments at home and abroad, for what purpose he had been unable to discover. They might have been an admirable advertisement for the business of the firm with which he understood the right hon. Gentleman was connected. The defence of the right hon. Gentleman was altogether unnecessary, because he understood that what fell from his hon. Friend had been cited not in any respect as a personal attack, but simply as an illustration of the evils of the system which the right hon. Gentleman supported. It was the more remarkable that the right hon. Gentleman had not attempted to reply to the speech of his hon. Friend, because a more able, more fearless, or more valuable contribution to the discussion of the industrial crisis had never been delivered to the House. The right hon. Gentleman did not even seem to think it necessary to remain in the House during the debate; but had shown the courage of his opinions in running away, as he had done on many occasions before. He shared the surprise which had been expressed that no mention had been made of the prevalent distress in the Gracious Speech from the Throne. Apparently, the Government thought it one of the last matters which concerned them. This was on a par with all their proceedings in matters of national or Imperial importance. Never were affairs in a state more critical for the interests of our Empire in three-quarters of the globe than at this moment; and they could gauge the importance attached to those matters by Members of the Government when they remembered that only the other day a Cabinet Minister got up and described it as a waste of time to discuss the murder of a British Agent and the condition of affairs in South Africa. It now seemed that precisely the same spirit actuated the Ministry in regard to vital and urgent home affairs; and that, although thousands of working men in all parts of the country were daily reported to be out of employment, and unable to support their families, the Government could only occupy themselves with a purely Party measure; while all those far more important and momentous matters demanded the most anxious consideration. With four years' experience, however, of the effects of their rule on the fortunes of the Empire, he could understand the necessity which induced them to raise a cloud of controversy on a Party question, in order to blind the eyes and divert the attention of the people from their disastrous failures. He was glad that both the Mover and Seconder of the Amendment, who were so closely connected with the trading and manufacturing interests of the country, had so clearly recognized the most important fact that the present grave depression in trade was in the main caused by the depression which had so long affected the agricultural interest. They had had a prolonged and exhaustive inquiry into the causes of agricultural depression. The Report of the Commission spoke in the plainest and strongest possible terms of the severity of that depression; they indicated its causes, and also made certain recommendations for its relief. It was true that the main and primary cause had been the bad seasons; but they had just had one of the best seasons known for many years past, and yet the prospects of agriculture had probably never been gloomier than they were at present. Whatever the Vice President of the Council or others might say, the real and true cause of agricultural depression now was the low prices, and nothing else but the low prices, which were the inevitable result of excessive foreign competition. The Vice President of the Council seemed to charge prospectively the Members of the Commission with changing their views on that question. Well, he could not answer for his Colleagues; but so far as he himself was concerned, as a Member of the Commission, he frankly confessed that he had changed his views on the subject. He had appended a Memorandum to the Report, urging the whole question of foreign competition, because he thought it had received in the Report nothing like the attention it deserved. He expressed in his Memorandum the opinion, after weighing the evidence, that they would probably be able in future successfully to contend with any foreign competition they would have to undergo. That opinion he based upon, among other things, the latest evidence received by the Commission, and especially from one of the Sub-Commissioners whom they sent to inquire in America, and who placed before them the view that wheat could not be produced and sold in America at anything like the prices at which it had been sold up to that time. Moreover, he thought that the price of wheat had considerably risen since their inquiry began, and that it promised to be higher than it was at the present moment. He confessed that his hopes and expectations had not been realized in that respect; and unquestionably the price was lower now than it had ever been in the past 100 years. Consequently, agriculture was proportionately depressed, and that depression was likely to remain until some means were found for its relief. He now turned to the subject of trade. Trade was now depressed because the markets had been failing. The foreign market had failed for an obvious reason—namely, simply because of the hostile tariffs imposed on the goods which we should send to foreign countries, if they would only allow us to do so. Then there was the home market. Why was it failing? There ought to be a complete and searching inquiry into that subject at the present time. There might be many reasons for its failure; but the real and main reason was simply the depression of agriculture, which represented the chief element in the home market. As long as agriculture was depressed the home market was certain to fail. He was sorry the right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) had left the House, because he would have liked to have asked him a question on which he wished, if possible, to elicit a frank answer from those who professed the Free Trade views of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman was one of the stoutest allies of the hon. Member for Preston, because he had always told the working men of this country that the depression in their trade was the consequence of bad harvests. He would ask a hundred times if necessary, till he got an answer, if the influence of bad harvests caused such depression to other trades, what would be the condition of trade, when, instead of bad harvests, we had none at all? This was what might happen, for he denied that any human being could grow wheat at 32s. a-quarter in this country without absolutely losing by the transaction. Then the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) had said that they might grow something else; but he had not indicated anything that could take the place of the great wheat-growing industry of this country. It reminded him of the advice of the Prime Minister some time ago, when he had told the farmers to produce jam. Jam was a very good thing in its way, so were market gardening, cheese, and dairy farming, and he considered that there was room for expansion in those directions; but all of them together could not take the place of that great industry of wheat growing. There was no subject which the Royal Commission had more carefully gone into than the endeavour to obtain a satisfactory reply to the question of what produce could be grown which could take the place of wheat growing if it should become unremunerative in the future. But nothing had been suggested that could take its place with any reasonable prospect of giving a profit. Some hon. Members, and especially the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings), were great advocates of this view—"Change your whole system of land tenure, and divide your holdings into smaller ones, and then you will see what you will see." If the hon. Member had had any practical experience on this subject, if he had gone into certain parts of the country and witnessed the absolute failure of that system, and had seen the state of poverty and ruin into which thousands of the freeholders of Lincolnshire had been thrown, owing to the price of agricultural produce, he thought the hon. Member would abandon these Utopian ideas. They had had an exhaustive inquiry into the state of agriculture; in his opinion, the time had now arrived when they must also have an inquiry into the state of trade; and if it were done by no one else, he would himself move for such an inquiry. The hon. Member for Cambridge had told them that the meaning of the inquiry had been to raise the price of food for the people, and would say probably that that would be the object of the inquiry now suggested. But he was getting accustomed to these taunts. The same cry had been raised with regard to the proposals made last Session with respect to the importation of foreign cattle, whereas the result had been exactly the contrary to what had been suggested. The fact was, that since the passing of the Cattle Bill, from whatever cause, the price of beef had fallen.

Mr. MUNDELLA: Not through that Bill.

Mr. CHAPLIN: He did not say through that Bill. He said from whatever cause; but he would venture to prophecy, if that Act was properly administered by the Government of the day, it would encourage the production of meat in this country, and lead to a still further reduction in its price. It did not necessarily follow that a rise of 4s. or 5s. a-quarter in the price of wheat made any difference in the price of bread. On the other hand, a fall of 5s. a-quarter in the price of wheat constantly occurred without altering the price of bread. It had been found that concurrently with the higher prices of wheat the people had always been most prosperous. He remembered the time when the Prime Minister described the prosperity of the country as advancing by leaps and bounds, and yet that was exactly the time when the price of wheat was between 50s. and 60s. a-quarter. He did not suppose that, even in their most angry moments, hon. Gentlemen opposite would really credit Gentlemen on the Conservative side of the House with any intention or desire to raise the price of food for the people. Even if they had that intention and desire, they would not be able to do so. The people of this country, happily, were very much better educated than they used to be. They might have been misled at one time; they often had been in the past; but he did not think it would be very easy to do so again. They were well able to judge and weigh all these questions on their merits for themselves, and they would not be misled in the future, as they had been in the past, by the fanaticism of the bigots of Free Trade. Well, then, he would conclude his observations by heartily endorsing the views of the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Ecroyd) when he demanded an inquiry into the present position of our trade. And when that had been granted, if it could be shown, as he thought it would be shown, that he and his Friends were right in the views they expressed, that the real cause which laid at the root of the depression of trade at the present moment was the serious depression of agriculture, it would then be for the people and for the working classes of the country to decide whether they would submit any longer to the present state of things, or whether they would not insist on some general reconsideration of the present fiscal system of the country, which should mitigate, or greatly reduce, at all events, the painful effects of foreign competition on the great industries of the country.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had commenced his speech with an attack upon the Vice President of the Council. The hon. Gentleman said that he had listened to the right hon. Gentleman for a short time, and then became tired of waiting, and left the House, having heard no reply to the observations of the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Ecroyd). He was quite sure that if the hon. Member had waited a little longer he would, with the rest of the House, have agreed that the Vice President of the Council had completely answered the speech of the hon. Member for Preston.

Mr. CHAPLIN: No doubt, that is the view taken on that side of the House.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON said, the hon. Member for Preston, in his interesting and eloquent speech, had asked that speakers on the Liberal side of the House should not "pooh, pooh!" the question of agricultural distress in the country. Hon. Members on that side of the House, as well as hon. Members on the other side, lamented that there should be any distress throughout the country; but they believed that the amount of distress had been, in many cases, very considerably exaggerated. He knew it was of no good arguing the question from what had always in the past been taken as tests of national progress and national wealth. At this moment they were regarded no longer by speakers on the other side of the House as tests. They were no longer allowed to congratulate themselves on the poor rate having decreased, nor were they to congratulate themselves upon the fact that the country received a larger amount in the shape of Income Tax, and that there were a greater number of Income Tax payers who now paid the tax than there were a few years ago. They were further told that the increase in the Savings Bank deposits was no test of the increase of the national prosperity; and the volume of trade, which was larger last year than it ever was before, instead of encouraging hon. Members on the other side of the House, seemed to fill them with alarm. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), in spite of the fact that last year's total exports were larger than they ever were before, except in the year 1872-3, deliberately asserted that the exports of the country had largely diminished.

Mr. CHAPLIN remarked that he had not said anything of the kind.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON said, that no one would deny that trade was bad. It was bad in this sense—that there had been a very considerable amount of over-production, and that prices were very low. He confessed that he had been somewhat astonished to hear the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver) suggest that we ought to adopt the French system of assisting the shipping trade, because if there was one industry in which there had been more over-production than in another, he thought it was generally acknowledged that it was the shipping trade. Nevertheless, the hon. Gentleman suggested that the Government should foster that trade, and thereby vastly increase the over-production which now existed. In this state of things there was one alleviation, and that was that, the price of everything being so low, the consumer had been gaining. He had been rather surprised at a remark which fell from the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot). The hon. and gallant Baronet made the somewhat astounding assertion that when the price of corn was high trade was good.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT begged the hon. Gentleman's pardon; he had not said anything of the kind. What he said was, that it so happened that when agriculture flourished trade and commerce flourished also.

Mr. Sydney Buxton

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON accepted the explanation. He had misunderstood the hon. and gallant Gentleman, and would withdraw the observation he had made. He had, however, certainly understood the hon. and gallant Baronet to state what he had suggested. They might lament the existing state of affairs; but, after all, what were the remedies that had been proposed that evening? The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council had suggested the increase of education, and especially of technical education—remedies which he (Mr. S. Buxton) thought would commend themselves to the sense of the House. Then the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. S. Smith), who seemed to have a sort of hankering after Fair Trade, but whose common sense brought him up short whenever he came in contact with the actual results of inquiry, had suggested State-aided emigration as a remedy for the evil. The only suggestion made by the other side of the House was that there should be an inquiry into the state of trade. Before they agreed to an inquiry, he wanted to know what inquiry was proposed to be made? Was it, or was it not, to be a veiled attack directed against Free Trade? They knew, of course, that the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Eeroyd) and the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver) had the courage of their opinions; but probably some of those who were sitting on the opposite Benches were not equally as courageous as those hon. Members, because he gathered from some of the speeches which had been delivered in the course of the evening that, although they would not as yet go in for the cry of Fair Trade, it was possible that they might hereafter do so. He confessed that he had been much interested the other day by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, in reply to a Free Trade deputation at Birmingham. He knew that the right hon. Gentleman was a very great master of the art of saying "nothing" when there was nothing to be said, and on that occasion the right hon. Gentleman carried that art to its greatest extent. But he thought that the House and the country wanted the right hon. Gentleman and the Leaders of the Opposition to say "something," and to declare what they really meant on this matter of Fair Trade. Were their minds still open, or were they closed, upon the question of Free Trade? Some hon. Gentlemen said that Party considerations ought not to be brought into the matter, and in that he fully agreed; but he thought that the House and the country ought to know what the Leaders of the Opposition, and those who were responsible, really thought upon this matter of Free Trade. Did they, or did they not, indorse the speeches the House had listened to that evening from the hon. Members for Preston and Birkenhead? The position of those hon. Members was clear enough. They told the House that practically they wanted to obtain reciprocity by means of retaliation. As the hon. Member for Preston said, he required Protection as a lever, in order to obtain universal Free Trade; and the hon. Member for Birkenhead declared that it was necessary for this country to retaliate in order that we might be able to open the ports of the world to our own commerce. There was, he (Mr. S. Buxton) thought, a good deal of loose talk on this question of Fair Trade; and he wanted to know what those who advocated it proposed to do, and how far it would really improve the state of things as they at present existed? The hon. Member for Preston had taunted those on that side of the House with being responsible for the depressed state of trade in England; but the trade of the protected countries was as bad, or worse, and he thought the onus of proof lay not on those who were defending the existing system, but on those who proposed to change our fiscal system. The proposition of Reciprocity, or Fair Trade, was founded on the very erroneous and exploded theory that the injury of one country was the benefit of another. It was now generally acknowledged that the benefit of one country was the benefit of all. He would not attempt to discuss the question from the point of expediency, or from the point of principle, because that had already been discussed and threshed out by previous speakers. He would prefer to point out the absolute impossibility of carrying out the proposal of the hon. Member for Preston. That proposal looked simple enough. They saw that their imports exceeded their exports, and it looked a very simple matter just to clap a duty upon the imports, in order that the foreigner might be brought to his senses, and be induced to accept our exports freely. But there was just this difficulty in the way—the difficulty of knowing upon which of the large amount of imports we could really impose a duty. One thing which had been generally acknowledged that evening, even by speakers on the other side of the House, was that it was practically quite impossible to tax articles of food. He thought it was equally acknowledged that it was quite impossible to tax the imports of raw material. Everyone admitted that that would be fatal to our power of competition in the open market. The consequence was that those two great portions of the imports had first to be eliminated before they could discover on what articles retaliatory duties could really be placed. He found that our imports amounted to £426,000,000, and that out of them as much as £340,000,000 belonged to those two great categories; and represented, to the extent of £195,000,000, articles of food, and, to the extent of £145,000,000, raw materials imported. Therefore, the small balance that was left, which they could effectually tax by retaliatory duties, only amounted to £85,000,000, and of that £85,000,000 something like £25,000,000 or £30,000,000 represented semi-manufactured articles, which were just in the same position as raw material, and were also unfitted for taxation. The remaining £50,000,000 or £60,000,000 represented imported “manufactures,” on which, perhaps, retaliatory duties might be placed; though even this sum should be reduced by the amount of re-exports, and of articles of fancy wear, &c., which would not repay any imposition of duties. Granting, however, the whole of this sum, it seemed a considerable amount. But if they looked at the other side of the question they would find that, while other nations might be vulnerable to the extent of £50,000,000 or £60,000,000, we ourselves exported manufactured and semi-manufactured goods, on which duties were and could be placed, to the extent of £213,000,000, and would be liable to be attacked to that extent. So that it came to this—that for every injury we could inflict upon the foreigner by retaliatory duties, he could injure us three or four times as much. That seemed to him to be conclusive as far as regarded the possibility of putting on these duties; and, therefore, he thought it remained for those who desired to put on the duties, and who desired to re-invigorate the country by imposing import duties, to show in what way they were to impose them so as to be able to bring the foreigner to terms. It stood to reason that, unless we injured the foreigner more than he could injure us, we should fail to bring him to his senses. Being interested in protective duties, the foreigner would do his best to protect his protective duties, and for every pound imposed by us as a tax upon foreign imports he would put a similar sum upon our exports; and, as he (Mr. S. Buxton) had already pointed out, the foreigner had this pull over us—that his retaliation to our attack would be as four to one. If our trade, as the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver) seemed to suppose, were almost entirely a home trade for home consumption, and if we had no foreign trade, then he thought there might be something to be said on behalf of the view of the hon. Gentleman; but, as had been well pointed out by the Vice President of the Council, at present any attempt to resort to Protection in the case of one article would necessitate Protection for others, and the cost of production would, consequently, be seriously raised all round, and not only would our power of competing in hostile markets be greatly diminished, but we should lose our supremacy in the neutral markets of the world. He would not detain the House at greater length upon this subject, and he was much obliged to hon. Members for the patience with which they had listened to him.

Mr. SALT said, that as this was really a discussion upon an Amendment to the Address, he did not think it right that he should occupy the time of the House for more than a very few minutes, notwithstanding the importance of the subject which was now raised. Indeed, it was a subject of such great importance to every interest in the country, that it ought to be considered rather upon an independent Motion than upon an Amendment to the Address. He thought, nevertheless, that his hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver) and his hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Ecroyd) were quite correct in the view they entertained, that some notice of this important subject should be taken by the House and the country. He conceived from their speeches that, although they had frankly and honestly expressed their opinions, as they always did, their view did not go further than that, and that they only desired to bring the matter prominently before the House and the country. The question which naturally arose was, whether the condition of agriculture and trade was in such a state as to demand special attention at the present moment? And upon that point it occurred to him that two opinions might be held and two voices might be raised in Parliament. Speaking from his own experience, and he believed that every Member of the House who had had similar experience would say the same, for many years he did not remember—indeed, he might say he had not known—a time in which every man connected with business of any kind suffered so much anxiety. Hon. Members who listened to him must have been in communication with many persons carrying on business in different parts of the country, and they would be perfectly aware that in every quarter, without exception, there had been this expression of opinion—"We never knew such a long depression. We really do not know how to carry on. We are making the smallest possible profits, or we are carrying on our business at a loss. Sometimes we think the cloud is lifting, and then affairs relapse and become worse than before." That was the opinion expressed everywhere by people connected with business, and he had, therefore, looked into the question in order to see how far the depression of agriculture and commerce really justified that view, because it occurred to him that it might sometimes happen that they came across a few persons who were in such an unfortunate position, and possessed such a constitution, that they were in the habit of taking a despairing view of everything. There were, however, two or three tests which afforded good evidence of the condition of trade in the country. The first was the carriage on the railways, the second was the volume of trade passing in and out of the country, and the third was the state of the Revenue. He did not want to go into figures at that late hour of the night; but hon. Members, if they wished to have these three figures, would easily be able to find them for themselves. In regard to the railway returns, the condition of the foreign trade in and out of the country, and the position of the Revenue—upon all those points, if the figures were not actually disheartening, they were, at any rate, weak—they had either given way to some extent, or they were showing signs of giving way. This entirely confirmed the opinion which private individuals expressed, and, to a large extent, justified the existing state of anxiety and uneasiness. He did not say that we were in a condition in which we ought to despair. He had no desire to take too gloomy a view of the state of affairs, and, notwithstanding the returns to which he had alluded, no doubt there was still at the present moment an immense volume of trade passing in and out of the Kingdom, and an immense carriage both of goods and passengers over the whole of our railway system, and we might possibly look for brighter times; but he was bound to say that the depression had now gone on for a very long time. In 1874—just after that wonderful year 1873, which some hon. Gentleman that night had said was a great misfortune to the country—in 1874 he remembered saying himself that he believed that we were on the eve of the longest and worst depression of trade which this country had ever known, and that opinion had been more than fully justified. The question was when would that state of things be changed? It was that question to which they required an answer, and it was for that reason he conceived his hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Ecroyd) pressed for an inquiry. His hon. Friend went somewhat further than the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver). He did not content himself with saying that this matter ought to have been noticed in the Queen's Speech, but he said also that there ought to be an inquiry. As he understood his hon. Friend, he did not press Her Majesty's Government further than that at the present moment; but he contended that the condition of trade was such as to demand inquiry, investigation, and information on the part of the Government. He (Mr. Salt) did not propose to commit himself to what his hon. Friend or anyone else had said that night; but he went entirely and thoroughly with his hon.

Friend in regard to the matter of inquiry. The condition of the trade of the country during the past 20 or 30 years, and its condition at the present moment, were such that a public inquiry by an independent Commission would be a very great benefit. There were other reasons besides these. The condition of trade was peculiar in certain ways. In the first place, he had noticed the extreme length of the depression, which was altogether peculiar. The ordinary experience of the last 40 or 50 years was that depressions, when they occurred, endured for a comparatively brief period; they only lasted for six or seven years, and then the cloud lifted, and a brighter state of things was brought about; but if there had been any kind of improvement on the present occasion, it had been slow, uncertain, and short, and then things fell back again to the state in which they were before. That was one of the things in the condition of trade which was peculiar—namely, the extreme length of the depression. There was another matter that was peculiar and demanded inquiry also. It was generally supposed that when food and material were cheap it was a time of prosperity in the country; but it had not been so in this instance, and why? For this reason, that with all this great cheapness there was no purchasing power. Purchasing power was absent, and, although everything was very cheap, the people had got no money to buy with. That was quite peculiar, and not in accordance with what was generally expected in such a condition of affairs, and it was another reason, as he understood, why his hon. Friends pressed for an inquiry. There was a third reason which it was very difficult to understand without inquiry, but which he desired to point out as another matter somewhat peculiar. Anyone who had carefully watched the condition of trade during the last few years would, he thought, have observed that, while the large dealers—the wholesale dealers—had been complaining that they were unable to make profits at all, the small dealers had been making considerable profits, and were doing well. He said this with some hesitation, because it required proof; but it was not his own opinion only, other people had observed the same thing. It had the appearance of a peculiar condition of trade, and might be made the subject of a very useful inquiry, and not an inquiry in any Party sense. It should not be an inquiry to the prejudice of anyone, or to the prejudice of anybody in the world; but it should be an inquiry into matters that were of immense interest to the country—namely, what was the cause of this peculiar condition of trade? We must remember this, that if profits were largely consumed by the retail dealers, and were not shared by the wholesale dealers, then the bulk of the people did not receive benefit from them—in other words, the benefit of cheap products did not reach the consumer. Surely that was a matter of very great importance. There was one other point, and one only, to which he desired to direct the attention of the House—namely, the condition of the people themselves—he meant of those people who worked with their hands. He had observed that whenever anything was said about the poverty of the people, they were referred to statistics to prove that the people were very well off. His observation was this—that at the present moment the country was not suffering from acute distress, except, perhaps, in Sunderland, or anything like the distress which occurred in the Lancashire cotton famine; but, at the same time, it was suffering from a general sense of poverty. Many poor, respectable people said nothing about their poverty. Instead of having full wages for the last three or four years, they had only been able to get work for two or three days a-week, and they were beginning to get very poor indeed, and the sense of their poverty was pressing upon them very much, because they could not see the end of it at all. This poverty went on from day to day, from week to week, and from month to month, and almost from year to year, pressing on the people in clothes, in food, in the care of their children, and in their comforts; and there seemed to be no end of this increasing poverty, and no way out of it. That was the result of his observation. At the same time, he had to reconcile that fact with the statistics put forward as to there being better houses, better wages, and better food among the working classes than there were 20 or 30 years ago; all of which was perfectly true. He had had some difficulty in satisfying his mind as to the cause; but he believed it to be this. There were really two ranks of working people in this country who worked with their hands. There was one class—and he was happy to say a large class—of mechanics who, under the altered circumstances which steam, coal, and railways had produced during the last half-century, had brought themselves into an extremely good position. They were most intelligent and able men, and the strength and wealth of the country was constituted by this better class of the working people. These were the persons whose houses were so good, whose clothes were so good, and who were, in fact, excellent men in every way. But there was another class—namely, the class of very poor people who had not had the opportunity or energy enough to raise themselves in a similar manner. Among these poor people at the present time very great poverty existed, and they were unable to obtain those necessities in the shape of food and clothing which were even conducive to health. He hoped he had not taken up too much of the time of the House. He did not know whether the Motion for a Commission of Inquiry would be pressed; but he would only say that if the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Ecroyd) did press it, he would give him his cordial support. Before he sat down he might mention one other speech which had been made—namely, the speech of the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. S. Smith). With almost all the hon. Member had stated he cordially agreed. He did not mean to say that he agreed with every word the hon. Member said; but he could accept nearly all he had said, and there was very little difference between them, especially with regard to the use which might be made of the Colonies for the purpose of rendering assistance to our English trade and our English poor. He admitted that that was a question that was very large and difficult; but he felt there were working people of this country who, having these Colonies as their inheritance, ought in some way to be able to make use of them, not only for the benefit of themselves, but for the benefit of the Colonies and the whole world at large. Another pressing reason why the inquiry asked for should be granted, although in no Party sense, might be found in the history of Free Trade itself. In discussing this question of Free Trade he had frequently felt that he had adduced infinitely better arguments on the side of Free Trade than Free Traders themselves had brought forward. Many avowed Free Traders did not condescend to argue. They were quite ready to tell their opponents—"You are exceedingly stupid;" but they never put forward a case for Free Trade which, to his (Mr. Salt's) mind, was as strong as it should be to satisfy the country. What was often done on the part of avowed Free Traders was this—they gave instances of the effects produced by Free Trade, and quoted instances of universal prosperity, and so forth; but the instances manifestly arose from different causes altogether. That, in his view, was another reason in favour of inquiry. We had had the system of Free Trade for the last 40 years, and the country might have prospered, or it might not, by reason of that system. Whether this was the case or not, it would be found that scarcely any other country in the world had adopted the same system. As he had said, the avowed Free Traders scarcely ever condescended to argument, or, if they did, they brought forward arguments which every sensible man knew had no bearing upon Free Trade at all. He did not know whether the Government were going to accept the Amendment or not; but he trusted that when the time came for proposing that a Commission of Inquiry should be appointed, in no hostile or Party spirit, but with the idea of ascertaining what was really good for trade and for the people of the country, the Government would consent to the proposal of his hon. Friend that a Commission of Inquiry should be issued.

MR. SLAGG said, he must confess that he always listened to the speeches of his hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Eceyrd) with very great interest. They must all agree that his hon. Friend evinced great intelligence in the manner in which he explained his views to the House; and in reference to a remark which had been made that they might possibly lose the presence of the Member for Preston among them, he would only say this—that he would rather submit to the annual recurrence of this debate on Fair Trade than lose the companionship of so agreeable a Member. The debate that night had taken essentially an agricultural turn, and he would not presume, in the presence of so many high agricultural authorities opposite, to attempt to enlighten the House upon the subject. But surely it must occur to hon. Members who asked for inquiry as to the effect of Protection in regard to agricultural produce, that that inquiry had already been made over and over again in the experience of this country. They had gone through the experience of Protection; they knew what results it produced; they knew that it made the people poor and starving, and, instead of assisting agriculture and the farmers, they knew that it had succeeded only in putting a little into the pockets of the landlords. He would be quite willing to concur with his hon. Friend as to the desirableness of an inquiry, if it were only directed to discovering some method of agriculture which might increase the profits of those engaged in that particular industry. But it was perfectly clear that that was not what hon. Members wanted. They wanted something totally different, and, to put it in plain words, what they were asking the House to assent to, by some process more or less roundabout, was a recurrence to the system of Protection, plain and simple. They complained, in so many words, of the curse of cheap food. Now, he could not agree with them that cheap food was undesirable. The hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) said that lambs were too cheap, that heifers were too cheap, and that corn was too cheap.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT: I did not say anything of the kind.

MR. SLAGG said, he had understood the hon. and gallant Baronet to deplore the cheapness of those articles. He thought the expression used by the hon. and gallant Baronet was that they were deplorably cheap.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT: No; I did not say so.

MR. SLAGG said, he was sorry if he had misrepresented the hon. and gallant Baronet. He (Mr. Slagg) always looked upon cheap food as the great blessing to the country; and when hon. Members talked of commercial depression, he would ask them what that commercial depression would be if it were accompanied at this moment by dearthness of food? They had tried Protection, and, in his opinion, it had absolutely failed; and he was perfectly sure that it was in vain for hon. Members to seek to induce the country to accept such a monstrous system again. Coming to the textile industries of the country, he altogether dissented from the description which had been given by hon. Gentlemen opposite as to the extreme degree of destitution which existed in the commercial world. Such destitution did not exist. He would not weary the House with those always accepted and strong indications of the prosperity of the country, such as the Savings Banks, Income Tax, and Pauperism Returns; but he would take the condition of industry in his part of the world—of which he might be supposed to know something—and he declined to admit that there was anything in the condition of that large textile industry, the cotton trade, which could afford the slightest ground for the belief that our manufactures were languishing. On the contrary, they were largely increasing in productive power, and the people engaged in them did not, as a rule, act as if they entertained an idea that their industry was in a condition of despair. He had always been taught to believe that the prosperity and well-being of the large masses of the people was far more important than the profits of the limited few. The industrial population, as a whole, were in a condition that would compare most favourably with any previous condition with which it could be compared. It was perfectly true that the profits were not so excessive to the manufacturer and the merchant, and, in his humble judgment, they were not very likely ever to be so again; but if they looked at the price of ordinary Stock—for instance, at the investments in the best railways—they surely afforded a fair index of what they might expect in regard to any other sort of industry. The fact was that they were suffering, if they were suffering from anything at all, from over-production, and he ventured to say, in some aspects, from over-prosperity. There was a very great deal of money in the country seeking investment; the competition was very great, and, as a natural consequence, profits had been reduced. That was the case, clearly, in the cotton trade, where the enterprize was as great as ever. He dare say hon. Members would tell him that there were other industries, such as the iron, coal, and shipbuilding trades, which were not so well off. But they were suffering also, he suspected, from over-production. And it stood to reason that if we supplied 10,000 tons or 10,000 pieces where only 5,000 could be consumed, it was unreasonable to expect that a considerable profit, or in many cases any profit at all, could be realized. He should have been more gratified, and certainly more enlightened, if this debate had taken the turn of conferring some definite information as to what hon. Members wanted by the inquiry they asked for. He had been very much impressed by one or two remarks which had fallen from his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council. He cordially agreed with his right hon. Friend that an inquiry into those methods of manufacture and those special industries in which this country was not so efficient as it ought to be, would be very useful. Our commerce, in his opinion, was suffering at the present day from two fundamental causes—one was over-production in the industries which we knew and understood, and in which we were still able to rival the whole world; while the other was the fact that we were unacquainted with very many branches of industry in regard to which we ought to supply ourselves, instead of being supplied by foreign nations. He had had the honour of sitting on a Royal Commission appointed to inquire into Technical Instruction; and during the course of the journeys he had made to several Continental countries, he had been strongly impressed with this fact—that in those industries in which artistic excellence took a part, and in those industries which depended on high scientific skill and knowledge, this country did not occupy the position which it certainly ought to occupy. If we would only bestir ourselves, as his right hon. Friend knew so well how to do, in matters of technical education, he was perfectly satisfied that we should hear in future a very great deal less of depression of trade. He would ask hon. Members opposite what amount of Protection—because that was really in their minds—could possibly avail the industries of this country? It was obvious that the competition with which we were contending was not an artificial but a natural competition. His hon.

Mr. Slagg

Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Ecroyd) advocated a large railway extension in India. No doubt, his hon. Friend was aware that such an extension had already been considered and sanctioned by a Committee of the House of Commons, and, in the course of the next few years there would be laid down in India probably some 6,000 or 7,000 additional miles of railway. What were those railways going to do? They would bring over to this country from India wheat at a lower price than it could be produced for here. In some parts of India wheat could be grown for as little as 6s. a-quarter; and he would ask hon. Members how they could hope to compete with such a figure as that? The result would be that wheat would be brought over at a very low rate, and it would be necessary, in order to endure such competition, for farmers to consider carefully in what way they could best cultivate the soil rather than trust to the cultivation of wheat, which was evidently not best adapted to the agricultural requirements of the country. Again, looking at the condition of the working classes, he could not see any reason for this Motion. There was one indication always interesting, and that was the way in which that class spent their earnings and occupied their leisure; and he thought hon. Members must agree, that if they were able to spend considerable sums of money in recreation—if they could go in enormous numbers, as they did, to the seaside—their case could not be a very hard one. The hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. S. Smith) had said that the people of the country wasted a good deal of money, and, as a matter of fact, £125,000,000 was spent annually on alcoholic liquors. Surely this was not all needed. Finally, he believed that the welfare of the working classes was to be attained in other ways than by the expedient which hon. Members opposite had in view—namely, by the extension amongst them of technical education, and by promoting the improvement and enlargement of our industries, by diffusing amongst them a knowledge of science and art, and by developing foreign markets. Those means, he was convinced, would do a great deal more to improve the condition of the national commerce than debates of this kind, treading on the fringe of an obsolete system which was not likely to be again adopted by the people of this country.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Slagg) had made a most becoming speech; no one could have doubted that it was the expression of the opinions of that hon. Member, whose argument, although neatly put, was solely in favour of his own constituency. The hon. Member had glanced at the condition of several branches of trade and industry, and the drift of his address was this—that he recommended that all employed in agriculture and manufactures should seek further knowledge of their business. He (Mr. Newdegate) confessed that he needed education, but did not and would not accept education, as the hon. Member for Manchester was ready to do, exclusively from the Vice President of the Council. It had rather amused him to hear the hon. Member speak as he had of the "miserable condition" of the trade in textile fabrics in the Midland Counties. He (Mr. Newdegate) had represented the ribbon and silk trade while it existed in Coventry and North Warwickshire. But was it in a miserable condition? He was in a position to afford the House an illustration of its condition. Ribbon made within four miles of his house was exhibited at the Silk Exhibition in Paris, and won the first prize. Did that show a miserable condition, or a want of skill, such as the hon. Member for Manchester imagined to exist in the trade? But the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister succeeded in passing the Treaty of July, 1860; and what was the consequence? In the following September, he (Mr. Newdegate) was Chairman of a Relief Committee with 21,000 persons to provide for. That, he said, was an instance of the danger to all classes in the country of the Governmental teaching which the hon. Member for Manchester would have the House acknowledge. The subscribers to the Relief Fund he had alluded to included Her Majesty, who, with her wonted benevolence, sent 100 guineas; the Prince of Wales, who sent 200 guineas; and the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, who sent 100 guineas, to assist—which probably he would not have done had he been of the same temper as the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler), who said he denied that the Government or

Parliament of this country were bound to provide the people with the means of living. He asked himself whether the Educators of the people intended to propose a repeal of the Poor Law, and to what length this form of political economy would extend? Again, the hon. Member for Manchester spoke, as a mild illustration of his argument, of a Petition that came years ago from Manchester, in which the capitalists of that city, whose profits, it appeared, were tolerably large, declared that their capital owed no allegiance to the soil. Having studied the subject for years, he was able to say that the only distinct and systematic list of Customs Duties of all nations then in the Library of the House of Commons was his production, so determined had been successive Governments not to afford the means of education in that respect; and he received for the document in question the thanks of the agricultural and commercial interests in the United Kingdom. In preparing that list, he had been actuated by a desire to show Her Majesty's Government how practicable a thing it was to put the information at their command into a form that would be intelligible to the people at large. He repeated that he needed education in this matter; and he claimed for his constituents more than that—namely, impartial evidence, together with the power on the part of a Committee or Royal Commission which should force the production of facts. The education of the school to which the hon. Member for Manchester belonged, and which, so far as it was represented in the Government Department by the right hon. Gentleman who had spoken third that evening (Mr. Mundella), habitually, wilfully, and persistently denied the people of the country access to the tariffs of foreign countries in a form that they could understand. Believing that in the event of war the safety of this country, together with its greatness and independence as the centre of the Empire, depended on her people and her armies having a proper food supply—believing that men must eat before they could fight, even in defence of their hearths and homes—he was naturally anxious as to the state of the National Commissariat. Had the National Commissariat not been under skilful management in 1803-6, this country would have been starved into subjection to the First Napoleon.

Mr. Newdegate

Our population was then only 17,000,000, as against 35,000,000 at the present time. In 1802-6 we had provision, home-grown, for nine months, while at this moment we had not provision for more than seven months. Our Navy was deficient. And for that and the other reasons stated he could not join the hon. Members for Manchester and Cambridge in the views they entertained with regard to what he considered to be the primary means of national defence. Therefore, in their opinion, he needed education, and he should consider it a manifestation of Parliamentary hard-heartedness if they denied him the opportunity which he desired of becoming better informed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): Sir, we have listened for some hours to a very interesting and, to my mind, useful debate, and it is my intention to contribute to it at this time (12.35) but a very few words. Amongst the speeches which have been delivered in the course of the debate, I wish to refer particularly to that of the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Ecroyd), who has contributed very useful matter to the discussion, although, as a Free Trader, I cannot, of course, agree with him on many points. With regard to the general subject, the complaint of the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver) is that there is, in the Speech from the Throne, no paragraph directing our attention to the depressed condition of Commerce and Agriculture. I have listened attentively to all the speeches on this Motion, and I would ask what really is the omission of which hon. Members opposite complain? The Speech from the Throne, at the end of last Session, referred to the favourable condition of the weather up to that time, and to the prospects of a fine autumn; and the fact has been that during the months which have since elapsed, the weather has been all that could be desired, and has realized the expectations which Her Majesty placed before Parliament. The summer and autumn have been the most remarkable that the country has enjoyed for 20 years past. What is it, then, that Her Majesty's Government ought to have said? Ought they to have put into Her Majesty's mouth words of this kind—"The anticipations which I put before you concerning the weather have proved to be correct. We have had very fine weather; and the prices of the first commodities required for the enjoyment and comfort of the people, are lower than they have been for a long time past?" Sir, I think that to have put such words into the mouth of Her Majesty three months after the Speech at the end of last Session, would only have been ridiculous. But the discussion has not been directed to certain words which might have been introduced into that Speech; the complaint of most speakers being that we have not indicated a wish to appoint a Joint Committee or a Royal Commission to inquire into the present state of Agriculture and Commerce. That, therefore, is practically a complaint which is covered by words very different from those of the Amendment before us; and here I may, perhaps, be allowed to point out the great inconvenience resulting from a debate upon something totally different from that contained in the Motion on which the debate arises. Then, Sir, I would ask what is the line of argument taken by the hon. Member for Birkenhead, who commenced this discussion, and by the hon. Member for Preston, who followed him? The line of argument of those hon. Members has been very remarkable. The hon. Member for Birkenhead said that he disbelieved all statistics and all the news to be met with in the newspapers; and what he really founded his view of the present condition of trade upon was his experience of the failure of a woollen mill in which he was a partner, the failure of that mill having led him to believe that the state of the woollen trade was altogether unsatisfactory. Now, on the question so raised by the hon. Gentleman, I am only going to make one remark, and that is this. He wishes the House to believe—and the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Eeroyd), who followed him in the same line, wishes the House to believe—that it is our interest to promote the export of our manufactured goods by putting duties upon similar goods imported from foreign countries. Now, the answer to that I venture to give in one word. I will not take past years, but the present year. The only figures I should like the House to notice and to weigh, are these—that during the first nine months of the present year we exported in manufactured goods to other countries, £158,000,000 worth, and that we imported manufactured goods from other countries, £41,000,000 worth. These figures appear to me absolutely conclusive that, so far from our taking any steps with respect to duties on manufactured goods coming to this country which might provoke the foreigner, our great interest is the interest of an exporting country, and that, therefore, there could not be any worse policy than risking that enormous amount of exports by, in any way, irritating our foreign customers by placing a duty upon the comparatively small amount of manufactured goods that comes into this country. I will not carry the argument further, but leave these figures, which I do not think have been given in this debate previously, with the House. They show, I think, what our interest is in respect of manufacturers—namely, that of a large exporter and a comparatively small importer. Let me now deal with the only other illustration of declining trade which was given by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver). The hon. Gentleman was very pressing with respect to the state of the shipbuilding trade. He gave us figures to show that we were in considerable peril from the rivalry between our shipbuilding business and that of other nations, especially that of France. Again, I will only give one set of figures. The tonnage of ships built in this country has increased rapidly of late, until, in 1882, it reached 783,000 tons, and in 1883, 892,000 tons, of which 106,000 and 123,000 tons respectively were built for the foreigner. Now, the entire tonnage of ships built in France during the year 1882 was 56,000—that is to say, something like 1-15th part of what is built in this country—and the country which used to be our great rival in shipbuilding, I mean the United States, only built in 1883, 265,000 tons, that is to say, considerably less than a third of the amount of shipbuilding in this country. The fact, therefore, is that, so far from the rivalry of France being a matter of any considerable importance, France is shown to have built altogether very much less tonnage in ships than we ourselves built for foreigners alone, putting aside altogether the very large amount that we built for ourselves. The notion that there is some great danger to our shipbuilding interest from the rivalry of

France, the tonnage of which is diminishing instead of increasing, is, therefore, out of the question. Let me say a word or two in reference to the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Preston (Mr. ECROYD). Let me ask the hon. Member, however, what, after all, his speech came to? He gave us some facts as to the state of the cotton and iron trades, and beginning with the year 1869 he carried his comparison down to 1883. My right hon. Friend (Mr. Mundella) has proved conclusively that the comparisons he gave are unfair, because the peculiar circumstances of the years 1870, 1871, and 1872, affected by the Franco-German War, rendered a comparison of that time with the subsequent period impossible. And what is the case when you compare the present time with 1869, which was not disturbed by the Franco-German War? In 1869 the exports of cotton manufactures exceeded the imports by £52,000,000, while in 1883 the excess amounted to £60,000,000. The experience was just the same with respect to iron and steel. In 1869 the exports exceeded the imports by £21,500,000, and in 1883 the excess amounted to £25,250,000. These figures show a great improvement in the two trades in 1883 over 1869.

MR. ECROYD: Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to make an explanation? I took the two periods as being, the first period the first five years, and the latter period the last five years, of the last 15 years. I may remark that in the first two years—1869 and 1870—prices were low.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): But the first period was one of extreme inflation in consequence of the Franco-German War. I ask the hon. Gentleman (Mr. ECROYD) what are the other plans which are put before the House this evening? The hon. Gentleman proposes to have a system of what is popularly called "Fair Trade."

MR. ECROYD: I purposely avoided entering into the details of those plans which I laid before the House in detail a year or two ago.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I am entitled to take the hon. Gentleman's speech of to-night in conjunction with his former speeches; we have to deal distinctly with the proposal with which the hon.

Member has so long been identified. The hon. Gentleman not only proposed the alteration of our fiscal system, which would be involved in the adoption of the principles of "Fair Trade," but he proposed that £20,000,000 or £30,000,000 sterling might be expended every year on railways in India—that we should take, by loan or otherwise, out of this country, £20,000,000 or £30,000,000 sterling every year, and spend it on Indian railways. He suggested that the necessary amount should be raised by taxes on American corn.

MR. ECROYD: I must beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. When I alluded to the taxing of American corn as a means of promoting the construction of Indian railways, it was with the view of the effect of a preferential treatment applied to India in inducing private enterprise to find the money necessary.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I do not quite see the difference. At any rate, as part of his proposition, there is to be a tax on American corn. Let me ask the House whether that is not simply a proposal that this country should go back from Free Trade and commence again a system of differential duties based upon Reciprocity arrangements? We are asked in 1884 to go back to those Reciprocity arrangements which Parliament gave up 40 years ago. It is very well we should know that when we are invited by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mac Iver) who made this Motion, and by other hon. Gentlemen, to undertake an examination of the present condition of trade, that examination is proposed by them with the express hope that that will be the result of the examination. I am addressing a body of Gentlemen who, I believe, are by a very large majority confirmed Free Traders; and it is only fair to ask what is the use of our entertaining a proposal to reverse Free Trade in favour of Reciprocity, when it is perfectly well known that the country will not listen for a moment to such a proposal? ["Oh, oh!"] Well, that is my view, and I have stated it in very moderate terms. Then, the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), who supported this Motion, dealt not so much with the questions raised by the hon. Member (Mr. ECROYD) as with the other recommendations, which he hoped would be the outcome of the proposed inquiry. He proposed, in the first place, that Local Authorities should have, what he called, more subsidies. My hon. and gallant Friend went on to give his views with respect to Free Trade. He said that, without any hesitation, he would propose to raise £10,000,000 sterling a-year by way of Customs duties; and he begged us to follow the example of Prince Bismarck, who, he said, kept his country in the strongest bonds of Protection.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT: No, Sir; I did not say anything of that kind. What I did say was this, that it was a very extraordinary thing that we alone of all countries were Free Traders; and although some people might use very strong language, I did not think they would call Prince Bismarck a fool, and yet he is a Protectionist.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I really do not see the difference. He certainly said that Prince Bismarck kept his country in the strongest bonds of Protection, and that this was no folly. If not approvingly, I do not quite know what object the hon. and gallant Gentleman had in referring to Prince Bismarck at all. Something has been said about an Imperial Zollverein. If time permitted, I think I should be able to show the House that anything like the adaptation of the German Zollverein system to our Empire, with its distant Colonies, would be absolutely impossible. I have endeavoured to condense in the very smallest compass my observations upon the proposals which have been made to-night from the other side of the House. My observations may be summed up thus. Is the House prepared to censure us for not having referred to the present condition of Agriculture and Commerce in the Queen's Speech, and is it prepared to censure us for that omission on the ground stated by those who have proposed the censure—namely, that this country ought to give up the system of Free Trade and adopt again, either as proposed by the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Eeroyd), or as proposed by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), a system which is nothing more or less than Protection—protection of certain interests in this country which are supposed to be benefited by duties levied on imported goods similar to those which we either produce or manufacture? That seems to me to be the simple question before us to-night; and I must say I should be very much disappointed if the House, which as yet has never shown itself disposed to adopt Protectionist doctrines, did, under cover of a Resolution of this kind, censure the Government. I have been very much tempted to carry the case further. I should have liked to have referred to the Report of the Duke of Richmond's Commission, and to the remarks which have been made as to the portions of that Report which we have adopted or have not adopted; but I think I shall be consulting the convenience of the House if I now conclude by an expression of the hope that the House will negative this Resolution.

SIR EDMUND LECHMERE said, he would not detain the House more than a few moments; but representing, as he did, both agriculture and trade, and trade, perhaps, more than agriculture, he wished to make a few observations. By the remarks made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he could not but feel that the question had been presented to the House on a false issue. What the trading classes of the country asked for was simply an inquiry. They were not desirous of passing a Vote of Censure on the Government; but they felt that the experience they had had of Free Trade during the last 30 years was such as to render it desirable that an inquiry should take place into its working. The House had had sufficient proof to-night that there was great depression in trade; but whether or not that depression should be mentioned in the Queen's Speech was a matter of opinion. There could, however, be but one opinion that the time had come when there should be a fair and impartial inquiry as to the desirability of continuing the policy of Free Trade. America, by its Protective Duties, had brought about the establishment of large steel and iron interests, which were completely excluding our iron from their markets. France, Germany, Italy were excluding our traders from their markets; and our own Colonies made us pay duties on our cotton manufactures imported to them. This being the state of affairs, the time seemed to have arrived for a fair inquiry; and he hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Ecroyd) would decide the question by going to a Division.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 67; Noes 86: Majority 19.—(Div. List, No. 3.)

Main Question again proposed.

MR. SEXTON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Sexton.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, he noticed that to-day the hon. Gentleman the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had placed an Amendment on the Paper; and what he had to ask the hon. Gentleman to do was to allow the Address to be passed now, and take his Amendment on Report. ["No!"] He was appealing to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Sligo, and was asking him, considering the great importance of time, and the necessity of getting through the stages of the Address as rapidly as possible, to take his Amendment on Report, which would be the first Order on Monday. The hon. Gentleman would then be able to make his statement at length, and by adopting the suggestion would greatly promote the interests of Public Business.

MR. HEALY: As a point of Order, Mr. Speaker, may I ask you to put the Question?

MR. SPEAKER: I put the Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned." That is the Question before the House.

MR. PARNELL said, he listened very attentively to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but he failed to see he made out his case—that any time would be gained by the adoption of the course which he urged upon the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). The case that the Irish Party had to make against the general administration of the law in Ireland was distinguished from the particular administration of law as exemplified by the Maamtrasna case, and it would take just as much time to state properly. It would not take any less time if taken on the Report stage of the Address than if it were taken on the present stage. Besides, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Brighton (Mr. Marriott) had given Notice of an Amendment on the Report stage, and as that Motion would have precedence over any Motion which could now be put down by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sexton), if his hon. Friend were to accede to the request which had been made to him by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he would be required to defer the statement he wished to make until a later day than he was otherwise required to. They would, therefore, lose an advantage they had now got. They would derive no compensating benefit for the loss of that advantage, nor would the Government or the House or the country generally derive any gain whatever in the matter of speed or in the greater progress of the debate. It was really a question of robbing Peter to pay Paul. If they took the discussion on the Address it would occupy exactly the same time as it would take on the Report. On the other hand, if they yielded to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, they would, as he had shown, lose a very important advantage, and one which they considered all important, which they had now got by the position in which the Amendment of his hon. Friend now stood upon the Notice Paper.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not know whether he could alter the views of hon. Members opposite. He only wished to say that the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) was under a misapprehension, as there was no Notice down for the Report. Therefore, no other Motion would have priority over this if it were put down for the Report. No Motion could be put down until the present stage was passed, and there could be no recorded priority over the Motion of the hon. Member. Under these circumstances, he trusted that hon. Members opposite would consent to discuss the question they were anxious to raise on the Report, and it would certainly promote the public interests, if the present stage of the Address were now taken.

MR. LEAMY said, he failed to see why the Irish Members should give way, and deprive themselves of the advantage they now possessed. They had had sufficient experience of the Government to know that they were not likely to study or concern themselves with the feeling of the Irish people in regard to the administration of the law. He, therefore, did not see why the Irish Members should allow themselves to be shorn of the advantage they had gained.

MR. HEALY said, he had waited attentively to see whether the Home Secretary would point out to the House what advantage would be gained by following the course suggested. He had listened with great respect to the two speeches which had been delivered on that question; but he failed to see the slightest advantage that would be obtained. They were all anxious to get on, but not the smallest advantage had been shown to the Irish Members why they should accept the proposal now made to them. His hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) said that the time lost now would be lost on the Report, and the Government must remember that the lives and liberties of the Irish people were at stake. They had already been treated in the foulest manner in the Cornwall trial. He did not wish to go into that matter; but he would adduce that case as an instance. Therefore, at that late hour of the night (1.30), he had no doubt the Chancellor of the Exchequer would withdraw his suggestion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS) said, that, with the permission of the House, he would make an explanation. If the Motion of the hon. Gentleman were taken on the present stage of the Address, there would still remain another day before the Report could be taken; whereas, if it were taken on the Report, a day would be saved. He hoped he made himself understood?

MR. HEALY: No.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS) would explain again. The House was now engaged on the consideration of the Address. If the Motion of the hon. Member were not pressed now the Address would be voted, and the Report stage only would remain. The Amendment, in that case, would be taken on Monday at exactly the same hour as it would be taken if the debate on the Address were now adjourned; but a day would in reality be gained, because, if the debate were adjourned, the Report of the Address could not be taken until Tuesday.

MR. BIGGAR said, he really knew as much about the matter as he did before. It seemed to him that the Government had some special object in evading the real point of the case. If the discussion took place and ended on Monday, the Report would be taken on Tuesday; and supposing they finished the debate stage that night, and the Report stage on Monday, the matter would be just in the same position. He really did not see why the suggestion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been made at all, and he thought that, in common fairness to those who were asked to give way, the Government should state their real motive.

MR. GRAY said, he did not think the difficulty in which the Government were placed, and which had induced the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make his suggestion, was insuperable; whereas the sacrifice he asked of his hon. Friend was a more serious one than the right hon. Gentleman seemed to think. There was nothing, as he (Mr. Gray) understood, in the Forms of the House to prevent the Report stage being taken after the present stage, on the same night, by the leave of the House. Assuming the debate on the Address to be satisfactorily closed on Monday, he imagined, although he did not profess to be a master of the technical Rules of the House, that it would be perfectly competent for the right hon. Gentleman to propose, with the leave of the House, that the Report stage be taken the same night. That would dispose of the difficulty of the right hon. Gentleman, presuming there was no desire to continue the debate over Monday. Assuming the House to be satisfied with the debate, the two stages could be taken on Monday as easily as the one. But the difference to his hon. Friend would be a very serious one. His hon. Friend wished to raise a question which he deemed to be of vital importance. If he raised it on the present stage, and the reply of the Government was unsatisfactory, he would be within his right in raising it again on the Report stage. If, on the contrary, he agreed to the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman, and the reply of the Government was unsatisfactory, he would lose the opportunity he now had of again raising the question. Therefore, he (Mr. Gray) submitted that the argument for adjourning the debate was all on the side of his hon. Friend. His hon. Friend was now asked to give up a really solid advantage, and the right he now possessed of raising the question a second time on the Report. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would see that the proposal was a fair one.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, he was much obliged to the hon. Gentleman for his suggestion.

Question put, and agreed to.

QUEEN'S SPEECH—HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE LORD STEWARD OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Earl SYDNEY) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as follows:—

MY LORDS,

"I THANK you for your loyal and dutiful Address.

"You may rely on My hearty Desire to co-operate with you in all measures calculated to maintain the peace and prosperity of My Empire.

"I receive with satisfaction your assurance that the important Measure to be submitted to you will receive your careful consideration.

QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I propose, at the rising of the House, to move that we do adjourn to Thursday next, on which day an important Motion stands on the Order Paper in the name of the noble Earl (the Earl of Dunraven) with reference to the state of trade and industry.

The MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, on this Notice, I will take the opportunity, in agreeing to the proposal of the noble Earl, to ask him a Question with respect to the very grave news that has been circulated in London during the last 48 hours. It is stated—I do not know whether it is in regular form for me to mention it, but it appears in all the papers—that Her Majesty and His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales have received telegrams from the Khedive announcing the fall of Khartoum. I wish to know, whether, within the knowledge of the noble Earl, that is accurate; and, further, whether any information has been received from Sir Evelyn Baring on the point; and, also, whether inquiries have been addressed by the Foreign Office to Sir Evelyn Baring or to Lord Wolseley, to know what is the latest state of their information upon a rumour which, unhappily, is far from impossible?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, in answer to the Question of the noble Marquess, I have to state that, on seeing the paragraph in The Times of this morning, I took the liberty of inquiring of the Prince of Wales as to whether there was any truth in the report, and I am authorized by His Royal Highness to state that it is absolutely without foundation; that he had received no message from the Khedive on the subject; and that the only information he had was in a telegram courteously forwarded to him by one of the News Associations on Saturday evening. I may state that I also took the liberty of inquiring at Balmoral; and I have only this minute received an answer exactly to the same effect as that from the illustrious Prince on the Cross Benches — namely, that there is no foundation whatever for stating that Her Majesty had received any such report. Of course, it is impossible for me to state that any rumour is without foundation; but we have no reason whatever to believe that this one is true. With regard to the question, whether I have made any inquiries myself of Sir Evelyn Baring, I waited yesterday to see whether any message would arrive from him; and it is perfectly impossible, if this message had really reached the Khedive, that in the course of a day Sir Evelyn Baring should not have given the information to us. But no such information having been received by us this morning, I sent a telegram to inquire of Sir Evelyn Baring, and we have not yet received any reply to it. My own conviction is that Sir Evelyn Baring does not believe in the rumour which has been set on foot.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY asked whether the noble Earl had sent a contradiction to the evening newspapers; and, if not, why?

EARL GRANVILLE, in reply to the Question why the contradiction had been sent to some of the evening papers and not to all, said, that he had not sent a message to any evening paper. Whoever had done so seemed to have sent it to one Conservative and one Liberal paper.

EGYPT (EXPEDITIONARY FORCE TO THE SOUDAN)—INSTRUCTIONS TO GENERAL LORD WOLSELEY.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I want, before we adjourn, to ask the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) for some explanation with respect to the draft of the Instructions given to General Lord Wolseley which have been laid on the Table since our last separation. They are very remarkable Instructions, both in their origin and in their character. My memory may mislead me; but I doubt whether I have ever seen the genesis of Instructions laid bare in an official manner as they are in these documents. It is here stated that Lord Wolseley was requested to draw up his own Instructions, with the help of Sir Evelyn Baring, and they were then sent home for confirmation, and were afterwards returned to that noble and gallant Lord. Of course, the inconvenience of such a method of drawing up of Instructions is obviously manifest; for, by it, the noble Earl practically escapes, on behalf of the Government, from any responsibility for those Instructions. They are the Instructions, not of the noble Earl, or of any Member of the Government, but of Sir Evelyn Baring and Lord Wolseley and Lord Northbrook, who was not then acting in any Ministerial capacity. I feel that this is an unfortunate variation from the ordinary rule with regard to such matters; but the matter of the Instructions themselves is even more remarkable than the mode of their origin. We were told at the beginning of the year that great exertions were being made by Her Majesty's Government, and that the great expense which was being incurred was for the purpose of carrying out a policy described in the terms "A policy of rescue and retire." The rescue was directed towards the unfortunate garrisons which found themselves enclosed by a hostile population, when the Government, unfortunately, announced their intention to force the Egyptian Government to abandon the Soudan. The rescue, as I have said, applied to these garrisons; but what we know is that the last great effort made by the Government does not extend to all the garrisons, nor to anything like it. The Instructions of Her Majesty's Government are somewhat difficult to read or understand; but, as far as I can interpret them, they extend only to two individuals, one of whom there is only too much reason to believe is past the possibility of rescue now altogether. Now, the words of the Instructions at the beginning are as clear as they possibly could be desired. They state that—

"The primary object of the Expedition up the Valley of the Nile is to bring away General Gordon and Colonel Stewart from Khartoum. When that object has been secured, no further offensive operations of any kind are to be undertaken."

No doubt, at the end of the Instructions, there is a reference also to the possibility and the desirability of bringing away the Egyptian troops and the civil employés from Khartoum; but this, apparently, is only mentioned as a point which arises in connection with the method of carrying the primary object—the policy of abandonment—into execution. There is, however, no recall of the imperative order which is placed at the head of the Instructions—namely, that no further offensive operations of any kind are to be undertaken when once General Gordon and Colonel Stewart are in safety. It seems, therefore, that as far as offensive operations go, as far as any forcible operations are concerned, no steps are to be taken for rescuing the garrisons of Khartoum. The garrison of Kassala, also, is not to be rescued—at all events, by the adoption of offensive operations. It is to be brought about, if at all, by negotiations with the friendly tribes, and this, it is thought, can be most effectually and conveniently undertaken from Suakin and Massowah. The garrisons of Darfur and Bahr El Gazelle are summarily disposed of, with the statement that their rescue is impossible; while the rescue of Sinkat, Tokar, and Shendy has, I need not say, already become impossible, because, while the Government were delaying and thinking how their policy was to be carried out, the garrisons of these places have mostly been cruelly massacred—put to the sword. There now remains Sennaar, and with respect to it the Instructions are in these terms—

And nothing further is said to show that the Government intend taking any other steps to rescue the garrison there. It results from this summary of the Instructions, therefore, if I have rightly read the Instructions, that the policy of "rescue and retire" now confines itself entirely to the rescue of the two men who were sent to accomplish the rescue of the others. The declaration by the Government that the Soudan was to be surrendered placed all these garrisons in imminent peril. Before that declaration was made, the Egyptian garrison of Khartoum, under Colonel Coetlogon, might have been withdrawn without difficulty; but, afterwards, difficulties, no doubt, arose. When they heard of Baker's defeat, the only measure adopted by Her Majesty's Government with respect to the internal garrisons was to send out General Gordon and Colonel Stewart to Khartoum; and now we are told that the only offensive operations that they will take will be for the purpose of remedying that wild and ill-considered step, and simply to rescue the two men who were sent on an impossible mission in February last. The whole policy of rescuing the garrisons has been abandoned by Her Majesty's Government. But that is not the worst. If they are successful in rescuing General Gordon and Colonel Stewart, they will not only fail to rescue Sennaar, but they will absolutely close the door against the garrison that is in that place; in fact, they will sign the death-warrant of the unfortunate men in that garrison, if they are faithful, just as distinctly as if they had done it in a more formal and regular way. Perhaps the noble Earl will tell me that these Instructions do not bear the exact meaning that I put upon them, and that there is something else in the policy of Her Majesty's Government than what I have indicated. For the sake of the reputation and humanity of this country, I would be glad to believe that that is so, because I am sure that the utter abandonment of these unfortunate men will leave a stain on the honour of this country which it will require many subsequent victories to remove.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I have to thank the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) for his courtesy in having given me Notice that he intended to make these observations. I should like, though, to ask him whether it has never happened to him, in the course of his official experience at the India Office or the Foreign Office, that Instructions have been drafted by the person who is to carry them out, subject, of course, to the sanction, approval, and correction of himself and the Government, and the entire responsibility of the Government who gave them? These Instructions were drawn up by the noble Earl behind me (the Earl of Northbrook) and by Sir Evelyn Baring, in concurrence with Lord Wolseley. I cannot conceive a more business-like and practical way of doing what was to be done. Then these draft Instructions, before they had any validity whatever, were submitted to Her Majesty's Government, who carefully considered them, and as they did not perceive the objections to them which the noble Marquess has tried to raise, Her Majesty's Government took the whole responsibility of sanctioning these Instructions. I cannot say that the noble Marquess is more correct in his historical statements. He told your Lordships that the garrisons of Sinkat and Tokar and Shendy were massacred.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I said the greater part of the garrisons, particularly as regards Shendy.

EARL GRANVILLE: The greater part! That is a great qualification, certainly; but even that is, I submit, not in accordance with facts, for although there was a massacre at Sinkat, there was none at Tokar, but the garrison arrived safe. That is not a very important point, perhaps; but really, when the noble Marquess makes such severe charges against the Government, a little accuracy of statement is desirable. Then the noble Marquess says that we did all the mischief by announcing that the Egyptians were to evacuate the Soudan. But the Government did not do anything of the sort. We kept the intention perfectly secret; but it was impossible not to give the advice which we did give to the Egyptian Government, and the announcement that the plans and policy of Her Majesty's Government had been formed came from Cairo, and not from us. We were absolutely innocent of any complicity in making it public. Then, again, the noble Marquess says that we have entirely abandoned our policy of the complete evacuation of all the garrisons in the Soudan. I utterly deny that that ever was our policy; but we tried to do what we could to that effect, and took a very bold measure, which was very much condemned, but which, at this moment, does not appear to be so unsuccessful as it is represented to be by noble Lords opposite, by accepting the gallant and spirited offer of General Gordon, showing an extraordinary confidence in himself, which has been, I think, perfectly justified, even supposing this dreadful rumour be true. I think that the Government are in a great degree justified in the confidence which they felt in that extraordinary man being able to accomplish a policy which he himself should carry out. The noble Marquess goes on, time after time, pressing us to exercise force, sometimes at Alexandria, sometimes at Suakin, and in different ways, and then immediately after he turns round and blames us for doing that very thing. But does the noble Marquess say that the advice of the great Conservative Party is that, by military operations, we should enable every garrison in the Soudan to evacuate the position that they hold? The noble Marquess refers to Khartoum, and I do not think there is any logic in his statement that we are going to abandon the Egyptian garrison who have behaved so well to General Gordon. The Instructions to General Gordon himself on this head are positive—

"You will use your best endeavours to insure the safe retreat of the Egyptian troops at Khartoum, and of the civil employés together with their wives."

Surely these are Instructions which are not compatible with what the noble Marquess calls a complete abandonment of the garrison of Khartoum? Then he talks about Sennaar. Is the noble Marquess aware that to send a military expedition there would entail another year of military operations? My noble Friend near me (the Earl of Northbrook) says that Lord Wolseley perfectly understands that the policy of the Government is, that this military expedition should not be lengthened to an extreme degree, but that Lord Wolseley also perfectly understands that that policy does not prevent him from taking such possible measures as may be suitable for facilitating the retreat of that garrison.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Am I to understand that the first part of the Instructions, which says that the primary object of the Expedition up the Nile is to bring back General Gordon and Colonel Stewart, and that no further offensive operations of any kind are to be taken—am I to understand that that is compatible with the permission to undertake offensive operations for the purpose of rescuing the garrison at Khartoum?

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: Perhaps I can answer that Question of the noble Marquess. I can assure him that General Gordon is not at all a likely man to leave Khartoum by himself.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: He may.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: The criticism of the noble Marquess involves the insulting supposition that General Gordon is a likely man to leave Khartoum by himself unaccompanied by the garrison or the people whom he wants to take away with him, and that under those circumstances Lord Wolseley will be precluded from making any efforts to relieve the garrison of Khartoum. That is an hypothesis which appears to me to be so improbable that it never occurred to me when I was a party to framing these Instructions. I assumed that General Gordon was the least likely man in the world to leave Khartoum unaccompanied, as I have said, by the garrison, or at least by that part of it which was willing to come away with him. That being so, it has never occurred to us that Lord Wolseley will be precluded from making any effort to relieve the garrison at Khartoum. As to the paragraph in the Instructions which the noble Marquess has endeavoured to separate from the first part of the contents of the document—namely, that paragraph which says—“You will use your best endeavours to insure the safe retreat of the Egyptian troops and civil employés,” it appears to me to be perfectly intelligible. It appears to me to bear on the face of it directions to Lord Wolseley to use the force at his disposal for the purpose of relieving the garrison. I can assure your Lordships that the hypercriticism of the noble Marquess never occurred to Lord Wolseley when he read these Instructions. I can assure the noble Marquess that we considered the position of Sennaar very carefully. He has read these Papers with great diligence; but he has refrained from alluding to a telegram which appears among them from General Gordon, in which he says that he has given instructions to the Egyptian garrison at Sennaar to return to Khartoum; and we believed, when our Instructions were framed, that the Egyptian garrison at Sennaar would have been brought back to Khartoum some time ago, in which case they would have been rescued. But I must say that, in my opinion, the English Government and English nation are not bound to spend the lives of Englishmen by sending them all through Central Africa for the purpose of relieving Egyptian garrisons—garrisons, mind you, which, from circumstances and reasons I will not further allude to, do not appear to be able to take any ordinary measures to protect themselves when they get into difficulty and danger. Therefore, my Lords, Her Majesty's Government, certainly from the first, have never undertaken to send expeditions into the Soudan in order to relieve those garrisons. The noble Earl behind me has very correctly stated that, if we had given Lord Wolseley Instructions to proceed to Sennaar, which is 200 miles from Khartoum, for the purpose of relieving the garrison there, it would probably have had the effect of delaying Her Majesty's Forces in Central Africa for another year. I do not think that is a measure which comes within the obligations of Her Majesty's Government; it is one which would hardly recommend itself to anyone who takes a reasonable view of the obligations of this country; and, what is still more important, it would be hardly consistent with the obligations to which Her Majesty's Government are bound of taking care of the lives of Her Majesty's Forces and not exposing them to undue risks. Therefore, I recommended that Lord Wolseley should be told that an expedition from Khartoum to Sennaar did not come within the view of Her Majesty's Government in despatching the forces under his command in the direction of Khartoum.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: With regard to leaving the inhabitants of Khartoum behind—

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: There is no question whatever that Lord Wolseley's Expedition is intended to rescue any of the civil employés and any members of the garrison who might wish to leave Khartoum.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN said, that he was going to observe that we ought to know that General Gordon would not abandon them, and he must, therefore, express his satisfaction that the noble Earl (the Earl of Northbrook) had stated distinctly that the object of Lord Wolsley was not merely to relieve General Gordon, but also to assist the garrison of Khartoum. As to the larger question, he must confess that he had heard the speech of the noble Earl with some amount of disappointment. In the contention that we had assumed no responsibility whatever with respect to the garrisons of the Soudan—that was to say, that in compelling the Khedive to abandon the Soudan we incurred no responsibility whatever—he could not take the view of Her Majesty's Government. It seemed to him that to abandon the garrisons there would be simply atrocious. The noble Earl said that if the garrison at Sennaar had gone down to Khartoum, they would have been rescued; but that if they had not gone down to Khartoum, they would be abandoned. He also said Lord Wolsley was informed that if he did anything to rescue that garrison, he would be going beyond his Instructions, but that there was another way by which it could be relieved. When the British Forces retired, he (the Earl of Dunraven) had no doubt that the garrison in Sennaar would either have to make what terms they could for themselves, or share the fate of the other garrisons of the Soudan. That Her Majesty's Government should make no attempt whatever to rescue the garrisons of the Soudan was greatly to be regretted, and it was a question whether in that case the Khedive had not a right to call in other assistance.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH said, he considered that General Gordon had been most unfairly treated by the supporters of Her Majesty's Government and by Her Majesty's Government also. General Gordon went out at the request of the Government, and, since then, he had not received from them any attention whatever. Speaking of Her Majesty's Government, General Gordon said that he had in no single respect received any support whatever. And though he had been sent out with unlimited powers to do what he liked and to make recommendations to Her Majesty's Government, the few recommendations that he had made had been one and all unattended to.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that in moving the adjournment, he could not move that the House do adjourn till Thursday, because it would meet to-morrow for Judicial Business. But their Lordships generally would not be required to attend before Thursday.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : The noble Earl (the Earl of Northbrook) has accused me of offering some insult to General Gordon. That is a formal answer that is always made from the Treasury Bench whenever I impugn their Egyptian policy. But I beg to say that, so far from being insulting to General Gordon in suggesting that he might leave Khartoum, if I remember rightly the distinct Instructions of Her Majesty's Government, sent out by telegram, were that he should leave Khartoum; and the last of the very interesting series of telegrams that we had in the spring, when communication with General Gordon was cut off, was a telegram from the noble Earl (Earl Granville), which was sent by six different routes, asking General Gordon, in angry terms, why he did not come away, and leave Khartoum. General Gordon answers, under date July 31, 1884—

"Reading over your telegram of the 5th of May, 1884, you ask me 'to state cause and intention in staying at Khartoum knowing Government means to abandon Soudan,' and in answer I say I stay at Khartoum because Arabs have shut us up and will not let us out; I also add that even if the road was open the people would not let me go unless I gave them some government, or took them with me, which I could not do. No one would leave more willingly than I would if it was possible."

And that is the insulting suggestion which the noble Earl said I made.

QUESTIONS.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND)—MONAGHAN LUNATIC ASYLUM—ALLEGED CRUELTY OF THE RESIDENT DOCTOR AND HOUSE STEWARD.

MR. BIGGAR asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether it is true that about 31st May last, at Monaghan Lunatic Asylum, the resident doctor, named Johnston, the house steward, named Patterson, and a warder, named Henderson, burned alive a cat; and, if true, whether he will order a prosecution?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND (MR. WALKER), in reply, said, that there was no information to confirm the allegation in the Question. There were some shavings lighted.

MR. BIGGAR said, the hon. and learned Gentleman had not answered the latter part of the Question.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, that if the hon. Member would furnish any information which he had in his possession the matter would be inquired into.

MR. BIGGAR asked whether or not it was stated that the Government had information in their possession on the subject at present?

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—“BOLTON v. IRISH NATIONAL PUBLISHING CO.”—USE OF OFFICIAL FILE.

MR. O'BRIEN asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether it is the fact that, on the hearing of the action of “Bolton v. Irish National Publishing Company,” at the Belfast Assizes, Mr. George Bolton admitted on cross-examination that he obtained letters for the purpose of his action from the file at the Castle on the order of the Under Secretary; whether any investigation has been held as to the circumstances under which a private litigant obtained access to the official file; and, whether, if Bolton's statement should prove true, steps will be taken to punish the persons culpable, in accordance with the pledge given last Session?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND (MR. WALKER), in reply, said, that Mr. Bolton had applied formally to the Under Secretary that some letters which were his own property, and that he forwarded to the authorities, should be sent to him for the purposes of his trial. The application was laid before the Attorney General for Ireland, who advised he was entitled to them, and they were accordingly handed over to him on his undertaking to return.

MR. O'BRIEN asked, would the hon. and learned Gentleman have any objection to state why, on a former occasion in that House, he said that the statement was untrue which he now admitted to be true?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND (MR. WALKER) was understood to state that he never said it was untrue.

MR. O'BRIEN: I beg your pardon.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND (MR. WALKER): I said he never had access to the file privately, and without authority.

MR. O'BRIEN: You distinctly stated—[“Order!”]

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

IRELAND—SEA AND COAST FISHERIES FUND ACT, 1884—THE TRUSTEES—TRANSFER OF FUNDS, &c.

MR. HEALY: asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If the funds and all property of the Trustees to aid Sea and Coast Fisheries of Ireland have been transferred to the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland, as directed by the Act 47 and 48 Vic. c. 21, which received the Royal Assent on the 3rd of July last; and, if so, on what date such transfer took place, and if he will cause a Return to be made by the Commissioners of Public Works showing exactly the particulars set forth in to-day's Notice Paper?

MR. COURTNEY, in reply, said, the property in question was transferred to the Board of Works on the 29th of September last. The Fishery Inspectors, who approve loans from these funds, were apprised of the transfer the same day. As I am not connected with their Department, I cannot say what they may have been doing since then. As regards the recovery of outstanding debts, applications have been made to each borrower and each surety in the arrear cases except those already in the hands of solicitors for collection, and those reported by the late Trustees to be irrecoverable, which are being specially investigated. Up to to-day 15 borrowers out of some 70 have repaid their arrears. I have intimated to the hon. Member that I am happy to agree to his Return, with some slight modifications.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Why, notwithstanding the provisions of the Act 47 and 48 Vic. c. 21, which received the Royal Assent on the 3rd July last, no loans have yet been made by the Commissioners of Public Works, or the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries, to poor fishermen, in counties to which the Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Acts are not at present applicable; if pressing applications for such have been made since the passing of that Act; and, if he will take the necessary steps to prevent further delays and great injury to these poor fishermen?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No fishery loans have yet been carried out under the Act in question. Some delay has been caused by reason of the necessary Rules not having been settled and passed by the Privy Council. I understand the Rules will be passed to-day. Any pending applications will be at once taken into consideration.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—BALLYCASTLE WORKHOUSE—DISMISSAL OF THE MASTER.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that the Master of Ballycastle Workhouse, county Antrim, has been dismissed from office by a sealed order of the Local Government Board, dated 4th September 1884, for refusing to detain a person who was being forced into the Workhouse against her wishes, although he considered he had no power by Law or Regulation to do so; whether it is a fact that the Guardians agree with the Master in this opinion, and whether the Local Government Board have since declined to inform the Guardians whether or not the Master had any power to detain this person against her own wishes; whether it is a fact that, on the same date that the Local Government Board communicated to the Guardians the dismissal of the Master, they forwarded a further communication to them stating that they had received the half-yearly report of their Inspector relating to the Ballycastle Workhouse, which stated that the management of the Workhouse was satisfactory; and, whether or not he agrees with the decision of the Local Government Board in this matter?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Master of Ballycastle Workhouse was removed by the Local Government Board, because they deemed him unfit to discharge the duties of his office. In the particular case mentioned in the Question, he allowed a woman who was a lunatic, unable to take care of herself or judge for herself, to leave the workhouse, in spite of the remonstrances of the medical officer, and in direct opposition to the instructions laid down for him by the Board to govern his conduct in such cases. Some of the Guardians take the Master's part; but many of them fully concur in the propriety of his removal. It is true that the Guardians were informed that in August last the Inspector reported favourably upon the general management of the workhouse. But the Local Government Board did not consider that they would be warranted in overlooking the Master's misconduct on this and former occasions. Last year they found it necessary to call upon him to resign, but consented to give him another trial at the request of the Guardians. I may remind the hon. Member that he was informed of this fact in answer to a Question on the 26th July, 1883.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—TRALEE BOARD OF GUARDIANS—EVICTION OF THOMAS M'ENERY.

MR. O'BRIEN (for Mr. HARRINGTON) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a Report of the meeting of the Tralee Board of Guardians on the 21st October, at which an evicted tenant, who sought admission to the Union, made the following statement, which was duly witnessed:—

"I, Thomas M'Enery, of Ashill, in this county, do hereby state that after the murder of Patrick Cahill I went to Ballyseedy House to settle about my rent, when I was told by Mr. Bennett, steward of the Ballyseedy Estate, that I knew about the killing of the man Patrick Cahill, and that I could get no hearing. This he repeated some time afterwards. After this, and on several occasions, Sergeant Galligan went to my house and met me, and said to my wife and myself that if we both took the money and told who killed Patrick Cahill we would be happy people, and could easily pay our rent. On Tuesday, the 2nd, I was evicted from my holding, and afterwards Sergeant Galligan told my wife, in my own hearing, that she was a foolish woman that did not take the money, and that if she would do it it would be easy for her to pay the rent. He repeated the same statement on more than one occasion. M'Carthy, the bailiff to the Ballyseedy Estate, stated that I would be reinstated if I or my wife told who killed Cahill. I have now to state publicly that either I nor my wife know nothing about the murder of this man, and that we are persecuted by those people trying to make us swear something."

whether he is aware that the Board directed this statement to be brought under the notice of Parliament; and, whether he will institute inquiry into the conduct of the constable?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Statements to the effect quoted in the Question having appeared in the public Press some 10 days ago, inquiries were at once instituted, with the result that the allegations are believed to be wholly untrue. Both Mr. Bennett and Sergeant Galligan emphatically deny the allegations affecting them.

INDIA (LAW AND JUSTICE)—ALLEGED EXECUTION OF A REPRIEVED CONVICT.

MR. BRIGGS asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true that a man was executed in Barrisal Gaol on the 5th September last who had been reprieved by the Indian Government two days before; and, if so, will he also state why the reprieve did not reach Barrisal Gaol until after the execution; and, what steps have been taken to discover and adequately punish the person or persons responsible for this grave neglect of duty?

MR. K. J. CROSS: The Government of India have been asked for a Report on this case. At present, all the information the India Office has is derived from the newspapers.

NAVY — JUNIOR SERVICE IN THE ENGINEERS AND ACCOUNTANT BRANCHES.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the Committee appointed to inquire into the operation of the present rules for counting Junior Service in the Engineer and Accountant branches of the Royal Navy have as yet made their Report; and, if not, how soon they may be expected to do so?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: I am informed that the Report will be presented to the Board in the course of the present week.

WEST INDIES—ISLAND OF GRENADA —APPOINTMENT OF PROVOST MARSHAL.

MR. DEASY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If it is the intention of the Government, contrary to the opinion expressed by the Royal Commissioners appointed to inquire into the affairs of the Windward Islands, to sanction the appointment of Mr. Charles Hewetson Collymore to the office of Provost Marshal of the Island of Grenada?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY, in reply, said, that Mr. Collymore had been only temporarily appointed, pending a decision as to the final arrangement.

UNIVERSITIES (SCOTLAND)—LEGISLATION.

MR. CRAIG-SELLAR asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is the intention of the Government to give early attention to the claims of the Scottish Universities for improved organisation; and, whether, if the Scottish Universities Bill, which miscarried last Session and the previous Session be introduced again, the Government will undertake that it shall be submitted to the House in its several stages with reasonable despatch?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR): In the present state of Parliamentary Business my hon. Friend will not expect that I should give any pledge as to the particular time at which the Scottish Universities Bill will be introduced: but the Government fully recognize the special claims which the subject of that measure has upon their attention, and when the House resumes the usual course of Business it will certainly be kept in view.

CIVIL SERVICE (IRELAND)—MR. GEORGE BOLTON.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What is the present position of Mr. George Bolton; is he in receipt of salary from the Crown; and, what are the intentions of the Government respecting him?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Mr. Bolton, in May last, applied to the Bankruptcy Court to sanction an arrangement with his creditors. A Treasury Minute, of November 30, 1868, provides, among other matters, that—

"If a Civil servant enters into a composition with his creditors under the Bankruptcy Act, he shall be suspended pending examination of the circumstances."

Towards the close of last Session it was stated that, although the Lord Lieutenant was advised that Mr. Bolton was not a Civil servant within the meaning of the Minute, he would, under the circumstances, be dealt with by analogy to it, and be suspended pending the bankruptcy proceedings. Since that time all the proceedings in bankruptcy have, with the full assent of all the creditors, been discontinued. Under these circumstances, and after careful investigation of the facts, it has been determined to remove the suspension.

MR. HEALY: I beg to give Notice that on the first and every available opportunity, in season and out of season, I will call attention in the House of Commons to the ruffianism of reappointing Mr. George Bolton by the Irish Government. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The expression just used by the hon. Member is entirely irregular and out of Order; and as there have been so many instances of irregular Questions being put in the form of Notices, I shall be bound to take more serious notice of them if the practice is persisted in. [Cries of "Withdraw!"]

UNITED STATES—THE WORLD'S EXPOSITION AT NEW ORLEANS—THE ENGLISH COMMISSIONER.

MR. CARBUTT asked, What steps, if any, have been taken by the Government in response to the invitation of the Government of the United States to take part in the World's Exposition which is to open in New Orleans in December next?

MR. COURTNEY: Her Majesty's Government will appoint the British Minister at Washington its Special Commissioner for this Exhibition, and the Consul at New Orleans will represent this country on the spot. The Minister at Washington will, perhaps, be present at the opening ceremony.

CHARITABLE DONATIONS AND BEQUESTS (IRELAND)—CATHERINE EATON'S BEQUEST.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to a passage in the Thirty-ninth Annual Report of the Commissioners of Charitable Donations and Bequests, from which it appears (page 5, paragraph 16) that, under the will of Catherine Eaton, made in 1793, a sum now amounting to £4,000, "for the foundation and support of a Woollen Manufactory in the parish of Wicklow," is lying unused and unclaimed; and, whether he will cause steps to be taken to have it made available for the purposes intended by the testatrix?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I am informed that the residue of Miss Eaton's property was left for the purpose mentioned in the Question—namely, the foundation of a Woollen Manufactory in the parish of Wicklow; but that the sum to which the hon. Member refers was not a part of the residue so bequeathed, but is the accumulation of a distinct legacy to private persons, which, not having been claimed, is held by the Court of Chancery. The Commissioners are now taking steps, with the object of seeking the advice of the Attorney General as to whether, after so great a lapse of time, this bequest, represented by the £4,000, may not be now held to have failed, and the amount be treated as part of the residue of the estate.

NAVY—H.M.S. "AGAMEMNON" AND "AJAX."

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the steering defects of the Agamemnon are such as to unfit her for service without alteration, what the nature and cost of this alteration will be, and how long it will take to complete her; and, whether the Ajax is similarly defective, and will require similar alterations?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: The steering of the Agamemnon up to nine knots is satisfactory. At higher speeds it is found difficult to steer an accurate course without the assistance of her screws. The turning powers are good at all speeds. Similar cases have occurred, where better acquaintance with the ship has enabled officers to handle them more easily.

It is not proposed to make any alteration now; but if on arrival at Malta the difficulty has not been overcome, orders will be given to increase the upper part of the rudder, which may take about a fortnight, at an expense of, perhaps, about £200 or £300. The case of the Ajax is similar.

INDIA—UNCOVENANTED CIVIL SERVICE.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether a Memorial from the Uncovenanted Civil Servants of India to the Viceroy, praying for the redress of certain grievances, has been received by His Excellency; and, whether any, and what, steps have been taken in the matter?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The India Office has received no Memorial of this kind; nor have we any information that such a Memorial has been presented to the Viceroy.

CITY OF LONDON LIVERY COMPANIES COMMISSION—LETTER OF H. D. WARR, SECRETARY.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will have any objection to lay upon the Table a copy of a letter written by Mr. H. D. Warr, Secretary to the City of London Livery Companies' Commission, by the direction of the Commissioners, and addressed to the editors of certain Liberal newspapers with a view to "educate the opinions of the Liberal electors of the Provinces" upon the recommendations of the Commissioners in their Report?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I only saw this Question this afternoon. This is a matter of which I know nothing, and I have had no opportunity of communicating with the persons; but if the right hon. Gentleman wishes I will do so.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I will ask this Question again on Thursday.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS, CARLOW UNION—IRREGULARITIES OF RETURNING OFFICER.

MR. GRAY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that in the Rathornan and Ridge division of the Carlow Union, two successive elections for the office of poor law guardians have been set aside in consequence of irregularities on the part of the returning officer, Mr. Jameson, who also acts as clerk of the union; whether he is aware that a third election is shortly to take place; and, whether the Local Government Board propose to again appoint as returning officer the same person who was responsible for the two previous abortive elections, the cost of which has to be borne by the ratepayers?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: It is true that two elections for the Divisions named have been set aside; but this course was rendered necessary on each occasion by reason of votes having been erroneously allowed on claims imperfectly filled up; and although the Returning Officer committed errors of judgment in allowing such votes, the Local Government Board do not think it can properly be said that the elections were set aside in consequence of irregularities on his part. Mr. Jameson does not appear to have been guilty of any wilful default, and the Board do not intend to deprive him of the office of Returning Officer at the election which is now proceeding.

CENTRAL ASIA—THE RUSSO-AFGHAN FRONTIER—THE REPORT.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If his attention has been called to the disclosure of the contents of a Report upon the Central Asian frontier question in certain newspapers, and if he can state by whom the Report in question was made; if it was of a confidential character; and, what steps the Government propose to take to punish the offender?

MR. J. K. CROSS: In reply to the Question of the hon. Member for Carlow, I can only say that the Secretary of State is in communication with the Government of India on this subject.

IRELAND—BOARD OF WORKS—LOANS FOR WORKHOUSE BUILDINGS.

COLONEL NOLAN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If the Treasury has made any rule restricting the right of Unions in Ireland to obtain money from the Board of Works for the purpose of altering or improving workhouse buildings; and, if so, will the Treasury at least relax this rule in favour of those

Sir Thomas Brassey

Unions which, like Loughrea, have entered into contracts for buildings before the promulgation of such a rule?

MR. COURTNEY, in reply, said, that he was not able exactly to understand what his hon. and gallant Friend was driving at in this Question. There had been no change since 1876—indeed, he might say since 1866—as to the rights of Poor Law Unions to borrow money for improving workhouse buildings.

COLONEL NOLAN gave Notice that he would ask, Whether it was true that the Guardians of Loughrea Union had been refused money to alter the workhouse so as to provide accommodation for nuns whom it was proposed to receive as nurses in the workhouse?

MR. COURTNEY: Perhaps the hon. and gallant Member would give me a written communication on the subject.

OF "HANSARD."

MR. HEALY asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, In what cases are the Police Department of the Castle dependent for their instructions on volumes of Hansard or newspaper reports; is Hansard supplied to this Department at the public expense; if so, when was the volume containing the Report of the Debate on Mr. Chance's arrest received by Superintendent Harrel; and, have any instructions been given which will obviate the delay caused by this Department having to wait until the annual volumes of Hansard are issued?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Police Department receive their instructions as regards matters that have passed in the House of Commons, not from Hansard or from newspaper reports, but from the Chief Secretary. Hansard is not supplied to the Police Department. I quoted Hansard in my answer to the hon. Member only as a correct record of what took place in the House as compared with the contemporary reports in the newspapers, to which Mr. Harrel referred to in his letter to Mr. Chance. The explanation why Mr. Harrel relied on the newspaper reports is this. On the 31st of July I promised to consider the question on an inquiry. I set the matter in hand at once, communicated with the Home Office, and had an interview with Colonel Pearson with reference to the English practice in similar cases. Then the matter fell through owing to my ceasing to come to the House of Commons and the Irish Office for a while on account of ill-health. This is one of several other Irish matters which were passed over in consequence. This autumn, as soon as I saw the correspondence between Mr. Harrel and Mr. Chance, I informed the Irish Government how the matter stood, and the inquiry will be granted.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—SUB-COMMISSIONERS—MR. WALPOLE.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Land Commission have received a memorial, signed by thirty of the tenants on the Earl of Egmont's property, near Kanturk, protesting against the retention of Sub-Commissioner Walpole on the Cork Sub-Commission, alleging that he has fixed rents on lands which he never visited; that, in the cases of two of the tenants, Thomas Sampson, of Annagh, and Daniel Sullivan, the tenants have surrendered their holdings rather than pay the rack-rents imposed upon them; that Sub-Commissioner Walpole habitually adopts the valuation of the landlord's valuer, who is a cousin of his own; that he is an intimate friend and neighbour of the Earl of Egmont's agent, Captain Trench, stops at the same hotels with him, and has travelled on the same car with him when engaged in the work of the Commission; and, whether these charges of partiality have been inquired into; and, if so, what steps will be taken by the Government?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am informed by the Land Commissioners that they did receive the Memorial mentioned, and, with all the allegations contained in it fully before them, the Commissioners replied that they do not believe that any valid reason exists in the case of any of their Sub-Commissions to prevent either landlords or tenants desirous of availing themselves of the Land Act from doing so. The Commissioners have full confidence that Messrs. Doyle, Walpole, and Guiry, who form the Cork Sub-Commission, will discharge their duty with the utmost impartiality.

MR. O'BRIEN said, that was not a reply to his Question. He had asked whether these charges of partiality had been inquired into by the Commissioners themselves examining those very serious and specific charges, or did they merely reply, without making any inquiries, that they saw no valid reason for doing so?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am not aware of what steps the Land Commissioners took. They are a body quite independent of the Government, and they have expressed in their reply the conclusion at which they have arrived.

MR. O'BRIEN: Then I beg to give Notice that I will renew this Question.

MR. KENNY asked, Upon what principle the dying declaration of Patrick Slattery was supplied to a Member of this House, while the dying declarations of Patrick Joyce and Patrick Casey (which, as it is alleged, exculpate Myles Joyce and others) are withheld, although repeatedly asked for?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER), in reply, said, the declaration of Slattery stood on an entirely different footing from that of the other declarations referred to in the Question. That of Slattery was a statement that he was the instrument of suborning a witness to give false evidence at a trial. The others were declarations of men under sentence of death, which it was the uniform practice in England and Ireland not to make public.

MR. KENNY: Is it not the fact that both declarations were taken before Resident Magistrates; and, if so, are not the proceedings the same? Will the hon. and learned Gentleman give any further explanation, considering that the declarations withheld are of greater consequence than those which have been supplied?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): That makes them declarations if they had been sworn; but it does not make them declarations made under similar circumstances.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND) — SALARIES OF NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that in numerous cases the salaries due to Irish National teachers for the quarter ended September 30th have not yet been paid by the Education Board; whether similar salaries are paid in advance in England; why repeated complaints have failed to induce the Department to pay salaries to the teachers in due time; and, whether any undertaking can now be given that payments will be punctually made henceforward?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I believe that this is not the first time a Question of this kind has been asked in the House, and the answer given on a former occasion applies equally now. The salaries of the Irish National Teachers and Monitors—over 16,000 in number—are by means of considerable effort on the part of the officials concerned punctually paid on the succeeding quarter day. If upon that day no payment is made in any particular case or cases, it is because of some irregularity in the return of the manager or breach of rule involving inquiry. As a matter of fact, on the last pay day (14th of October), 94 per cent of the salaries due on the 30th of September were paid. If the hon. Member has in his mind any special case in which he thinks there has been delay, and will let me know the particulars, I shall make inquiry with regard to it.

ARMY—QUARTERMASTERS—PROMOTION.

MR. BIGGAR rose to put the following Question:—To ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the official Annual Army List, dated January 17th 1884, is correct in showing that four hundred and fifty-five Quartermasters in the Army, out of which number only six, being under thirty-two years of age, are eligible for Lieutenancies; whether these six Quartermasters can, after seven years' service, enter the Army Department; whether the remaining four hundred and forty-nine Quartermasters are entirely debarred from the Pay Department, and from all substantive promotion; whether seven young Quartermasters were promoted by favour to Lieutenancies on July 2nd 1884; whether these Quartermasters will be permitted to reach the Pay Department over the heads of these four hundred and forty-nine Quartermasters; whether this oppression of the Quartermasters is because they are raised from the poorer class people; and, whether this system was recommended to Her Majesty by the present Government?

MR. SPEAKER: Before this Question is put by the hon. Member and answered, I have to observe that one of the paragraphs in the Question has escaped notice, and has inadvertently been allowed to appear on the Notice Paper. The paragraph I refer to is the sixth paragraph on the top of page 8. It is an improper and irregular paragraph, and I shall not allow it to be put. I therefore hope that no notice will be taken of it.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER: The official Army List of January, 1884, may be accepted as correct with reference both to the ages and the numbers of Army Quartermasters. Only six were then eligible for lieutenantcies, since by the Royal Warrant for Pay and Promotion, Article 6, a Quartermaster cannot be granted a commission as lieutenant if he exceeds 32 years of age. These six Quartermasters can, after seven years' service in the rank of lieutenant, become eligible as candidates for the Army Pay Department, provided that they do not then exceed 40 years of age. The reply to the third Question is involved in the answers to Nos. 1 and 2. In reply to No. 4, I have to say that it is not true that seven young Quartermasters were promoted by favour to lieutenantcies on July 2, 1884. The answer to No. 5 is that if these officers, at the end of seven years' service in the combatant ranks, become candidates, and are accepted as such, for the Pay Department, they will pass over the heads of the Quartermasters who were disqualified for lieutenantcies by age. The answer to No. 6 I am to omit. In answer to No. 7, I have to say that this system of promotion to the Pay Department was not instituted by the present Government, but has been in operation since the formation of the Pay Department in 1876.

ARMY—CASE OF JAMES HENRY PORTER, SCHOOLMASTER 56th REGIMENT.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to the case of James Henry Porter, late Army Schoolmaster in the 56th Regiment; whether it is the fact that this man served in the Army for 21 years all but 75 days, ten years of which service was in India; whether he was most favourably reported during 17 years of this service; whether he was
